

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

VOL. I.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND, LAKE MICHIGAN, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1850.

NO. 1.

THE NORTHERN ISLANDER

IS PUBLISHED WEEKLY,
at St. James, Beaver Island, Lake Michigan, by COOPER & CHIDESTER.

TERMS:—$2.00 per annum, payable, invariably, in advance.

All letters relating to the affairs of the publication, whether on business or otherwise, should be addressed to COOPER & CHIDESTER, and postage paid.

Advertisements will be inserted at $1.00 per square (12 lines) for three insertions, and 25 cts. for every subsequent insertion. A liberal discount made to those who advertise largely. Advertisements not ordered for any particular time will be continued till further orders and payment of bill.

During the season of suspended navigation (usually about 16 weeks) the Islander will be sent to mail subscribers but once a month.

THE GLOBE:

A CONGRESSIONAL, AGRICULTURAL, AND LITERARY NEWSPAPER.

The undersigned submits to the public his proposals for the GLOBE and its reports for the next session of Congress. Congress has now so liberally patronized the undertaking that it will be established as a standard work worthy of its official imprimatur, unless the undersigned fails in his duty. This will not be the case if earnest effort can avail. The GLOBE is the only paper that will furnish full reports of the proceedings and debates of the two Houses of Congress; and having received their sanction as such, the best Reporters will be engaged to write out the debates of each day, which will undergo the revision of the Members. The work, after passing through the DAILY GLOBE and receiving correction, will be presented, as finished, in the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE and APPENDIX.

The debates will probably increase in interest during the next session. The one subject which engrossed the last, will doubtless give way to others of great variety, which, in this progressive country, the cordials of party, and the ambition for place and distinction, necessarily produce. Vast interests will be at stake upon the decisions of the next Congress; and there is great talent in both branches, which will be evoked in their discussion. All the honors of the Republic, dependent on the succession to the Presidency, as well as all the great and permanent interests which go to the advancement of the power of the country, will give impulse to the action of the next session of Congress.

The DAILY GLOBE will be published daily during the session of Congress, and weekly the remainder of the year. It will contain full and faithful reports of the proceedings of both Houses of Congress; and miscellaneous articles on those subjects to which it is devoted.

The WEEKLY GLOBE will contain Agricultural and miscellaneous articles; and will occasionally give debates of such importance as command universal interest.

The price of the WEEKLY GLOBE is reduced to one dollar, with a view to obtain a more general circulation.

The CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE will embody, as it has done for the last seventeen years, Congressional proceedings and debates exclusively.

The APPENDIX will embrace the revised speeches separately, and the messages of the President of the United States and the reports of the Heads of the Executive Departments.

The CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE and APPENDIX will be published as fast as the proceedings of Congress will make a number. Subscribers may expect one number of each week during the first four weeks of a session, and two or three numbers of each week afterwards, until the end of the session.

Complete indexes to the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE and APPENDIX will be sent to subscribers soon after Congress adjourns.

Nothing of a political party aspect, will appear in the GLOBE save that which will be found in the Congressional reports. A paper assuming to be an impartial vehicle for all sides, cannot maintain its character if the editorial columns reflect a party hue.

TERMS.

For one copy of the DAILY GLOBE (daily during the session of Congress, and weekly during the recess) a year, $5.00.

For the DAILY GLOBE for less than a year, at the rate of $4 cents a month.

For one copy of the WEEKLY GLOBE for one year, $1.00.

For one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE during the session, 1.50.

For one copy of the APPENDIX during the session, 1.50.

For four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE or APPENDIX, or part of both, say two of each, or three of one, and one of the other, 5.00.

The same rate for a greater number of copies.

The prices of these papers are so low, that advance payments are indispensable to carry them on, and no order will be attended to unless the money accompanies it.

Subscriptions may be remitted by mail, at our risk, in money at par in the section of the country where subscribers reside. The money should be here by the 15th December to insure all the numbers.

THE DELUGE.

ITS NATURAL CAUSES—CHANGES ACCOMPANYING IT—CERTAINTY AS A FACT IN SCIENCE.

BY JAMES J. STRANG.

To one well acquainted with the surface and appearance of the earth, the extent of its continents, and the height of its mountains, nothing would be more difficult to conceive possible than an universal deluge. Yet are we required, not merely by the traditions of nearly all nations, but by our faith in the sacred oracles, to believe that such an event has taken place in the time past.

I propose, in a brief essay, to show that such an event, however impossible it may be now, was, at the creation, quite possible; and beyond the mere testimony of historic writing, to show from the geologic structure of the earth, and its planetary arrangement, that it has occurred.

The great difficulty in believing in the verity of an universal deluge arises from the impossibility of obtaining water to produce it.—Water will naturally and forever seek its own level. The mass of the waters find their common level at the surface of the ocean. If all the lakes, rivers and fountains of water were drained into the ocean, they would suffice to raise it but a very few feet—probably not more than two or three. But the highest mountains are elevated some five miles above the level of the ocean. From what source was the water supplied that deluged these mountains?

This is the great question concerning the deluge. This we propose to answer, not merely to the fanatical, but to the philosophical, in a manner perfectly satisfactory to the rational and thinking.

Any one will readily admit that such an event as an universal deluge must have effected great changes; and must also have been produced by means of great changes of some kind or other. Though the earth in its present condition could not be deluged, was it not so created that it could be deluged as easily as any other great event in nature could be produced?

Gen. i. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.—"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament heaven. And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he seas."

By this short account it appears that the earth was not created as it now is, with its surface one vast ocean, broken by two continents, and specked with innumerable islands. It was a vast surface of land, with here and there in its deepest vallies a gathering together of waters called seas. The great body of water which has filled up these seas till they join together in one vast ocean was then the waters "above the firmament." For God formed the firmament, that is, the natural heavens, dividing the waters above it from the waters below it.

There was, then, at the creation, a vast body of water above the firmament. That water should thus be held above the firmament cannot be regarded as incredible, since the planet Jupiter is found by modern astronomers to be thus situated at the present time. It has its belts or rings of aqueous matter constantly surrounding it, and the centripetal and centrifugal attractions which keep all the planets in their proper orbits would, as they do in the case of the planet Jupiter, keep this water at the proper elevation above the earth. So it did not require any act of violence to the laws of nature to keep a great body of the water above the firmament, and therefore off from the earth, leaving the principal part of the earth dry land, fit for the habitation of man, for whom it seems most peculiarly designed.

The planet Jupiter has no change of seasons; no natural division into zones. The plane of its equator and ecliptic are identical, and its days and nights are continually of the same length. And, though astronomers have not observed the fact, it is nevertheless a demonstrable truth, that its nights are distinguished from its days by a very moderate degree of darkness, quite insufficient to break off men's ordinary avocations. For the reflections of light upon the internal surface of its rings must extend its twilight quite round its circumference. So, too, when the earth was in like manner surrounded by its waters above the firmament, it could not properly be said that day and night alternated, but evening and morning alternated.—There was no night there.

It is an interesting fact in this connection that all mention of natural events and of the habits of the Antediluvians confirm us in the opinion that previous to the deluge there was no change of season, no burning heat, or freezing cold, but a perpetual harvest in spring time.

It is nowhere mentioned that any of the Antediluvians lived in houses. True, one tribe "dwelt in tents." (Gen. iv. 20.) Yet this is spoken of as a marked peculiarity which distinguished them from other tribes. I may safely affirm further that the sacred writer did not originally assert that the sons of Jabal dwelt in "tents," but only that they dwelt in changeable habitations. They were herdsmen, or, in the simple language of the sacred historian, "such as have cattle," and wandered about from place to place, dwelling where inclination led them, instead of cities or fixed places, where various tribes constantly dwelt.

Previous to the deluge men wore clothing, it is true; but this was merely to cover themselves for shame, (Gen. iii. 7, 21,) and not to protect from inclement weather; and the ideas of heat and cold are nowhere named or alluded to till after the deluge. Seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, rain and drouth are all ideas originating with the deluge. At the time of the creation we are told that it did not rain, but that God caused a mist to go up from the earth, and water it. (Gen. ii. 6.)

When the flood abated from the earth, God "spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying, And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you; and with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth. And I will establish my covenant with you: neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood: neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you; and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud: And I will remember my covenant which is between me and you, and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh. And the bow shall be in the cloud, and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth." Gen. ix. 8 to 16.

Thus it appears that the rainbow was not known till after the deluge. Yet any one having the slightest acquaintance with the laws of light can readily see that there could be no rain but the rainbow would appear to those who were on the sunny side of the storm. It is vain to pretend that the rainbow was miraculously introduced. It is produced by well known natural causes; causes existing in the nature of light itself, and therefore coeval with it. The non-existence of the rainbow previous to the deluge, therefore pre-supposes the non-existence of rain, and of clouds high above the earth.

To account for all these facts, so different from what we find in the present state of the earth, we have only to give credence to the account of the creation in Genesis—that God made a firmament to divide the waters above the firmament from the waters below, and that he gave the earth the same manner of motion with the planet Jupiter, which has its firmament dividing its waters in the same manner.

The waters around the earth protected the equatorial regions from the burning heat, and the reflected rays from the sides of the rings made up for the loss of heat by the obliquity of the sun's rays in the polar regions. The water was so near above that mists did not rise into clouds; but if the tendency to ascend was strong, the mists would be attracted to the waters above.—If not strong enough for that, they watered the earth in dews, which, falling on the earth every day, always watered without ever drenching it.

With the poles of the earth always perpendicular to the ecliptic, there could be no change of seasons; and the warmth and moisture of every part of the earth gave it universal and perpetual fruitfulness. In the cultivation of the soil man had only to contend with thorns and thistles, (Gen. iii. 18,) which, like the fruits, were every where spontaneous. With such a climate the growth of plants could not but be exuberant in every part of the earth; and, considering these facts, the geological remains of equatorial plants of enormous size, near the poles, can no longer surprise us.

Corresponding to this theory the sacred historian, speaking of the coming of the flood, says, "the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." The opening of the windows of heaven can mean nothing but the pouring down of the waters above the firmament.

As to the means by which the waters were precipitated to the earth, it does not become me to speak dogmatically. But it is enough to know that a large comet passing in the immediate vicinity of the earth would be cause sufficient to incline the poles to the ecliptic, cast down the waters by deranging the balance of centripetal and centrifugal attraction, and thus deluge the earth and produce an alternation of seasons by one single act.

There could be no bow before the deluge, for there was no rain. There could be none during the deluge, for the rain was then universal, and there was no sunny side on which to form a bow.

But as soon as the deluge was finished, God set the bow in the cloud; not by creating a new law of light, but only by that change of circumstances which brought it into action. The law of light by which the refraction of the sun's rays at a certain angle produces the rainbow is doubtless eternal—immutable—essential to the existence of light itself, and therefore could not have been produced by the exercise of creative power even, at the time of the deluge. It must have been in existence as a scientific truth as long as light had a being.

The same act which precipitated the waters above the firmament to the earth, also broke up the fountains of the great deep. For the attractive power of a comet or other heavenly body sufficient to change the position of the earth in its orbit would produce a tide even in the inland seas of the Antediluvian earth sufficient to inundate all the low grounds about their shores.

A question will be raised, how does it happen that the water does not now cover the whole earth? For, says the sacred writer, "the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered." (Gen. vii. 12, 20.)

This objection is predicated upon the theory that the water stood at a dead level fifteen cubits above the tops of the mountains. Such a theory is not warranted by the language of the sacred historian. The waters prevailed fifteen cubits where the writer speaks of; probably where the ark was; but in regard to the high hills and the tops of the mountains, we are only assured that they were covered. After this (Gen. viii.) we learn that the waters abated, but we do not learn that any part of them were returned to the heavens, or in any way removed, except by abating; that is, sinking down to their natural level. In thus sinking down the present division of land and water, with some slight differences, was doubtless formed, without any diminution of the quantity of water, which, in the act of precipitation, "covered the tops of the highest mountains," so as to destroy every thing "that had the breath of life."

After the deluge the Lord said, "I will not any more curse the ground for man's sake, neither will I again smite every living thing, as I have done." And the earth having lost its perennial productiveness, in the alteration of seasons, which was established by the change of the direction of the earth's axis, he promised farther, (Gen. vii. 22,) "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease." This is the first mention in all human records, of any such changes. They were new facts, founded on the new state of the earth, and the promise was that the earth should not be any farther cursed, so as to take away the advantages it then possessed.

Agreeing with this hypothesis is the fact that throughout all northern Europe and Asia the skeletons of elephants and other animals peculiar to the tropics are found in vast abundance. Indeed, not many years since the carcass of an elephant was discovered imbedded in a vast mass of ice near North Cape in Norway, in a state of nearly perfect preservation. It was first brought to light by the sliding off of a vast avalanche, undermined by the constant washing of the sea. The flesh was being devoured by the bears as fast as it thawed out, but so perfect was its preservation that almost the entire hide, as well as the skeleton, were preserved for the royal museum. This carcass, previous to the abrasion of the ice, was imbedded several hundred feet beneath the surface of snow and ice, where it had been left at the abateing of the waters of the deluge, frozen by the first frosts, and covered by the first snows ever witnessed on the earth.

There are places where the waters are constantly wearing away the coasts of Greenland, and imbedded in ice, and covered with snows, are cane breaks as regular as any on the Mississippi, and of as luxuriant a growth as those of Central America. These must have grown, as the animals lived, at a period when the polar regions had a tropical climate; that is, in the Antediluvian world.

In the Delta of the Mississippi, the Niger and several other large rivers, forests are found standing where they grew, buried in the alluvium which has been accumulating for ages, and remaining perfect in their structure to about sea level. These forests are extensive in Louisiana, and in the lower part of the State the trees are found entire. Further up the tops are rotted away down to sea level, but in either places if you dig down to the roots they are found to stand in the soil where they grew.—These forests must have grown when the surface of the ocean was below where their roots now are.

Geologists have attempted to account for the existence of these forests by supposing that the ground has sunk since they grew. But it is a well known fact that the down-sinking and up-rising of the earth goes on so very slowly as to be scarcely perceptible in a generation.—Consequently if these grounds had merely sunk by the burning out of internal fires, (as the countries bordering on the German ocean are supposed to be,) the forests would have utterly wasted long before the waters rose over them so as to preserve them.

Unquestionably these forests are Antediluvian. They grew on their present level, and were drowned out, and preserved from decay by the waters of the ocean, which was filled up at the subsiding of the deluge so as to cover them; those portions of the forest not entirely submerged rotting off near the surface of the water, and preserved merely the stumps. The annual deposit of mud since that time have filled up these narrow and shallow portions of the ocean, and made Deltas where were formerly the estuaries of the great rivers.

This hypothesis stands with the account given by the sacred historian, both of the creation, the history of the Antediluvians and the deluge. It agrees with a vast mass of facts discovered by the scientific in modern times in the geology of the earth. It makes the flood a possible and probable fact, which would otherwise be incredible and impossible. And I submit that the various facts and circumstances referred to in the course of this article, show it not merely possible and probable, but true.

❧ The late severe east wind drove a large quantity of nets ashore, doing considerable damage.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1850.

PUBLISHERS NOTICE.

After considerable unexpected delay we have at length succeeded in getting out the first number of the Northern Islander. The publication will be regular hereafter, though during the winter the paper will doubtless reach our subscribers at irregular intervals.

The Islander will, as its name imports, be the gazette of the Islands; devoted to their interests; as well as a vehicle of general news, literature, science and the arts. And issuing among a people exclusively saints, (in derision called Mormons,) it will of course strongly reflect their interests and feelings. Yet it is not intended as the official organ of the church, but a paper for general reading. The publishers will, nevertheless, as matters of news, keep their readers informed of every thing of interest, both relating to the Mormon colonies in this region, and all the various settlements commenced in the upper lake country.

Without entering into any partisan political measures, we shall give the political news, and frankly express our views on all such questions as are of interest to the people of this region.

The peculiarity of our location, the vast country around scarcely more known to the general reader than the interior of Africa, but intimately known to the enterprising semi-civilized traders and hunters, who occasionally visit us, the rich store of Indian legend all open to us, and the somewhat original views of the progress of events, taken by many in this region, will give an interest to our publication which few country or city periodicals can claim.

These facts render it necessary that the matter of the paper be almost entirely original. In all the vast territories of the Hudson Bay Company, three-fourths of Upper Canada, and half of Wisconsin, there is no paper.—Two-thirds of Michigan has but one. To all this region, an empire larger than all Europe, sparsely populated with a very enterprising and intelligent population, we have access. Its history, its institutions, even its geography, its legendary lore are a vast untasted fountain, from which we propose to enrich our columns, at the same time that we chronicle the founding and growth of a great empire. With this brief expose of our intentions, we offer our journal to those who think it worth the purchase.

PROPELLER OHIO.

The Ohio, on her last trip down, stopped at this place, laying at McKinley's wharf on the east side of the harbor. Early on the morning of the 28th Nov., during the severest east wind known on this lake for thirty years, she broke loose, bringing away the principal part of the wharf, and drifted to the west side of the harbor, where she went aground in three feet water. The cargo, consisting mostly of 7,000 bushels of wheat, was brought ashore, when, on the 3d of Dec., she succeeded in getting off, and the evening of the 5th she left for Cleveland, in good condition. The people here turned out in a body to assist the Capt. in his successful efforts to save boat and cargo, conduct which he appeared to properly appreciate. But the conduct of two of the officers, who, after being thus generously succored, went off calling the people "damned Mormons," cannot be too severely reprehended.

THE PATCHIN.

The first class steamer PATCHIN went on the rocks of Isle le Galet (Skilligalee) the 27th Sept., and was repeatedly reported a total wreck within the next few days. The enterprising commander, Capt. H. WHITAKER, persevered in his efforts to save her, until Nov. 29th, when the severe south-west wind finally broke her in. A very few days previous, she was pumped out, and found to be perfectly sound in her timbers, and the pump on board was sufficient to empty her in two hours and a half. Unfortunately when Capt. W. had got the proper apparatus for her relief, the season was too far gone. Had his measures been a little more promptly seconded, this best specimen of naval architecture on the lakes, would have been saved.

❧ The Islander will be sent to the subscribers of the Gospel Herald, for the periods which they are severally entitled to that paper. We shall issue a periodical exclusively theological, as soon we can obtain a supply of paper of the proper quality. We were disappointed in obtaining a supply before the close of navigation.

CONFLAGRATION.

Two houses up the Island, belonging to Samuel & Thomas Bennett, fishermen, were burned early in the evening of the 6th inst. These houses were on a farm which the Bennetts entered from under a former occupant, who had valuable improvements and a valid preemption, but had entered the adjoining lot by mistake. They have also been in the frequent habit of taking lawless liberties with other fishermen. It is believed that the burning was incendiary, to revenge some of these supposed wrongs. We are not aware however that suspicion points to any particular individual. The houses were unoccupied.

DISTINGUISHED ARRIVAL.

The brig Constellation, which called here the evening of the 7th instant, brought as passengers Mr. Tulley O'Malley, High Sheriff of Mackinac Co. and a few friends. Their advent was the signal to those who had provisions, fish &c., stored in out houses, to get it into their dwellings. A guard was kept up through the night at a store house where some seventy barrels of provisions were placed, which could not be readily removed. Locks are not in general use here, nor is it convenient at present to obtain them. We hope they will never be permanently needed. The Sheriff's term of office expires with the present year.

❧ Several advertisements are crowded out for want of room.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE PROPHET.

The papers throughout the United States have published various accounts of the imprisonment of the prophet at Mackinac, as far as we have learned, invariably getting him into prison on a final trial and conviction, and leaving him there on a six or twelve months sentence. We observe, too, that they generally agree that he was prosecuted for bigamy, adultery, TREASON, &c., on the complaint of G. J. Adams, who, they concur in saying, is a very virtuous man—a perfect pink of perfection—and hates all these iniquities. And there seems to be a very general impression that there is a great and incurable division among the saints here. Some have even gone so far as to say that the bulk of the people were for Adams, and in the next paragraph that Adams had to flee for his life.

All these facts, so important to the community here, we have had to learn from others living at a distance. Here we knew nothing of them, except that a most desperate effort was made to entangle Mr. Strang in the meshes of the law, in revenge for his exercising the proper discipline against immoralities; and that it most signally failed.

The history of the matter is briefly this: G. J. Adams, last winter, became acquainted with a woman of indifferent fame in Boston, by the name of Louisa Pray, alias Louisa Cogswell, whom he took to Baltimore and introduced to his family and friends as a wealthy widow just returning from a large estate in Charleston, South Carolina.

In April he appeared at Beaver with Miss Pray as Mrs. Adams, alledging that his wife, who was known to be far gone with consumption, was dead, and he married to the rich widow. Soon the fact transpired that he had sent Mrs. Adams to New Jersey, and abandoned her. The regular acts of discipline were taken in the premises, and went on step by step until Mr. Adams lost his standing in the church. In the mean time his real wife, who was a most excellent and amiable lady, died. He left here for Mackinac, breathing vengeance on the Mormons in general, and the prophet in particular.

A few days after, Oct. 29th, he returned accompanied by Sheriff O'Malley, with a writ against Mr. Strang, charging him with having threatened the life of Mrs. Adams, alias Miss Pray, alias Mrs. Cogswell.

Mr. Strang, without waiting for an arrest, chartered the schr. Dolphin, and, with a few friends, went down to Mackinac, and took lodgings at a Hotel, where he awaited the proceedings at law, the Justice refusing to entertain the matter until the writ was returned.

ARREST AND TRIAL.

Oct. 26th, Mr. Strang was arrested on a warrant issued by Charles O'Malley, J. P., charging him with threatening the life of Mrs. Adams. Miss Pray, alias Mrs. Adams, and Mr. Adams were sworn. The Justice examined the witnesses for complaint, constantly asking leading questions, laboring industriously to make the evidence bear on the material points of the accusation and even suggesting amendments of the testimony, when it did not exactly answer the purpose designed. To these proceedings Mr. Strang repeatedly objected, but his objections were overruled.

THE CONTEMPT AND COMMITMENT.

In the course of the examination Mr. S. said, "please your honor I object"—The Justice, without waiting to hear the objection, threatened to commit him to prison.

Mr. Strang to the Justice.—"I know the way."

Justice to the Sheriff.—"Take that man to prison."

Mr. Strang to the Sheriff.—"I am ready. If you dare take me on such an order, it is not necessary to delay time."

Justice to Mr. Strang.—"I'll let you know that you are not among your Mormon gang here."

Mr. Strang to the Justice.—"If I were I should not see a Justice of the Peace under the mantle of magisterial dignity, blackguarding
a prisoner at his bar. No Mormon is mean enough for that, Mr. O'Malley."

Justice to the Sheriff.—"Take him away; don't keep him blathering
here."

AND THE PROPHET WENT TO PRIS-ON. If any of his enemies think it a triumph, let them enjoy it.

THE CONVICTION.

After Mr. Strang was taken to prison, Mr. Justice O'Malley went on with his trial in his absence, swearing four or five more witnesses, and convicting him of the design, &c., and requiring him to find two good freehold sureties, residents of Mackinac, in the sum of $3,000, each to keep the peace, &c., and without ever calling him up to hear the decision, or to have opportunity to give bail, committed him to prison for six months.

THE HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. Strang, immediately after being committed, sued out a writ of habeas corpus, before the Hon.
Samuel Abbott, first Judge of Mackinac Co., on which he was brought up the same evening to test the validity of the commitment for contempt. It appearing that he had not been charged specifically with any particular contempt; that he had not had the privilege of being heard in his defence; that there was no record of conviction; that the Sheriff had no mittimus, and that the sentence was without limitation, and therefore in effect for life; all of which were fatal defects; he was discharged from that commitment, but remanded to the custody of the Sheriff on the subsequent commitment.

2D HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. Strang immediately sued out another habeas corpus, and it appearing that his trial had been carried on in his absence, that he had not been allowed to cross examine the witnesses sworn against him, nor to introduce witnesses in his defence; that the bail demanded was unreasonable, and that he had not been allowed opportunity to give bail at all, and finally, that the whole proceeding was on the part of the Justice partial and malicious, he was discharged without costs or bonds.

2D ARREST.

When the fate of the 2d writ of habeas corpus became obvious, Justice O'Malley left the Judges' chamber, saying he would put Strang in jail, so that he would stay two nights at least, in spite of the Judge. As soon as discharged, Mr. Strang having had neither dinner nor supper, started, with a large party of friends, to a saloon for the oysters. Just as the well flavored dishes were coming in, Sheriff Tully O'Malley made Mr.

Strang prisoner again.

3D COMMITMENT.

The prisoner was immediately taken before Justice O'Malley, who handed to the Sheriff a ready prepared warrant to commit the prophet to prison! Mr. Strang offered to go on with the trial, but the Justice replied that it wanted but a few minutes to nine, and he should not sit up nights to keep such a man out of prison.

Mr. Strang claimed the right to be discharged on bail, which the Justice at first absolutely denied.
He finally decided to require two resident freehold sureties good in the sum of $3,000, executable real estate, besides his own recognizance, for his appearance the following day to take his examination. Seven business men, men of substance, offered themselves as bail, and offered to justify as good bail, but the Justice refused either to take them or to examine them on oath as to their sufficiency. AND THE PROPHET AGAIN WENT TO PRISON.

LIFE IN PRISON.

The prison consisted of two rooms, each twelve feet square, built in the side of a hill, and of course very damp. The front room had two windows well grated, but without glass. The other was without a window, and was used as a necessary by the prisoners there, they having been denied the range of the yard. A bunk without bed and but two blankets was provided for the prisoners there, but none for Mr. Strang. The Sheriff refused to allow him to take his overcoat into prison, denied him bed, blanket and food, and refused him even the privilege of a clean plank to sleep on. About 10 o'clock another writ of habeas corpus was served on the Sheriff, and he disregarded it, declaring that he would keep his prisoner till Monday morning, in spite of the Judge.

THE DISCHARGE.

Sunday evening the Sheriff, after taking counsel, brought up his prisoner on the writ of habeas corpus, and Mr. Strang was again discharged, on account of some irregularities in the proceedings.

TRIAL.

Monday morning Mr. Strang was again arrested and put on trial before Charles M. O'Malley, Esquire, on charge of threatening the life of Mrs. Adams, &c.
Before commencing the trial Justice O'Malley said, "we (Justice and prisoner) were rather heated at the former trial, and both used language doubtless which in our cooler moments we should regret. I hope all things will pass off smoothly now."

Mr. Strang to the Justice.—"I am not aware that I was heated at all on that occasion. My language was quite proper. I have no apology to make, and am quite indifferent as to how things may pass off, perfectly assured that if I cannot be heard in my defence here, I have a sufficient defence in the blunders of this Court."

The Justice to Mr. Strang.—"Oh,
I did not intend to make an apology. I am quite sure I did not think which calls for an apology."

We will not detain the reader with a detail of the testimony.—
Suffice to say, the complainant and five other persons swore that they believed Strang a dangerous man, and they believed there were forty persons on Beaver Island who would do just what he told them to, if it was to kill a man;
and one of them said he heard him say, if Mrs. Adams remained on the Island till the holidays, she should ride around the Bay on a black horned buck, with her face backwards, and the boys to hoot at her, and whoever kept her company should share her fate. Adams testified that he had no wife but this, and had not had for many years. But when Mr. Strang pressed him hard concerning his real wife, whom he had lived with some fifteen years down-till last March, and who died in August, Mr. Justice O'- Malley abruptly closed the examination of the witness.

LAST COMMITMENT.

Mr. Strang was again convicted and required to find two resident sureties in the sum of $2,000 each, in executable real estate, to keep the peace, &c., for the term of one year. Different persons offered to become Mr. Strang's bail, until thirteen persons (not all however residents of Mackinac) had offered to become bail, and nine had offered to justify; the Justice the mean while refusing to allow any one to justify. When the thirteen offered, intimating that he should accept them, the Justice added,
"Mr. Strang, as this is a very aggravated case, I shall require you to pay the costs."

Mr. Strang to the Justice.—"Mr.
O'Malley, I shall pay no costs.
Neither shall I give bail." And turning to the gentlemen who had offered to become his sureties, he said, "gentlemen, I am under great obligations to you for this expression of your kindness and confidence, but on the present occasion
I shall not avail myself of it. I beg you to sign no bond for me.
I shall myself sign no recognizance." Turning again to the Justice, he added, "I am in your hands. Hitherto your ignorance has shielded me from your malice. If I ever get this cause before an impartial Justice, I will trust it on the merits. If you intend to commit me to prison, it is as well now as any time. But I will let you know that I am not to be treated in this manner with impunity." And the prophet was committed for the fourth time.

FINAL DISCHARGE.

The same evening he sued out a writ of Habeas Corpus before Judge Chapman, commissioner of the Circuit Court, and on the return of the writ it appearing that the commitment was not in the name of the people, that the prisoner was committed for life, and that the proceeding was on the part of the Justice merely malicious, Mr.
Strang was again discharged without costs or bonds.

Such is a brief history of that imprisonment, which the public press and the community generally have been rejoicing over. Most of the public now believe Mr.

Strang shivering in Mackinac jail, instead of enjoying the quiet happiness of his family. And editors, knowing how much their readers love lies, do not undecieve them.

The arrivals of steam craft after the 1st of Nov. were some 25, and of sail craft (aside from those owned here) about 30.

The Troy, Propeller, was the last from above, arriving and leaving here Dec. 2d. The Propeller Ohio, which had been aground here, left in good order, crowded with passengers, the evening of the 5th. She had on board some 40 men who had been employed on and about the Patchin, and the crew of the Lexington steamer. The Lexington lays up here for winter. The last vessel up was the brig Constellation, which called here, on her way to Racine, on the evening of the 7th inst. She brought a mail, but did not remain long enough to take letters. We understand she was seeking to throw an anchor, having only a small kedge on board.

REVIEW OF THE WORLD.

What was the patriarchal system of religion and government?

It was a system of priesthood, under the direct appointment and sanction of the Almighty, and continually guided by angels, visions, dreams and the spirit of revelation and prophecy, by which means the people of God were governed in all things, temporal and spiritual.

What was the Old Testament system, or the system of Moses and the Jewish prophets?

It was a system of priesthood under the direct appointment and guidance of the Almighty, by means of angels, visions, dreams, revelations and prophets. By these means the people of God were governed in all things, both temporal and spiritual.

What was the New Testament system, or the system of Christ and his Apostles?

It was a system of priesthood and apostleship, appointed by the Lord himself, and guided continually by angels, visions, dreams and the spirit of prophecy and revelation, by which the churches were governed, guided and directed in all things, both temporal and spiritual.

When did the New Testament order, or the order of Christ and his Apostles cease?

When inspired prophets and apostles ceased, together with the ministry of angels, visions, revelations, healings, &c.

Why did these things cease at all?

Because of unbelief and corruption.

What is Catholicism, or Popery?

It is Greek and Roman paganism somewhat remodeled, and under a new name, but equally idolatrous and absurd in all its ways; and, if possible, more productive of every evil to which humanity is subject. It was founded by the devil, and is, in spirit and works, directly opposed to the word and spirit of Christ. Proof: experimental: instanced in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, Germany, Mexico, and other countries for ages.

What is Protestantism?

It is another form of Greek and Roman paganism, or idolatry, equally corrupt, equally productive of all evils, entirely opposed to Christ's kingdom, government, word and spirit. Proof: experimental: instanced in England, Scotland, and the United States, where all evil prevails in society, and where the voice of angels, prophets and revelators passes unheeded, and where men fall martyrs for the testimony of Jesus.

What is Mormonism, or the system of the Latter Day Saints?

It is the restoration of the New Testament system, or the system of Christ and his Apostles again renewed, for the fullness of the Gentiles, and the restoration of Israel. It is a system of priesthood appointed by the Almighty, and continually guided by angels, visions and the spirit of prophecy and revelation, by which the saints should be guided in all things, temporal and spiritual. Proof: its works, doctrine, spirit and powers, instanced from its rise to the present time.

Such, in substance, are a few of the differences between the doctrines of the Saints and the doctrines of the modern 'Evangelical' sects, so called, or, more properly, sectarians.

Doctrine of the Saints.—He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned.

Doctrine of Sectarians.—He that believeth shall be saved, whether he is baptized or not.

Saints.—These signs shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them.—They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.

Sectarians.—These signs are all done away, and are not now a part of the christian system, although we acknowledge they once were a prominent and very essential part of it.

Saints.—If any are sick among you, let them send for the Elders of the church, and let them pray over them, anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and God shall raise them up, and if they have committed sins they shall be forgiven them.

Sectarians.—The members of the church need no healing now, when they are sick; or, if they need it ever so much, it cannot be obtained through prayer and anointing, for this part of the gospel is done away.

Saints.—Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.

Sectarians.—Go ye into all the world and preach that baptism is non-essential, or else baptize little infants who cannot by taught the gospel nor believe in it, at the time of their baptism. But in either case be sure to inform them that part of the commandments, ordinances and promises are done away.

Saints.—It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh—old men shall dream dreams, and young men shall see visions, and on my servants, and on my handmaidens will I pour out in those days of my spirit, and they shall prophecy.

Sectarians.—Revelations, visions and prophecies are among those parts of the gospel which were enjoyed exclusively by the ancients, and which are now to be set aside as among the things which are done away.

Saints.—Not every one that crieth Lord, Lord, shall enter into my kingdom, but he that doeth the will of my Father in heaven.

Sectarians.—You need not be particular to be baptized, and to observe all the commandments and ordinances of Jesus Christ and his Apostles; these things are non-essential at most, but come forward to the anxious seat, and cry Lord, Lord, and he will convert your soul and save you. Saints.—Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?

Sectarians.—Cry to the Lord in humble prayer, but the things he has said are many of them done away.

Saints.—In vain they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

Sectarians.—If we only worship Jesus Christ, and believe in and pray to him, we shall be saved; it matters not what doctrine we follow, if it is only some one of these 'pious,' 'evangelical' sects which do away, or deny and pervert, many parts of the gospel.

We might fill a volume with similar comparisons, but these few will suffice to show any reasonable man that Mormonism (so called,) or the doctrine of the Saints of this age, is a revival or restoration of the old way—the old doctrine and faith once delivered to the saints, and that sectarianism, not Mormonism, is justly entitled a 'new doctrine.'

Mormonism is no new doctrine; it holds forth no new Jesus, no new Gospel, no new plan of salvation. It claims nothing more nor less than a restoration of all the offices, gifts, ordinances, principles, powers, and government, which was anciently set in order among the Saints, and committed to them as an unchangeable and everlasting system of salvation to man. The new records, books, and revelations had among the Latter Day Saints, are so many additional evidences of the same principles developed in different ages or countries. Mr. Mormon, for instance, in his writings of the fourth century of the christian era, and in his abridgments of the more ancient fathers, contends for the same gifts and ordinances which were had among the Jewish Apostles and Disciples, and as written in the New Testament. The Book of Mormon (a work of 600 pages) does not claim or hold forth one new principle or doctrine, but simply bears record of the same principles revealed in another country, and to another people, or branch of Israel.

The visions of Mr. Joseph Smith, and others in this age, claim nothing more nor less than to restore the same doctrine and authority, the same faith and ordinances which were had in the ancient church, and which are clearly laid down by the ancients as essential parts of the gospel. It is true, that in temporal matters, such as gathering together, emigrating, building, &c., modern revelation varies from the ancient, to suit the country and circumstances, just as the revelation to Noah to build the ark, &c., differed from the revelation to Joseph to lay up corn in Egypt, or the revelation of Christ to his disciples, to flee out of Judah and Jerusalem to the mountains.

Revelation on temporal subjects must in the very nature of things, always vary to suit the circumstances of the case. But in the principles of eternal salvation, there can be no variableness or shadow of turning, for every office, gift, power, ordinance and principle pertaining to the same, was instituted before the foundation of the world, and to be made manifest in due time.

We therefore invite and humbly warn all men in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ, to repent and to withdraw from the new fangled systems of sectarianism, under the various names of 'Piety,' 'Orthodoxy,' 'Evangelical,' 'Christian,' and many other terms, calculated to deceive, but which pervert the gospel, and set aside many of its ordinances, commands and promises, and to come out and obey the ordinances of God, as now restored and administered by the Latter Day Saints.

In so doing they will receive remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost, and will enjoy the gift of God.

BEAVER ISLAND AND THE MORMONS.
BY A TRAVELER.

The Beaver Islands, situated at the foot of Lake Michigan, is the present location of the "Peace party" Mormons, (or as they love to call themselves Latter Day Saints) under the administration of James J. Strang, whom they claim to be "Joseph Smith's lawful successor in the prophetic office."

Mormonism, whether true or false, has gone forward in gigantic strides, being aided by the help of persecuting priests and bigoted people, which will always aid in building up any delusion man can invent.

It has brought into the field many thousand thinking people from the various sects of the day, who seem from their appearance and energy, to be people of understanding and enterprise, who really believe their religion to be true, however unpopular, and are showing by their works the faith which they profess to have. Of all the gathering places the Mormons have had, Beaver Island is the best. It possesses the best natural harbor on the Lakes, where all kinds of vessels here lie in perfect safety during the severest storms. It is very commodious and beautiful. There are some five or six hundred of the church already gathered there, having set good stores and one nice steam sawmill on the Island. The interior of the Beaver is a good farming country, well timbered with pine, hemlock, mountain ash, beech, spruce and maple, and a great variety of other kinds of woodland. There are three the most beautiful crystal lakes ever beheld by man. They are building a Tabernacle one hundred by sixty feet, in which they expect to receive their pentacostal endowments, which their Prophet promises them, that God will give them when it is finished. The people seem to be very industrious, active and enterprising.

Their prophet Strang, is a master piece of intellectuality; a thorough going man, of good information. He was once postmaster of Ellington, and editor of the Randolph Herald, of this State,—was a regular lawyer of considerable eminence before his appointment to be the Mormon prophet. Since which he has had nothing to do with either law or politics. He devotes his whole time to the good of his people whom he is president over. He and his people seem to be very much devoted to their cause, and say they shall make Beaver Island a second "Eden" for beauty and privileges. His people, each, are presented with from 40 to 160 acres of land, as an everlasting inheritance to them and their children for ever.

The Mormons are regular Free Soilers, but not politically so, for they say they have never been protected in their rights in Missouri or Illinois as citizens, and therefore they will have nothing to do with politics, but "will be subject to the laws that be," and be governed by them, but will not help make them, and thus bring upon them another persecution.

The Beaver Islands are blest with the most extensive inland fishery there is in the United States. White fish and Mackinac trout are taken in abundance. The Mormons own two good sail vessels, and can do a good business in the lumber trade. All kinds of work is carried on upon the Beaver which is done elsewhere on the western lake ports. Propellers and sail craft are continually going and coming into their port. The first class of large steamers do not stop there regularly; yet a pier will soon be built at the head of the Island, where they will all call regularly. Garden Island, six miles square, is one of the richest and most beautiful Islands on the earth. The Big Beaver is six by fourteen in extent. There are several more beautiful, well timbered Islands which surround the Big Beaver; each about six miles square. The people have sent to Congress a petition for a grant of these Islands, and it is hoped that the government will give it to them that they may live by themselves and enjoy their fanaticism and delusion, if it is such without molestation from any one.

THE MORMON COLONY, BEAVER ISLAND.—We have conversed with a gentleman who has just returned from a visit to Beaver Island, at the head of Lake Michigan, upon which the Mormon Colony is located, headed by their prophet, James J. Strang. They number about six hundred, and have a farm on the Island, which is cultivated by them. They have also engaged to a limited extent in taking white fish and trout, which constitutes their chief means of subsistence. The temple, 100 by 60 feet, is in progress at their settlement, one sixth of the labor of the colony being required upon it weekly. At present this labor is diverted to the building of a printing office, the press and materials for a weekly paper being on the ground. Semi occasionally the portion of the temple which is finished is used as a theatre, Mr. G. J. Adams, one of the leaders, acting as manager. This room is also used as a ball room, where the faithful chase the giddy hours, and also a place of worship on Sundays. Strang is at present deeply engaged in deciphering the plates found by him, as indicated by a vision, back of Kenosha, some time since. They are of copper, and are engraved with cubaistic characters, supposed to relate to the interests of the "church of the latter day," by his followers. He is described as a hard working, and industrious man, but most of those on the island are indolent and evasive to labor.—Chicago, Illinois, Journal, Aug. 3d.

We publish the foregoing, not as absolutely correct, but merely to show what candid men say of us, when they behold and think.

We are not limited, as one would infer from the foregoing, in our labor to one farm. Probably fifty farms are commenced, and improvements will be begun this winter on several more.

The Tabernacle has never been occupied for a ball room, neither would it be possible to so use it. The seats rise like an amphitheatre, and are made fast. Neither is it used for worship Sundays. The Saints, when by themselves, and not restrained by the institutions of man, keep the Sabbath of God. "The Sabbath day is the Sabbath of the Lord our God." Ex. xx. 10. No endowment is promised in the Tabernacle.

Neither have we any islands here six miles square. The islands around Big Beaver range in size from a mere beach to dry nets upon up to 14,000 acres.

FROM THE ORIGINAL.

"Hard at work, friend Greaser," said a neighbor, as he stepped into the shop of an industrious but not very contented tailor. "No rest in this world."

"Not for some of us, certainly. It's work, work, work, day in and day out, from one year's end to another; and after all, we hardly receive enough to keep soul and body together. I get out of all heart sometimes."

"There goes one who has an easy time of it," said the neighbor, glancing out of the window at a middle-aged man who was riding past on a large and beautiful horse.

"Who? Oh, yes, Melville. Humph! Yes, he has an easy time of it, you may well say. Nothing under the sun to do but ride about and take his pleasure, and more money than he knows how to spend. People talk about a wise and just providence, but as to the wisdom and justice of giving all the comfort and happiness to one class of people, and all the trouble, poverty and wretchedness to another class, is what I for one cannot understand."

"It does seem a little unaccountable, friend Greaser," replied the neighbor; "but still it is not wise to arraign providence. All is no doubt right, if we could only see it so."

"A thing it would be very hard to make me see. Oh, no; you needn't tell me it's all right for one set of people, no better than the rest, to have all, and the others to have none, so to speak. Why should Melville, there, for instance, have a fine horse, plenty of money and nothing to do, while I can scarcely afford to live in this poor barracks of a place, although I nearly work my finger ends off? He is no better than I am. There is something wrong in all this, depend upon it. If you were to talk till doomsday, you couldn't convince me to the contrary."

"Depend upon it, neighbor Greaser, it is all right, notwithstanding. We may not be able to see how it is, but still I am satisfied that we have no real cause of complaint against providence for partiality."

"Not for making one-half of the world happy and the other half miserable?"

"I doubt if that is the case. I doubt very much whether Mr. Melville is a happier man than you are—may, if he be even as happy."

"Preposterous!" ejaculated the tailor.

"His very countenance gives the lie to that assumption!"

"I can't say how that is; I don't see him very often."

"I do, then, frequently; he is often in the shop. I work for him. He was here not an hour ago, looking as sleek and contented as one of his own carriage horses. And why shouldn't he look so? What has he to trouble him?"

"More than you think for, I have not the least doubt. My doctrine is, that happiness and misery are about equally distributed between what are designated the higher and lower classes, or the rich and poor. A man in either class may be happy or miserable, but this will depend much upon himself. I, for instance, am no better off than you are, externally, but I am a happier man, because, though I am compelled to work hard, I try to be contented with my lot, and I envy no man, rich or poor. I would not exchange conditions with any man living."

"I would then, I would exchange with Melville to-morrow."

As Greaser had said, the rich man whose condition he envied had been in his shop that morning to order some clothes. The tailor was all smiles and bows to his customer, and showed no evidence of the envy and discontent that were rendering his life miserable.

"Happy dog!" muttered Melville to himself, as he left the tailor's shop and mounted his horse to ride away. "I'd give half my fortune to be as free from trouble as he is. There he sits, from morning till night, with little or no care beyond his shop door. His children look fat and saucy, while mine are always under the doctor's hands, or giving me more heart-trouble than I have ever had in a life. His wife is the picture of health and contentment, while my poor Rosalind, alas! is never free from pain or gloomy despondency. I have heard him singing gaily at his work as I opened the door of his shop, but I haven't hummed a tune these three years; I always feel as if a ten pound weight were pressing upon my bosom. They call the rich happy and the poor miserable. The reverse is nearer the truth."

Such were the thoughts of Mr. Melville as he rode slowly away from the humble shop of the poor tailor. He was a retired Merchant, who had, during a long period of commercial prosperity, amassed a very handsome property. But in doing this he had neglected the cultivation of social habits and feelings, and thought and cared too little about the best interests of his family. This neglect did not arise from any want of home affections, for he was tenderly attached to his wife and children; it arose from the absorbing nature of his business pursuits, to which he gave up his thoughts too entirely. The period during which he was thus actively engaged in gathering in a harvest of wealth, was the very period when his elder children's characters and habits were forming, and when they most required a parent's earnest and affectionate care. But this care they did not receive from Mr. Melville, with whom business was the thing of primary importance; and not until he retired into private life and began to turn his thoughts more earnestly upon his family, was he aware of the fatal error he had committed.

The oldest son of Mr. Melville was at this time just twenty years of age; he had been to college up to within a year, and was now reading law in the office of a distinguished attorney. William Melville was a young man of very fair abilities, and it required only a little more than ordinary application on his part to insure him eminence in the profession he had chosen. But though he possessed naturally a good disposition and had respectable talents, he had not received from his father, as he grew up, any precepts for right government, nor any warnings of the dangers that beset the path of a young man just entering upon life. He had the advantage of as good an education as could be procured, a liberal allowance of money, and was subjected to but few parental restrictions.

Notwithstanding all this, it was some time after Mr. Melville saw with pain that his son was falling into bad habits and keeping bad company, before he could comprehend the cause and feel sensible of the error he had committed, when it was too late to remedy the evils arising from it.

Nor did Ardelle, his oldest daughter, give him cause for any more pleasing reflections. Her mother was not a woman of an active, energetic mind, naturally. Ill health and the want of an adequately felt purpose had taken from her even the modicum of activity, decision and promptness which she possessed at the time of her marriage. As Ardelle grew up, she soon showed herself to possess a strong will which her mother, after making a few feeble efforts to subdue, left entirely unbroken. Mr. Melville saw at times the exhibition of this, but he always left the management of Ardelle to her mother, and satisfied his mind on the subject by assuming that she would rule her rightly. At the boarding school to which Ardelle went, she learned, besides the various branches of education taught there, sundry romantic notions in regard to love and marriage.

When she came home, at the age of eighteen or nineteen, she had not only the appearance of a woman of twenty-one or two, but considered herself as much an object of attention from the beaux as any other marriageable young lady in the whole circle of her acquaintance. Long before she had entered her twentieth year, she had, without a word of consultation with either of her parents, engaged herself in a marriage contract with an adventurer, whose whiskers, mustachios and impudence were his only passport into good society.

When this fact became known to Mr. Melville, his mortification and anger may well be imagined. In a moment of passion, he threatened, in the presence of Ardelle, to shoot the young man if he ever dared to pass his foot across his threshold. This intemperate declaration had been made on the morning of the very day we have introduced him to the reader.

When Mr. Melville returned home, he found his wife in a very unhappy state of mind. Ardelle had left the house shortly after her father had gone out, taking with her some of her clothes and her mother's purse, containing about a hundred dollars. She left a note upon her dressing table, stating what she had done, and declaring her intention to fulfill her engagement with the young man, in opposition to the wishes and commands of her parents. This note was brought to Mrs. Melville by a servant, about two hours after Ardelle had taken this rash and imprudent step. When her husband came home, he found her alone in her chamber, weeping most bitterly. To his eager inquiries, Mrs. Melville placed the daughter's note in his hands. He read it, turned pale, and sunk with a groan upon a chair. It was some time before he recovered from the shock occasioned by this distressing intelligence. When he arose from his seat, which was not for nearly five minutes, during which time he suffered more than he had under any circumstances in his whole life, he said, with bitter emphasis and a dark frown upon his face—"He shall not have her, the false-hearted villain!"

He was turning away to leave the room, when his wife sprang forward, and seizing him by the arm, said, earnestly—"Do nothing rash, William. Find them out, and bring Ardelle home; but, Oh! do nothing that will make us a worse trouble than we now have."

Mr. Melville broke away from the grasp of his wife, without making any reply, and hurried from the house. The young man who had made so strong an impression on the heart of Ardelle was named Bertrand; he was from the south, and was living at one of the principal hotels. What his business was, if, indeed, he had any, was not known. As he might be seen almost any day and any hour in the dry on the fashionable street of the city, the presumption was that he had no regular calling. He represented himself as being the son of a rich southern planter, but this was doubted. How he got introduced into fashionable society at first no one could tell, but having once been introduced, his mustachios, whiskers and impudence, (his stock in trade,) were sufficient to make him welcome in many families from which common prudence ought to have excluded him. He never had ventured to call at Mr. Melville's to see Ardelle but once or twice. His reception by all but the daughter was so cold, that he deemed it prudent to keep away.

Mr. Melville, after some inquiry, ascertained at which hotel the young man boarded, and went there immediately.

"Is Bertrand in?" he asked, eagerly, of the bar keeper.

"I will see," replied the man, ringing a bell.

A servant was dispatched to the young man's room; and soon returned with the information that he was not there.

"Are you sure?" asked Mr. Melville, in a tone of incredulity.

"His door is locked, sir."

"Did you knock?"

"Oh, yes, two or three times."

"Is the proprietor of the hotel in?"

"He is."

"I wish to see him immediately."

The proprietor was called, to whom Mr. Melville explained his errand, and expressed his belief that the young man was really in his room.

"If so, we will soon bring him out," replied the hotel keeper, with indignation.

In company with Mr. Melville, he went up to Bertrand's room. He knocked, but no answer was returned. On examining the key hole, no key was seen inside of the lock.

"He is not here," said the hotel keeper.

"It is easy to take the key out from the inside. He must be here. Is there no other key that will fit the door?" said Mr. Melville, now much excited.

The chambermaid was called and directed to unlock the door with her key, which was so constructed as to spring the bolt of every lock in that particular part of the house. As the door swung open, Mr. Melville stepped in quickly; but the chamber was empty. A trunk stood in the middle of the floor open, but its contents had been removed.

"The bird has flown," said the hotel keeper, as he saw this. "You will have to seek him elsewhere, Mr. Melville."

Strict inquiries were made of the bar keeper and servants, but no one had seen Bertrand since ten o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Melville's next step was to look up his son William, and inform him of what had occurred. The young man, who was of a fiery temperament, had been drinking rather freely. The intelligence made him almost wild with anger. Thrusting a pistol into his pocket, he was striding towards the door with a threat of murder on his tongue, when his father laid his hand upon his arm, and said, somewhat sternly—"William, give me your pistol."

"No, father; I will blow out the scoundrel's brains," returned the young man, passionately.

"The moment I get my eyes upon him."

"If you cannot go in a better spirit than that, William, I do not wish you to go at all. Let me have the pistol."

With a good deal of reluctance, William yielded up the pistol, and at his father's request, sat down and entered into conference with him as to the steps which ought to be taken in order to discover Ardelle. The father and son then separated, with the understanding that they were to meet in an hour if not successful in their search for the young lady, in order to determine upon some more prompt and efficient mode of action.

When William parted with his father, his first step was to go to the store of a gunsmith in order to procure another pistol. While examining one previous to purchasing it, the thought of a cowhide as a substitute crossed his mind. This led him to change his purpose. A stout cowhide was procured and carefully concealed about his person, and then he commenced an eager search for Bertrand and his sister. He first went to all the principal hotels in the city, but gained no information of the objects of his search. This occupied the entire hour, at the close of which he was to meet with his father. In returning to the place at which they had agreed to meet, William Melville passed a fashionable boarding house, before the door of which stood a carriage. It was within half an hour of the starting of one of the steamboat lines for the south, and as there were two trunks on behind, the carriage was evidently waiting to convey some passengers to the boat. Just as the young man was passing, Bertrand came out with a lady closely veiled upon his arm. William instantly recognized her as his sister. Without a word, or a moment's pause for reflection, he struck Bertrand a heavy blow, which stunned him so much that he reeled and fell forward upon the pavement. Before he could recover himself, Melville had drawn forth his cowhide, and was laying it over his face and shoulders with almost the fury of a madman. Ardelle screamed wildly, and sunk fainting to the ground.

The quick, smarting strokes of the cowhide soon restored Bertrand's lost senses and presence of mind. He sprang eagerly to his feet, and before either Melville or the crowd of bystanders that had already gathered round could prevent the movement, drew a pistol and shot his assailant. Melville staggered backwards, with an exclamation, and fell. During the confusion and excitement of the moment, Bertrand escaped, and succeeded in getting away from the city, and ultimately of eluding all pursuit.

The ball passed between a pair of the ribs on the right side, shattering one of them and burying itself deep in the left lung, from which it was found impossible to extricate it. Violent inflammation followed, which caused the young man's death in forty-eight hours.

As if to make more bitter the cup which the father had to drink, if that could add to the bitterness of such a cup, when Ardelle was brought home, she had in her possession a regularly signed and witnessed certificate of marriage. She was the wife of Bertrand!

With a weakened frame, shattered nerves and strength of character all gone, Mrs. Melville sunk down under this terrible visitation, and for a time exhibited the most fearful indications of approaching imbecility, thus making the burdens of her husband still more heavy to bear.

Two or three days after the occurrence of the sad event just detailed, Greaser, the tailor, sat humming a tune at his work, much happier than he was willing to acknowledge himself to be. His oldest son, who had been apprenticed to a jeweler, had become free about two months previous to this time. He had proved a steady, industrious boy, was now a good workman, and had received immediate employment at good wages. This son had just left his shop. He had called in to inform him that his old master, whose health was bad, and who had more business than he could possibly attend to under the circumstances, had offered him a good interest in his shop if he would accept of a partnership, and take the management of the most laborious and active branch of the business off of his hands. Before closing with the offer, he had come to consult with his father on the subject, to whose judgment he still felt willing to defer in a matter of so much interest. The father advised an immediate acceptance of the proposition, and the son had just left for the purpose of doing so.

While Greaser's mind was still elated by the circumstance just mentioned, he received a message from Mr. Melville, by a servant, requesting his attendance. Greaser was fully aware of the distressing events that had thrown a pall of gloom over the family of his wealthy customer, and of the precarious state in which William Melville was lying. His death had not yet been announced.

"How is young Mr. Melville?" he asked of the servant who brought the message.

"Dead," was the brief reply.

"Dead? Poor young man! What a terrible blow it must be to his father!"

"Yes, it almost kills him. But he would have broken his heart anyhow, I am afraid."

"Was he very wild?"

"Yes; he was hardly ever in until after midnight, and then he usually came home in a bad way. It hurt the old gentleman dreadfully, for he always set a good deal of store by William, and calculated on his making a man out of these days. But it is no wonder; he always had his own way and as much money as he wanted, and that, you know, is not very good for a young man. But everybody liked him, for he was kind to all."

A thought of his own boy, just about the age of William Melville, passed through the mind of Greaser, and, for the first time in his life, he felt thankful that he was as he was.

The tailor repaired immediately to the house of Mr. Melville, and was shown by a servant into one of the parlors. He had never before been in a room so splendidly furnished. Large mirrors reflected the light from the chandelier, and the walls were covered with pictures. The appearance of a man in a rich suit, and a woman in a dress of elegant simplicity, occupied by mirror, and the surface of the room was covered with pieces of statuary and other ornaments. Greaser had full time to take a good look at the various items around him. He felt the heat of the room, and pressed his foot over the yielding Turkey carpet, and examined the pictures and statuary, and examined the rich carved furniture with its many curious patterns. From surprise and wonder, his feelings gradually changed. He forgot the object for which he had been summoned. Envy of the rich man filled his whole mind, and he was angry against the Providence that had made him a poor tailor and Melville a "rich nabob." This feeling had nearly reached its height, when a servant came in and asked him to step up stairs. The silent tread of the servant as he stepped with him into the hall, the death-like stillness that reigned around, coming as it did upon his immediate recollection that this was the house of mourning, dispelled his envious and murmuring thoughts, and prepared him to come with better feelings into the presence of the stricken-hearted father.

The room into which he was shown was so darkened, that at first he could see objects but indistinctly. Mr. Melville came forward with a slow step, and spoke to the tailor in a voice so changed and mournful, that it caused the tears to spring to his eyes. A low moan, followed by a few quick sobs, gradually sinking away until lost in silence, directed Greaser's eyes to a large cushioned chair that the darkness at first prevented his seeing. It needed no one to tell him that these sounds of grief came from the mother of William Melville.

"We have had a terrible affliction, Mr. Greaser," said Mr. Melville, after a pause. "And sometimes it seems as if we could not bear up. But we must look for strength to Him who has sent the trial, and will enable us to endure it."

The quivering voice and lip, the bowed head and air of deep humiliation and distress, touched the feelings of Greaser. He did not venture to make any reply. In a little while, Mr. Melville, recovering himself so as to be able to speak without visible emotion, gave the tailor a few directions about mourning garments for himself and younger sons, and then Greaser withdrew.

"I would not exchange places with that man," said the tailor, as he gained the street and was able to breathe more freely. "For all the wealth he possesses, were it doubled a hundred times."

But of this mind the envious and discontented man did not long remain. To be rich and have nothing comparatively to do, seemed to him to confer all the means of happiness. He could not comprehend how enlarged possessions brought corresponding wants, and as a natural consequence, disappointment in a like ratio; nor how attendant upon wealth were dangers and temptations from which the poor man was freed. He felt the want of money as an evil, and therefore considered the possession of it as the greatest good.

But, even with all his discontent and envy, Greaser was and always had been a happier man than Mr. Melville. And so may every poor man be happier than his rich neighbor if he will be industrious and frugal in his expenditures, and more especially if he will cultivate a spirit of contentment with his lot. Riches themselves never bring happiness. The rich have cares and troubles as well as the poor, and they are usually of a more harassing and heart-aching kind. They stand higher, and when stricken down by affliction, fall to the earth with a heavier concussion.

Let every man strive to better his condition; let every man get rich if he can, but let none be guilty of the folly of imagining that because another is wealthier than he, that he is a happier man, for, in nine cases in ten, if he could see into his heart, the sight would awaken in his own bosom the liveliest feelings of commiseration.

CHOOSING A WIFE.

BY A LADY.

I had a cousin, a charming girl. She could dance gracefully, draw beautifully, and play divinely. She was a most delightful companion, being both sensible and witty, and she could also perform any sort of household work. The latter she was compelled to do, for there was a large family of six. My aunt being unable to keep more than one servant, and my cousin Ellen being the eldest, a good deal of labor fell to her share. She did not mind it, always performing it cheerfully and well, only taking care that it should not be known among her acquaintances, fearing, if it were, that she would lose the respect and consideration her superior address and accomplishments every where insure her; and as she was at times self-respect to betray any confusion, Gracefully apologizing for her dishabille, which, by the way was most becoming, she entered easily into conversation, and thus completed the conquest of the heart of poor Philip.

Six months after this incident Philip and Ellen pronounced their vows at Ilymen's shrine, and I never heard that either of them had found cause to repent.

Now, let young ladies be sure that Philip is not alone in a dislike to fine wives. It is a feeling shared by the greater number of his sex indeed, by all the sensible portion. As long as the girls study to excel in the lighter acquirements of female education, neglecting, nay, despising, the useful and essential let them not wonder at the larger portion of young men remaining unmarried. How can a man of any forethought but shrink at connecting himself with a woman who is ignorant of the commonest duties of wife or mistress? Blind indeed must love have rendered him who would take to his bosom a being whose chief recommendations are, that she can play and sing, dance the polka, and entertain company; and this is the gross amount of requisites many candidates for matrimonial honors can command.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1881.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer of about the first of Nov. last contained a letter dated Mackinac, Oct. 26th, 1880, and signed Plain Dealer, Jr., giving a pretended but grossly erroneous account of the efforts to save the steamer Patchin, after which was the following:

"We had occasion on account of the wind to run into Beaver Harbor, where is situated the city of Nauvoo. On going ashore I learned that a great row had taken place, and that Adams, the prophet's or king's adviser, had to flee for his life. Adams had a warrant issued, and James J. Strang, the prophet, was arrested. Adams says he can't help going to State prison, and that he will expose the whole concern; that such wickedness shall not be carried on any longer. Several have to guard their dwellings with muskets, for fear the prophet and his subjects will come on them in the night and slay them, as he threatened to do so in the church about two weeks ago."

"Any one," said he, "who dares to disobey my laws, shall leave the Island without a boat, or be a head shorter if he stays." His laws, he says, are given to him by God, and that they are supreme; that the laws of the United States are of no account if they conflict with his "higher law." He practices upon these principles, and takes from the "Gentiles," as he calls all such as do not acknowledge his faith, whatever his wants may demand. A few nights since his party entered a Gentile's store and took away fourteen barrels of pork, and Mr. Gentile could not help himself. Another Gentile had his property burned, owing to the violation of the "higher law," but the prophet told him this event had been revealed to him, and he knew the fiery judgment of the Lord was to come upon him. It appears the difficulty arose from a revelation to Strang, that a certain woman was to be his spiritual wife; but the consent of all parties could not be obtained, and consequently this "anointed of the Lord" waxed wrath. Strang's private secretary is ascertained to be Charles Douglass, and he has lately become enamored of a young lady here not wholly unknown abroad, whose real name is Almira Field.

Adams left, taking with him the theatrical curtains and fixtures from the church, and gone to Mackinac, where he is going to play "tragedy."

"Mackinac, Oct. 27."

"Great excitement here this morning. Strang has been brought here under arrest, and is to be tried at half past 10 o'clock. Won't the cross examination of the witnesses be rich? The boat for Cleveland is just leaving. I will send you the particulars in my next."

Yours, as ever,

PLAIN DEALER, JR.

"P. S.—Boat not left yet. Trial just over. Strang sentenced to six months imprisonment in the county jail. A rescue by the Mormons will be attempted—no use. More anon."

P. D., Jr.

A greater piece of folly and falsehood was never put together. That any body should be found to write such an article, can be believed only because it has occurred, and for any one outside of a madhouse to believe it is as improbable as the coming of white crows or good devils.

If it was really true that "Strang takes from the Gentiles whatever his wants demand—that he entered a Gentile's store and took away fourteen barrels of pork, and Mr. Gentile could not help himself," then indeed Mormons are doing as they were done by in Illinois and Missouri, and Gentiles are in as sad a condition as Mormons were there. But if Mr. Gentile could not help himself, how was it so easy for Mr. Adams to have the prophet arrested?

Even in the most indifferent things, and where the truth would have served him quite as well, Mr. Plain Dealer, Jr., has chosen lies. He did not go to Beaver Harbor on account of the wind, but for most of the 175 or 200 men who worked the pumps on the Patchin.

If there has ever been a Gentile's store broken open on the Island, and pork or anything else whatever taken from it, we have never yet heard of it. If it was ever done, Mr. Gentile had some name, and those who tell the truth about it will tell who he is. It is liars who say some body.—How does it happen that one Gentile had had his property burned; another his store broken open and fourteen barrels of pork taken away, Strang had a revelation that a certain woman should be his spiritual, and been in the regular habit of taking what his wants demanded of the Gentiles generally, and not one of the injured has a name, nor of the injuries a date? Bah! The man who could believe such assertions, is in want of a camisole.

One Paddy O'Malley, from Mackinac, broke open the store of Franklin Johnson & Co., Mormons, a few days previous to Plain Dealer, Jr.'s writing, and carried off a quantity of merchandise, which has since been recovered. And early last spring some persons unknown broke open a warehouse, also belonging to a Mormon, and took from it some twenty barrels of provisions, which was afterwards found buried in the sand at the front door of the house of Mr. Kauffman, also a Gentile. Whoever did the work, certain it is that the property went from the Mormons to the Gentiles. Equally certain it is that the criminals have not been discovered. But the opinion strongly prevails in this region that three men now in Mackinac know as much about the theft as anybody else, and that one of them sold out his compeers by taking the $50 reward (and no questions asked) for disclosing where he had hid it.

We can see no importance in the discovery that Strang's private secretary is Mr. Charles Douglass. What has Mr. Douglass ever done that Strang should not appoint him secretary? And whose business is it if he is enamored of Almira Field? Who has a better right? Do tell us, Mr. Plain Dealer, Jr., what is the importance of all this? Are you really sure you have found the mare's nest?

But, says Plain Dealer, Jr., "Strang has been brought here under arrest." A lie, every word. Mr. Plain Dealer, Jr., knows that Mr. Strang was in Mackinac, boarding at the same house and eating at the same table with himself five days previous to his arrest, and was arrested in Mackinac, and not brought there.

And this precocious mass of lies winds up with the assertion that "a rescue (of the prophet) will be attempted by the Mormons." Psha! there were not five Mormons in Mackinac. And Strang, whom he represents as a hitherto bold and successful leader, has gone voluntarily from the fastnesses of Beaver Islands, where a thousand men could not hunt him, and delivered himself up at Mackinac, just to send back for his friends to rescue him! The man that can tell such a tale is on the road to State prison, and he who could believe it is not safe outside of a lunatic asylum. No one will be surprised that such a writer should tell, without one word of disapprobation, that Mr. Adams had succeeded in stealing three or four hundred dollars worth of "fixtures from the church," and though a little perjury was committed in aid of the theft, Mr. Plain Dealer, Jr., doubtless thinks it all quite right, as against the Mormons.

As for Strang's laws, by whatever authority they are given, they are very useful for such men as Mr. Plain Dealer, Jr., and if he will walk up within the dominion of the "Mormon King" we will assure him a good horse whipping, administered according to Mormon law, in the presence of a multitude of witnesses.

NEW YEARS DAY.

"Wish you 'happy New Year' is on every lip, and the smile of joy and gladness responds to the voice. If sport, play, amusement, feasting and dancing make happiness, happiness is in store for one day. Horses, ponies, dogs and oxen are moving in every direction, with their sleigh loads of beaux and belles; pedestrians are pouring out by all the pathways, and all is life and animation. Let us take a tramp.

Well here goes. The "King of the Mormon Isles" is holding Gymnastic sports upon the ice of Fonte Lake, near Johnson's villa. Let's go to that and see what royalty is doing.

THE SHOOTING MATCH.

After two hours irregular shooting, "The King" measured off forty rods, and set up a target. Diplomats were offered to the best shots, and the trial commenced. It was the first game of the kind on the Island, and there are very few guns here. Nevertheless the contest was spirited. Thirty-three shots were made. Several quite missed the target, but the best would have killed squirrels or pigeons at that distance. J. L. Miller made the best, Smith Campbell the second, and Ebenezer Page the third.

ROWS AND ARROWS.

After the rifle shooting a contest came off with bow and arrow. This "King" is required to do, by the law of Moses. No great skill was shown, either in the construction or use of the bow. Indeed the attempt was but very partially successful. But there was a spirit shown in it which will again make good the old saw—

"The white faith of History cannot show That a'er a musket beat a bow."

Asa C. B. Field made the longest and Lewis F. Hadley the closest shot. The boys tried their hand, and Wm. Mark Clark made the best shot.

FEAST.

From thence we followed "royalty" to a public dinner, given to the poor, by "Prince Joseph Ketchum" and his neighbors, at what he calls St. James Castle. We have agreed that the place shall hereafter be called Jephthah Castle. But of the feast. From old age to childhood all were there, all was sociality and joyousness. Three or four houses were filled to overflowing, and all overflowed with merriment and good cheer. We think not less than two hundred sat down in successive crowds at the well loaded tables, and large amounts of food were distributed to the poor. After feasting, dancing followed till near midnight. According to the Prophet, old men and maidens, deposed together, and as the Psalmist says, all the saints praised God in the dance.

GRAND FANCY DRESS BALL.

New Years Eve, in the far off wilderness, upon an Island that 99 in 100 in the country never heard of; where a few months since was an unbroken wilderness, and at a Fancy Dress Ball. Yes, and assembled in a vast Saloon of beautiful finish, with paintings, mirrors and drapery of evergreen, such as the haughty burghers of the old settlements might envy. And beaux and belles, parents and children; old and young, all assembled together, where else can you find so joyous a company? Sure we Mormons know how to make the most of our possessions, and to be happy in spite of our enemies.

Well, this array of dresses. Oh how we wish some we wot of were near enough at hand to peak in. There is a gigantic form, 6 feet 2, powerful and active, armed to the teeth with pistols, revolvers and knives, as perfect a bandit as ever emptied a purse or cut a throat. Yes, and whatever he might do at a large job, he seems not to want skill at a small one. See he has a dozen handkerchiefs in his pocket, all borrowed without asking, & nobody has missed one. What would come of it if O'Malley should see him. We should have another posse called out, surely.

And here is another equally gay and fantastic in his dress; but what he is, or wherefrom is more than we can say. He looks like a semi-civilized Inquisito Indian, tricked out for the sacrifice of the white dog. The rich brilliant colored cloth, covered with beads, broaches and embroidery of porcupine quills, is a curious mixture of the savage and the civilized. A Highland chief and the French Col. Demas attracted general attention. Several Ladies appeared in beautiful fancy dresses, but among them all nothing could match the Yankee Miller, turned witch, and tricked out with fancy from her show box in witches' glee. And then to see her dance with the Judge. And he has doffed the ermine for epaulettes, and is as polite as an American after battle among the seigniorities of Mexico.

The equal in brilliancy may be found amid brick walls sometimes, but the joyousness never. That is reserved for the forest and the wild wood, where envy gives place to the pleasures of social intercourse, and old and young congregate to be happy.

The impossibility of crossing St. James' Channel prevented the presence of the Indians from Garden Island. With them, and a few friends from Mackinac, we should have been perfectly contented.

LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The hum of busy industry and the march of improvement continue here as active as in summer. Houses are not springing up by magic, but are being built up in different places. Large quantities of timber are accumulating in front of F. Johnson and Co's store, for an extensive spring pier which is being erected there. Wood is coming forward in considerable quantities for the spring trade.

A good road has just been opened from the harbor past Fonte Lake to the Hills. At this writing a portion of the "Standing Army of the Mormon King," consisting of a Surveyor and twelve men, are opening a road the whole length of the Island, passing through Enoch and Silo, and terminating at Cable's landing. This company are fitted out as regular campaigners, each man having his knapsack and blanket, and armed with an axe. They eschew tents and despise houses, and altogether are a formidable looking body of men; a force that trees cannot stand against, and swamps cannot deter.

Besides this body there is a kind of reserved corps, consisting of various numbers, bridging the swamps and finishing up the work. They have completed the Enoch swamp, and will in a short time finish that at Silo. Part of this corps are not regulars, but mercenaries impressed by his Mormon Majesty. How the State of Michigan will stand this work we are unable to say; but certain it is that the "King of the Mormon Isles" is enforcing the statutes for the construction and improvement of Highways, on Merchants and Fishermen who have heretofore in such matters, been to good quizzens to work or pay. Perhaps some of them will try to have him arrested and imprisoned for making them pay Highway taxes. But before they can possibly accomplish it he will have at least 25 miles of good new road, made through the forest; and most of it at their expense. What a misfortune it is to some that the "King" knows the law and likes to see people walk up to it. Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's say we. The good citizens of Michigan must obey the laws; and if they are unwilling, his Mormon Majesty will be sure to spur them on. We expect to see two or three elegant school houses springing up in a short time. Capitalists will of course be glad to contribute their share; for the diffusion of intelligence eradicates vice and makes property safe. We shall see.

O'MALLEY'S WAR.

Early in December we had the honor of a visit from Sheriff O'Malley. What business he had nobody knew, nor did any one seem to particularly care, except such as had valuable exposed to nocturnal depredations. After a few days spent in keeping himself out of sight, he left for Mackinac in an open boat. And, reader, what story do you think he told on his return? Guess forty times and you cannot hit it.

Well, he said the Mormons had garrisoned the Steamer Lexington, and mounted it with two heavy field pieces, and that the "King of the Mormon Isles" had a guard or "standing army" of 70 men, constantly under arms, and ready for action; and that by that means he had been prevented from serving legal process.

On these allegations he demanded the aid of the U. S. force in Mackinac in his war against the Mormon King; a demand which we hardly need say was not acceded to. His next move was to raise the posse committatus. He chartered a vessel and made a call for fighting men. How many volunteered we are unable to say. They never got here, the good sense of Mackinac laughed down the undertaking, and just in the midst of it, the Dolphin, with INQUIRER. I have heard that your Elders when they have baptized a person lay their hands on them, invoking upon them the Holy Ghost. Do you think God will bestow the Holy Ghost through the laying on of hands, now a-days?

HERALD. You have heard truly. The laying on of hands for confirmation was practiced by the Apostles. It is an ordinance that belongs to the church of God as much as baptism or the sacraments, and was given to be exercised by the superior or Melchisedec priesthood. That authority being restored to build up the church of Christ in this generation, from its ministrations comes the blessings of Christ, through the Holy Ghost, upon his church.

I. May I not receive the Holy Ghost without the laying on of hands, seeing it is in the world convincing the world of sin, and lighting every man through the world that cometh into it.

Holy Ghost, he said he would send "the spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, ne'ther knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." This spirit was to dwell in the disciples, and through them God would reprove the world of their sins, teach them concerning righteousness, of their wickedness in judging Christ, and show them of a judgment to come.

I. What proof do you bring that a man must have a spiritual gift to be a member of Christ's church?

H. Paul says, 1 Cor. xii. 7, "the manifestation of the spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the spirit, the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge, by the same spirit; to another faith, by the same spirit; to another the gifts of healing, by the same spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues." 27th verse.—"Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."—(Please turn and read the whole chapter.) Christ also places a difference between believers and unbelievers when he says, Mark xvi. 17, "and these signs shall follow them that believe," and enumerates certain signs. Proofs are plenty, and not wanting to confirm the idea that a man must possess a spiritual gift to be a member of Christ's church.

I. So I see. But if I believe and confess Christ with my lips, will I not be saved?

H. That depends upon what you believe, and how you confess Christ. We read that the devils believe and tremble, and also that they confessed that they knew him, therefore Christ suffered them not to speak. If you believe in Christ with all your heart, confess him through all his laws, and through faith endure a member of his church to the end you will be saved; for his church is "the ground and pillar of the truth."

I. Well, I don't see as spiritual gifts would do any harm, and have often thought there was a lack somewhere in the churches; but I never was taught that they were necessary or to be expected any more in the church, neither that they came through ministerial authority, I think I will speak to our ministers to lay on hands and confirm the churches.

II. So you may, and they may confirm till doomsday without any effect, except they repent, obey the gospel and are ordained by proper authority to enable them to do so; "for as it is with the people, so it is with the priest."

I. At all events I will look into this matter a little more, though you almost scare me. Do you really mean to be understood that all the ministers of the various denominations of christians, except Mormons, have no real authority to administer baptism, confirmation, or the sacraments? &c.

H. Yes, I mean to be understood so. "They have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinances and broken the everlasting covenant." How do you think men became vested with authority to minister in the Lord's house?

I. I suppose Christ ordained the Apostles, and they ordained others.

H. Truly. But how does that affect the ordination of your ministers?

I. Christ said, "go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Is not that good authority?

H. That is good instruction to all Christ's ministers. But this was not the ordination, but a part of the mission given under the ordination; they were ordained before, and now Christ charges them with their mission, and sends them to the world.

I. God has given us the Bible, and I can't see why that is not good authority, when that says go teach, baptize, &c.

H. Our State is governed by laws, some of those laws are very old, having been handed down from generations past. Now suppose John Lee is appointed as a Judge in our Judicial District, and commissioned of the Governor of the State to administer those laws, does his commission invest his heir James Lee, or any other person, with judicial authority?

I. Certainly not. I understand you now, every minister must have a commission for himself. But did not those have a sufficient commission whom the Apostles ordained?

H. Yes, they had sufficient authority, because they were called and ordained according to the laws of God. But those laws differ very much from the laws of men. Paul says, Heb. v. 4, "no man taketh this honor unto himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." Now Aaron was called, consecrated and set apart to the ministry by Moses, the prophet, who acted as he was moved by the Holy Ghost. We learn from the 13th chapt. of Acts how Paul was ordained:—"Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers." 2d verse: "As they ministered to the Lord and fasted the Holy Ghost said, separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away." Now we will see how Paul ordained Timothy: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of hands of the presbytery, (Elders.).—Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands." From these texts and similar ones we learn that men were called to the ministry by the spirit of prophecy and revelation, and ordained by the power of the Holy Ghost.—The churches having lost the spiritual gifts, have lost the members of Christ; and having lost the members, have lost the body for "if one member suffer, all suffer with it," and the body is composed of its members.

I. If there was no legal priesthood in the world, where did you get yours?

H. We got it from heaven.—

God spoke to Joseph Smith, Jr., and gave him commands by which he became inspired. He sent unto him his holy messengers also, by whom he ordained him to the holy priesthood, and instructed him to ordain others. They have gone forth preaching, men have believed, been baptized and received the Holy Ghost. Truly, the Father hath given us the kingdom, and shown forth his own works in it. S. P.

EMPHASISING WORDS.—There is a good story on the subject of emphasis. "Boy," said a visitor at the house of his friend, to his little son, "step over the way and see how old Mrs. Brown is." The boy did his errand, and on his return reported that she did not know how old she was; and that he might find out by his own learning.

PHILOSOPHY OF HEAT.—“Well, my little fellow,” said a certain principal to a juvenile philosopher whose mamma had been teasing the learned knight to test the astonishing abilities of her boy,—“what are the properties of heat.” “The chief property of heat is that it expands bodies, while cold contracts them.” “Very good indeed—can you give me a familiar example?” “Yes, sir; in summer, when it is hot, the day is long; while in winter, when it is cold, it becomes short.” The learned knight stopped his examination and was lost in amazement that so familiar an instance should so long have escaped his own observation.—English Paper.

A HINT TO GO.—"Zeb," said a chap to his chum the other day, "it seems to me you didn't stay long at Squire Folger's last night?"

"No," was the reply; "I was sayin' some pleasant things to the daughter, and the old man came in and gave me a hint to go."

"A hint Zeb—what sort of a hint?"

"Why, he gave me my hat," opened the door, and just as he began to raise his heavy boot, I had a thought that I wasn't wanted, and so I—I—I took my leave.

"Did you ever know me to do so when I was a boy?"

Come up to the Isle, to the land that is blest,
 As a home for the weary, where they can have rest
 From oppression, from strife, and a myriad of woes,
 That Satan broadcast in old Babylon sows.
 'Tis to us like a rock shade, on Arabia's sands,
 Where the fainting, the famishing from many far lands
 Will gather together, and here dwell secure,
 In the Zion of God, for his promise is sure.
 'Then come to our Isle, from the climes of the east;
 Come ye poor and oppress'd, on God's bound-ies to feast:
 From the land of the pilgrims, and Europe's far shore,
 Come dwell in our Isle till the scourge has passed o'er,
 And come from the south, leave the tropics
 palm shade,
 The barren sand heath, and the dark overglade;
 Come and cool your parched brows in the pure healthy breeze
 That refreshes our home, in this gem of the seas.
 Come, come, from the west, from each forest and dell;
 From the parched and Salt Vallies, Oh come here to dwell:
 From far Eldorado, its riches untold,
 Where are treasures more precious than mountains of gold.
 Come here from the north land, bleak shrouded in snows,
 Its chill winds, its icebergs and Siberian woes;
 From Russia, from Sweden and Iceland, Oh come,
 As a bird to its nest, to our loved Island home.
 Come up, Oh ye saints, altho' scattered afar,
 And truth will shine forth as a bright morning star;
 And blest Zion redeemed, will hasten the day,
 When sorrow and sighing will flee far away.
 Come up, and wait not till the day does arrive That God in his wrath with the nations will strive;
 Then the armies of God will hem up your way,
 And the night will be dark when you've wasted the day.
 Come up, for the end of the kingdoms is near,
 The hearts of the strong men are palsied with fear;
 And Babylon's wise men and priests cry alas!
 'They know not the things that are coming to pass.
 Come up, soon we'll rear both the Temple and Tower,
 The emblem of glory, and cornucopia of power;

Bakewell estimates the average amount of salt in the ocean at two and a half per cent. From computations based upon the amount of tides, it is highly probable that the Atlantic and Pacific oceans are in their central parts not less than nine or ten miles in depth. Were we to place the average depth of the ocean at five miles, it would doubtless be a moderate estimate. In superficial extent it covers full three-fifths of the earth's surface. Assuming, then, five miles as the average depth of the ocean, and two and a half per cent, as the average amount of salt contained in it, were the waters entirely evaporated, the saline residue would form a stratum of salt more than four hundred feet in thickness, covering three-fifths of the surface of the globe. If, then, this mass of salt were evenly spread over the entire amount of land on the earth's surface, it would cover it to the depth of seven hundred and fifty feet. But no more than one-fifth of the earth's surface is habitable. Were, then, the salt contained in the ocean spread over all the habitable parts of the globe, it would cover them to the depth of fifteen hundred feet, or something more than a quarter of a mile.—Ec.

EBEN HARRIS.

THE FISHERMAN OF THE UPPER LAKES.

[WRITTEN FOR THE ISLANDER.]

CHAPTER I.

INFANCY OF EB. HARRIS.

Eb. Harris is a fisherman. But in writing his history I shall begin where all histories begin, "in the beginning." The sacred scriptures, Knickerbocker's history of New York, and a score of Indian traditional legends begin with the cosmogony of the earth. Why not begin Eben Harris's story with his beginning, when he was no fisherman.

I have heard that his name was written in the old family Bible "Ebenezzer." But I doubt the saying, and am not at all sure there was any family Bible in the case. Eben was his name, and Eb. is his nickname beyond all question, and I shall call him by either, as chance may dictate.

Eb. first saw the light in a log house, near the top of a high hill on the stage road just west of Elliptoville, in the State of New York. Of his early days I know very little. In infancy, as is the case with most children, he was the continual sport of the passions, both kind and unkind, of everybody around him. If his mother was in good humor she petted him, and taught him mischief. If in an ill humor she eased herself of the weight of her wrath by laying a heavy hand on him. Wasting days were hard days with poor Eb. If he got tired of lying in the cradle without turning, or cried for hunger, he was rewarded with a beating. And when his affectionate mother had finished her day's work, and took up her suffering infant, if by any means his strength held out for a few remaining sobs, she sweetened his temper by saying, "Susan is naughty—she 'buses the baby." By this means he was early taught to vent his spleen upon some one as often as he felt in any way uncomfortable.

When at leisure and disposed to amuse the infant, father, mother, sister and neighbors were wont to show their kindness to little Eb. by trotting and teasing him, and teaching him all manner of mischief. Like most mothers, Mrs. Harris was perfectly sure that her little Eb. would know better than to do such things when he got larger. And Mr. Harris had not the slightest idea that he was laying the foundation of future disobedience, when he set his son to bite his mother, and strike his father in the face, only in sport.

CHAPTER II.

CHILDHOOD.

As might be expected from his early training, Eb. was a vicious boy. If crossed in any thing, he seized knife, club or whatever came in his way to punish the aggressor. The boys hated, and feared him. His mother scolded him from morning till night, and after he went to bed whipped him to make him go to sleep, instead of whistling and singing, wondering the while what made him so mischievous. His father endeavored by severity and frequent flogging to cure him of his evil propensities. He only raised a belligerent spirit. The boy was as obstinate as the parent was severe. Eb. was universally hated.

The world had never done him one kind act, and the debt of gratitude he owed for drubbings and instruction in mischief he paid with interest. His mother had taught him as he drew her milk to as often as anything went awry with him, accuse somebody of the fault, upon whom she indicted mock chastisement to please him. As he grew up he did not know better than to do as she had taught him. If no other one fell in his way he took vengeance on her for each miscarriage in his undertakings, and did not hesitate to slam the door or tip over the kettle in which she was cooking, and which for want of either crane or trammel set upon the forestock of the log fire. The beatings that he got from his father were repaid with interest upon the oxen, cows and dogs, and the asperity of temper thus engendered was visited upon whatever boys happened to offend him. Everybody in the neighborhood wondered what gave Eb. so bad a temper.

CHAPTER III.

FIRST INTERVIEW.

In the autumn of 1836 I was visiting the country about Elliptoville, and while there heard mention of "Rock City" as a great natural curiosity. It is situated in the hills six or seven miles west of Elliptoville, and three miles south of the stage road. After ascertaining this fact I took the stage road to the point nearest the city. Here, inquiring for a guide, who should I find but Eb. Harris? Our party consisted of myself and a friend, each accompanied by a lady. Calling at the house of Mr. Harris to inquire our route, we learned there was only a path, scarcely passable by horses, and utterly impassable with carriages, and so blind that few persons in the neighborhood could trace it. Our Eb. said Mrs. Harris could show you the way, if he could, but he is so mischievous there is no trust in him.

The boy stood by to hear his mother's good opinion of him, and ready, in spite of her so undesirable a commendation, to prove himself entirely deserving of it. He knew no other guide was at hand, and turned sulkily away, determined to stand out obstinately till he was offered two prices for going, and then to go wrong, and keep us till dark without finding "Rock City." In answer to his mother's direction to guide us, he declared his determination to mislead us. One of the ladies replied pleasantly, Oh, no, young man, you would not mislead us—we have plenty of fruit and nice things to eat, and you shall share it with us. And besides paying you well, we will make you a nice present. He looked bewildered, and made no further objection. It was the first kind word he had received for many years.

As we started his mother threatened him with chastisement if he lost the way, or failed of returning in proper season; and he, with a scowl on his brow, muttered between his teeth, that if she was along he would lead her where she would never get back. He had more affection for a total stranger, who had given him one kind look, than for the mother that bore him. This was my first introduction to Eb. Harris.

He was not above twelve years of age. In his general appearance he was sullen, stolid and dissatisfied. His parents were well persuaded that they had done all in their power to reform him. They had whipped him every day, and scolded him continually for his faults. He had never passed a day in school without a flogging, and averaged three a day. What could they do more?—Alas! the child had not one fault but his parents had taught him, and neighbors and teachers had confirmed. He was in their hands as clay in the hands of the potter. They, not he, had moulded him a vessel of dishonor.

Eb. started to guide us to Rock City. The lady who had gained his confidence by a few kind words, remarked to me, "that is a hard used boy. See, he is a mere child, yet his passions are stamped on his features as with an age of struggle with his kind. How bitterly he hates."

Endeavoring to draw him into conversation, she found him mute and taciturn—fearful that some advantage would be taken of him. He could not realize that any one really meant him well, and seemed to be possessed of a continual fear of being punished or injured. When any of us came near him he looked concernedly, and as I raised my hand I observed that he scribbled as if I was about to strike him.

His lady friend gave him a beautiful printed handkerchief, which he seemed afraid to take, and said his mother would take it from him and accuse him of stealing it. But when I offered him a pocket knife he took it readily, and said, Dad would not get that from him—he would throw it away first. Poor child, said the lady. He fears being robbed by his parents. It will be strange if he does not rob them by and by. By the time we reached the city he had become quite communicative, and seemed fully attached to us. He was attentive and anxious to please us, and wore an air of cheerfulness. Such is the power of kindness.

Men, as well as children, are what we make them. More than that—they are oftenest what we name them. Continually tell a boy he does nothing right, and he will continually do wrong. If you expect no good, you will seldom be disappointed.

CHAPTER IV.

ROCK CITY—THE LEAP.

After an hours hard travel we reached Rock City, and though the city itself has nothing to do with the history or character of Eben, we shall describe it. It consists of a hill of sand stone, mixed with small quartz pebbles, say three-fourths of a mile wide, and three miles long, rising two or three hundred feet from its base, and cut up by vast crevices like streets, dividing it into irregular blocks, like the city of Boston. These crevices are of irregular breadth, varying from narrow lanes to streets of three and four rods in width, and the squares or blocks in the place of houses rise in solid masses of rock from ten to ninety feet in height.

The beds of the streets are made up of fallen sand stone and quartz, and forming a tolerably regular pavement, and had for the want of windows in the walls of rock one could scarcely divest himself of the idea that he was wandering over the deserted remains of some vast metropolis.

While there, with difficulty we clambered up one of the rocks to a corner where it was not above sixteen feet high, and took our dinner. Eb. evidently suspected us of some design upon him, when we asked him to eat with us. But when he once began it seemed as if he would never stop. Had we expected to want another meal in the woods we should have sorely repented giving him an unstinted dinner. He had been kept regularly howled out—never fed quite enough, and therefore always hungry; and eating much more than it hurt him.

As he got up looking like a stuffed turkey, my companion offered him fifty cents to jump over the crevice or "street" to the next rock. He had no other design than to pick upon him for being so tall he could not jump. But the boy's suspicions had for once been lulled. We had none of us misused him, and really believing the offer was made in earnest, and for the pleasure of witnessing the leap, proud of his new happiness and of the power, never before enjoyed, of communicating pleasure to others, he started off to make the leap. At the narrowest place the crevice was twelve feet wide, and there it was 90 feet deep! Before we had opportunity to see the danger of the act, he had made the leap. He just touched his toes on the farther brow. For a moment he seemed falling. For a half minute of motionless agony we held our breath as he remained balanced, neither rising up nor falling back. He but kept his place where the weight of a feather would have cast his body upon the rocks ninety feet below.

CHAPTER V.

THE SUBURB—THE RETURN.

After wandering about till the eye tired in gazing at this strange freak of nature, we left the streets of the mimic city for a suburb part of the way down the hill to the southwest. This we had never heard of. But Eben, in the exuberant flow of goodness at the first kindness he had ever received, informed us of its whereabouts, and proposed to lead us to it, saying, with a glee that really set awkwardly upon a face so unused to it, "I can show you where it is just as well as not, and shan't ask you nothing for goen."

Eben described this suburb merely by saying, "there were rocks as big as hay stacks piled up on the top of larger rocks, and he could move them." As we approached the place what should we find but a rock as large as a common farm barn, and shaped like a common bowl inverted, and upon the top of it another of similar shape, but quite as large as a very large hay stack, with the small part or bottom of the bowl down. The appearance was that of an enormous great bowl, big enough for a nation to drink from, and a smaller one setting upon it. But, strange as it may seem, the upper one served as a gigantic vase for plants. For the top of it was covered with earth, out of which grew four trees, from three to seven inches in diameter, and the largest probably fifty feet high. A tree had been fallen from the up hill side against the top of the rock, up which Eb. clambered and exhibited to us the strange fact that his strength alone was sufficient to move the upper rock. The two faces of the rocks, where they met, were not above four feet across, and the joint a very little open, and the rock was so exactly balanced that a trifling effort would topple it either way. Yet I doubt whether the strength of one hundred men would have sufficed to throw it down. In the vicinity were several similar rocks.

So much time was occupied in looking at all these curiosities, that we were late back. Eb. looking for the usual reception hardened his face for hard words, and rounded up his back for blows, saying, he did not care what the old folks said or did, for nobody ever treated him so well before.

This was the last I saw of Eb. till I met him on the fishing grounds, in the summer of 1844.

CHAPTER VI.

In August, 1844, I made my first trip up the lakes. The Islands of Lake Michigan had attracted no attention beyond the notice of a few fishermen, and the wood cutters on the two Manitou Islands. The steamer Madison, on board of which I was, stopped at the North Manitou for wood, and as I was walking over the very indifferent wharf which occupied the place of the present extensive spring pier, to take a look of the Island, I heard a fellow passenger, whom I had not before noticed, (for there were a good 500 aboard,) remark, "well, I've got through without paying anything, and no thanks to any body." Looking around, who should I behold but Eb. Harris. He had barely had time to grow to manhood, but the lines which begin early to mark thought, care and coming age were deep indeed for his time of life, and he would have passed for 28.

Well, said I, this must be my attentive guide to Rock City; but you have nearly outgrown my recollection. Ah, few men, said he, remember one who has no money. I wonder how you happened to recognize me. I did not expect any notice on this boat only the swearing when they find I have stopped and not paid my fare. Let them swear, I have been robbed of a good farm, and I'll have it back when I get a chance. Eb. Harris will show them that he can hoe his own row at the last. I wouldn't take any advantage of you if I could, for you are the first man that ever used me well. But these steamboat folks, they are always taken the advantage of the poor. Them and the lawyers and doctors I hate.

I inquired with some interest the cause of this hatred, and heard a tale of oppression, overreaching and dishonesty, such as caused me to forgive Eb. for being what he was—a hater of his kind.—The tale I shall leave for another chapter. Eb. was an orphan, and destitute, having escaped from his parents to avoid their tyranny, strayed into this wild region till they had both died. He had been back to receive a valuable property, which his father had slaved himself to accumulate for that very son whom he drove from under his roof with severity, but there was nothing for him.

LAW OF TITHING.

Of all the fruit of your fields, and the increase of your flocks, a tenth shall ye render to the House of the Lord your God, and the treasury of the King, that the Priest who administers in holy things, and the servants of the King, who rule in righteousness, may eat bread, and the land yield her increase.

Of all the spoil which ye take from your enemies, a tenth shall ye render to the House of the Lord your God, and the treasury of the King, that he who administers in holy things may remember you before God, and the King's arm may deliver you.

When you labor not in these things, yet one-tenth of your time shall you consecrate to the Lord your God, and shall labor for the House of the Lord your God, and for the treasury of the King, according to your skill and your cunning, and your art, and you shall not withhold that a place for God to dwell among you may not be wanting, and the work of the King may not fail, and that you may possess abundantly fields, flocks and habitations.

And whosoever cometh into the kingdom, a tenth of all he possesses shall he give for the establishment of the kingdom, and for its increase, that he may have an everlasting inheritance therein.—New Translation.

Note 1.—This is the law of the stranger dwelling among you as well as to you.

2.—Whosoever is poor and needy, let him ask of the King and his collector, and the King will remit to him his tithing according to his wants.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1851.

MAILS.

We have not had a mail from any place beyond Mackinac since the close of navigation. In December we sent a mail to Mackinac at the expense of the church. No mail had at that time been received there from any place beyond. After issuing the Jan. No., the prophet, with a boat's crew of four men, started for Mackinac with a mail, but got no further than Hog Island; where, after some days delay, a part of the time destitute of provisions, they returned in the midst of a most fearful tempest, and through fields of ice.—They were seven hours making the home passage, and at times the sea rolled so high that a man sitting in the stern of the boat could look over the top of the foremast into the water.—Making land at Mr. Patrick Sullivan's, they were received with generous hospitality. Very soon the lake froze over in every direction, and we were nearly ready to make the passage on the ice, when, Saturday, Feb. 1st, the ice broke up, and just as we got this No. ready for the press our excellent and accommodating P. M. started off a mail for Mackinac, keeping the matter so secret that not one of the Mormons had opportunity to send a letter, and leaving our January issue behind. Thanks to whom thanks are due. We shall remember them according to their works.

By the way, the present mail arrangements for this region are injudicious. The whole upper portion of Michigan is supplied by means of a dog mail once a month, from Saginaw to Mackinac and Sault Ste Marie, whence it is distributed by such means as the Post Masters can avail themselves of to the various settlements of the upper country. A mail can be carried twice a month from Mackinac, by way of Grand and Petite Traverse to Mackinac and Sault Ste Marie, at no greater expense, making twice the accommodation for the same money, and passing more than a dozen villages and extensive settlements of civilized Indians, lumbermen, &c., who are unprovided. With such a route we could intersect at either Petite Traverse or Cross village at all seasons of the year without delay. The additional revenue that it would bring to the department would warrant making it even a weekly mail during the winter. If this was done, and we allowed a steamboat mail during the summer, we would accommodate all the settlements about the two Traverse Bays, and throughout the fishing regions, by means of sailing packets, which some enterprising citizens of this place will have on those routes next summer.

P. S. The attempt to send off a mail without our issue failed. We are informed that another attempt will be made about the time this paper goes to press.

An effort was made last fall to prevent the Mormons obtaining a supply of provisions for winter, and was carried to the extent of inducing traders to recede from contracts made with persons here to forward them supplies; and in one instance of leaving flour behind which was in store and the transportation contracted for. Nevertheless a sufficient supply was obtained. Yet there seems to be a disposition to excite fear that the Mormons may be reduced by starvation to commit depredations on their neighbors. Men must be hard run for mischief who resort to such means to put it on foot.

We take this occasion to say that the Island is well supplied with food, and there are very few persons who are unable to obtain what they need, at their own expense. For the very few who are unable to provide themselves there is a stock on hand, probably sufficient, and easily replenished if short. Capt. Bryant, of the Prop. St. Joseph, deposited with the prophet two barrels of flour for the supply of poor widows, which has been disposed of only to the really needy in Mr. Strang's usually careful manner, and it is not yet gone. There has not been an hour since the close of navigation that the prophet had less than forty dollars of provisions on hand for gratuitous distribution among the needy, and the contributions so far without any call whatever, public or private, have been more than equal to the demand. Large quantities of salt fish are in store here, which can be had at fair prices, and the wages of labor are high. The winter fishing is good, and wild fowl and small game abundant. There are more than 2,000 bushels of potatoes beyond the estimated wants of the population. Several teams are kept up on grain. The man away from here who fears our starving is merely ignorant, but if any one here suggests the thing he is a scoundrel.

MYSTERY.

It is rumored that the tracks of men and hand sleds have been discovered on the west side of the Island. Considering that hand sleds are much used for transportation by fishers and hunters in all this region, and that parties of them are about daily wherever the ice will admit, it did not strike us as a very alarming fact. But it seems that as soon as it was known at Whiskey Point messengers were dispatched to the head of the Island, and over to Garden. There was a general stir, and even our neighbor Mr. Ward, who has a large quantity of fish on hand, was notified that the Mormons were about to break in and take them off. Mr. Ward did not appear badly alarmed, and we have not heard of any very dangerous demonstration against his fish house.

We do not know how other persons regard these matters, but our opinion is that as there are no Ananias here, the King of the Mormon Isles ought to send out his boys to lay the bee to some of those who are so fond of making mischief and disturbing the nerves of old women in pants. If men are afraid of shadows, make no shadow. Paul says, the tongue is an unruly member, which no man can tame. But it is no where written that twelve men with good beeches cannot tame it. It is an experiment worth trying.

CURIOUS AND CRIMINAL.—Feb. 2nd, early in the morning, Gen. Miller found afloat in an extensive field of ice, a large fish boat, well loaded with household goods, provisions, fishing tackle, &c. It was drifting at the rate of two or three miles an hour to the south westward, and gradually approaching the shore at the head of Big Sand Bay, where it came in shoal water very near land. With considerable difficulty, and the most severe exposure, he succeeded in getting it ashore. After unloading it, and getting a team to haul it out, he went to a cabin a little distance off to thaw and dry his clothes.

While he was absent, several persons from above came and took the boat and all its loading. Gen. Miller very quietly went to a magistrate and took process for the property, and sent Constable Field to bring it away. Field having sometime before met with violent resistance at the same place, took a very respectable posse, and went up. The parties who had taken them off claimed the ownership, made the best apology they could for taking them off by stealth, paid Gen. Miller the very moderate salvage he claimed, and there the matter ended.

But the question yet remains to be answered, "how came the boat afloat?" It appears that the boat was hauled up for winter just above Cable's, and the stuff aboard was left in some shanties in that vicinity. If loaded there and put afloat the course of the wind for two days would have brought it where it was found. But if loaded with honest purposes, the fact would transpire, and if with dishonest, it is at least singular that it should have floated off without the criminals. It must have been afloat at least two days, as considerable snow had fallen in it, and the floating fields of ice rendered it impossible that it should have reached there in less than that time.

A large Yawl, nearly new, has been found on the south-west shore of Hog Island. It is nearly imbedded in the ice, but appears not to have suffered any injury. The Steamer Lexington, when she broke loose from Ice le gale, and made this harbor in the severe tempest the last of Nov., lost a yawl, and this is doubtless the one. In its present position the breaking up of the ice would destroy it. Some gentlemen here talk of going over and cutting it out and hauling it up above high water. If they should, it is doubtful if some of our neighbors did not faint with fear. What a sad thing it is to have lived so wayward a life that one cannot go along the street without looking over his shoulder for the Sheriff, and running from his neighbors for fear of personal chastisement.

PHONOGRAPHY.

This science is making rapid progress, and bids fair to yet become the universal mode of writing and printing the English language. We are in the regular receipt of the "Phonetic Advocate," by which we learn of the rapid accession of converts in favor of the system, in the United States and Great Britain. The Advocate is a beautiful sheet, published weekly, in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the extremely low price of one dollar and fifty cents per year, in advance, containing, besides the current news of the cause to which it is devoted, a weekly price current list, and matters of general news, contained in other journals.

There is now in this place three classes in Phonography under the instruction of Professor L. F. Hadley, making rapid proficiency in the science, and bidding fair to become a rare specimen of the ease and facility by which this science can be brought into practice.

We say to all these who are of the opinion that Phonography is of no material use, just give it a fair trial by attending a course of 12 lessons, (and pay the teacher,) and if you are not convinced of its utility, you will at least have the consciousness of having given it a fair and impartial trial.

MOSES CHASE.

Manufacturer of common and improved Single, Double and Triple Complex, Re-Acting, Galeano, Electro, Magnetic Torpedo Machines, for the Medical Faculty, and the Scientific, Saint James, Beaver Island.

These improved Electro-Magnetic Machines were the only ones for medical purposes to which a premium was awarded by the Franklin Institute, at their seventeenth exhibition of American manufactures, held in the city of Philadelphia, October, 1847. We take the liberty also to state that these machines have been examined and highly approved by some of the most distinguished Professors in the country, such as Professor Henry and Prof. Mather, the latter of whom had recommended them to the students of Jefferson College, Philadelphia. Numerous commendatory notices have been given by the press. We give the following from the Inquirer and Nat. Gazette, Philadelphia, January 22d, 1848:—

"MEDICAL ELECTRO-MAGNETISM.—Mr. Moses Chase, of Baltimore, has invented a machine by which the unpleasant intensity of Electro-Magnetism is removed, even under a full and powerful current of fluid. This is a desideratum long sought for by the Medical Faculty. The improvement consists in softening the current without decreasing its quality. We have seen the machine in operation, and with the most salutary results. The price is moderate, and the plan of operation is quite easy."

From the Baltimore Clipper of May 22d, 1848:—

"CHASE'S PATENT ELECTRO-MAGNETIC MACHINES.—The superiority of these machines over those of ordinary construction is so obvious as not to be mistaken. He has succeeded, by interposing additional conductors, in enabling the patient or other person to receive a much greater charge of Electro-Magnetism than in the common mode—the power being moderated. The machine is of beautiful construction—easily understood and operated—and so arranged that an infant may receive a charge without any disagreeable sensation."

THE DECALOGUE.

Below we give the ten commandments as they are rendered in the new translation, made by the Prophet, from the records which Lohi brought from Jerusalem. The reader will perceive that they answer to the references contained in the good Book far better than the commandments therein contained. Christ, said, the first was, "thou shalt love the Lord thy God," &c., and the second was, "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Yet that is not found with the other commandments in the books of Moses.

Strange as it may seem, it has not been missed by the religious world, and they have been for centuries poring over nine commandments, really believing them were ten.

When the commandments were written upon the tables of stone there were five upon each stone, two and a half upon each side of each table. Yet in the Bible they are so curtailed of their proportions that two of them occupy more space than all the rest. Here they are restored in full. We recommend them to the consideration of all thinking men, and to the faith of all who love truth.

The commandment to love God, &c., is first in importance, and upon it hang the two next commandments, to wit, to reverence the authority of his name, and to keep the Sabbath.

The commandment to love our neighbor is second to it in its importance, and upon it hang all the rest of the commandments. Thus upon these two commandments hang all the law.

I.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy might, and with all thy strength: thou shalt adore him, and serve him, and obey him: thou shalt have no other Gods before thee: thou shalt not make unto thee any image or likeness of anything that is in the heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters of the earth, to bow thyself unto it, or to worship it: thou shalt not bow down thyself unto, nor adore anything that thine eye beholdeth, or that thy imagination conceiveth of, but the Lord thy God only, for the Lord thy God is a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, from generation to generation, even upon all that hate him, and showing a multitude of mercies unto them that keep his commandments.

II.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: thou shalt not usurp dominion as a ruler, for the name of the Lord thy God is great and glorious above all other names: he is above all, and is the only true God; the only just and upright king over all: he alone hath the right to rule, and in his name only he to whom he granteth it: whoever is not chosen of him, the same is an usurper and unholy: the Lord will not hold him guiltless, for he taketh his name in vain.

III.

Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work: thou nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man servant, nor thy woman servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is in thy gates; for in six ages the Lord thy God made the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh age: wherefore the Lord thy God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it: thou shalt keep it holy unto him, that thou forget not the law, nor be found keeping the company of the vile, nor despised by the righteous.

IV.

Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: thou shalt not revile him, nor speak evil of him, nor curse him: thou shalt do no injustice unto him, and thou shalt maintain his right against his enemy: thou shalt not exact rigorously of him, nor turn aside from relieving him: thou shalt deliver him from the snare and the pit, and shalt return his ox when he strayeth: thou shalt comfort him when he mourns, and shalt nurture him when he sickens: thou shalt not abate the price of what thou buyest of him, for his necessity; nor shalt thou exact of him because he leaneth upon thee; for in so doing thousands shall rise up and call thee blessed, and the Lord thy God shall strengthen thee in all the work of thy hand.

V.

Honor thy father and thy mother; give heed to their commandments, obey their laws, and depart not from their precepts: reverence their age, and seek unto their house all the days of thy life: exalt not thyself against them, nor withhold to build up their house above thine own: honor and obey the king and the judges, and the rulers, and all that are set in authority, for they are as fathers among the people, that they may be a fear unto evil doers; and the priest also, who stands before the Lord, that he may instruct thee; and thy days shall be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

VI.

Thou shalt not kill: thou shalt slay no man in malice; neither thy child, nor thy wife, nor thy bond man, nor thy bond woman, nor thy servant, nor the child of thy servant; neither shalt thou slay thine enemy, except thou admonish him, and entreat him, and he hear thee not, and God give him into thy hand: thou

WEATHER TABLE.

We publish below a table of the weather for the months of December, 1850, and January, 1851, including the proportion of clearness, range of thermometer, and course and velocity of the wind, at four periods in each day. The table has been kept with great care, and may be relied on with entire confidence by men of science as perfectly correct. The point of observation is at the Islander office, on the west side of the harbor of Saint James, and in a place altogether open and exposed to wind and storm.

The clearness is expressed in figures on a scale of 10. 0 is entirely clouded over, 5 is an equality of cloud and clear sky, and 10 is a perfect clearness.

The thermometer used is of Bennett's best, manufactured here, and upon Fahrenheit's scale.

The velocity of wind is upon a scale of 10, 1 being the least perceptible breeze, 7 a howling tempest, and 10 the most terrific storm on the lakes.

We bespeak for these tables a careful attention, believing they will show a better and more equable climate at this place than at any place in the United States. The lowest range of the thermometer is 2 below zero, and the highest 44 degrees above. The snow lies on the ground to the depth of one foot, and in the woods eighteen inches, and was six inches deeper previous to the warm weather the past week. The sleighing is excellent. There is very little ice in the lake. Our harbor has not been closed for a week, and only the north part of it has been passable with teams more than one day. The last day of January it was closed, and skaters went as far as Hog Island, but the next day, with scarcely any wind, a heavy tide rolled in from the south and broke it up, and a very light breeze from the west slowly moved it out. There has been no ice as yet south of this Island, and even the narrow shoal straits between here and the north shore are not generally closed.

shalt only slay him in lawful war; and if a man trespass against thee, and break through and do violence, thou shalt not slay him in revenge. If thou overtake him in the trespass, thou mayest resist unto blood; but except thou slay him in the trespass, thou shalt deliver him to the judge; he shall judge him, and the hand of the officer shall be on him.

Thou shalt not commit adultery: thou shalt not in any way lie with the wife of thy neighbor; and if she seduce thee, thou shalt resist her, that thou pollute not thyself, and make not the place of thy house unclean, and destroy not the house of thy neighbor, and that thou cause no violence in the land: thou shalt not lie with the wife of the stranger; neither shalt thou lie with the wife of thine enemy, lest thy children be scattered abroad, and know not thee, nor the fear of thee be upon them, and they be strangers to the covenant of God, and the whole land be corrupt, and thine offspring be destroyed with the wicked.

VIII.

Thou shalt not steal: thou shalt not trespass upon anything that is thy neighbors, to take it from him, nor to destroy it; neither shalt thou trespass upon the stranger that dwelleth within thy gates, to destroy his substance, nor to take it from him; for to thee he looketh for justice, and a shield round about all that he hath, and the fear of the Lord thy God is upon him also, and to his righteousness he also seeketh: neither shall ye overreach them by cunning, nor by stratagem, to take his substance from thy neighbor, nor the stranger within thy gates. Remember that ye were strangers, and were oppressed, and oppress not the stranger, lest his cry ascend to God against you.

IX.

Thou shalt not bear false witness: thou shalt not speak falsely before the king, nor before the judge, nor in the assembly of the princes, nor in the presence of the ruler, nor unto the minister of the law, nor among the multitude, nor in the ear of thy friend, nor to thy wife, nor thy children, nor thy servant: neither shalt thou withhold the truth from the king, nor the judge, nor him that is set in authority; for thus shall righteousness be established in all thy borders.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbors inheritance: thou shalt not covet thy neighbors house, nor his bond man, nor his bond woman, nor his man servant, nor his woman servant, nor his horse, nor his carriage, nor the instruments of his labor, nor the produce of his land, nor the things that he has made, nor the treasures that he has in store, nor anything that is thy neighbors; thy desire shall not be upon them, to take them by stealth, nor by fraud, nor by cunning, nor by violence: neither shalt thou covet that which belongeth to the stranger that dwelleth in thy gates; but thou shalt improve thine own, and thy desire shall be unto it, lest thou be corrupt, and the hand of thy neighbors be against thee, and the cry of the poor ascend to God against thee.

THE BOOK OF MORMON.

Bring forth the records printed of old,
Once more their pages scan;
Once more the oracles unfold,
Knowing their good to man.
O'er inspirations sacred face,
Fair as the noon day sun,
Many a prophecy we trace
Of things we're now among.
Read, read, and understand them well,
Make haste to do God's will:
On, on, with Christ your king to dwell,
Nor turn from Zion's hill:
For he has rear'd a standard there,
O'er all the earth it waves;
Reveal'd his law, his arm made bare,
Each nation for to save.
Vain are the hopes of all who say,
Each year his church will cease;
Rising still fairer every day,
ITS BEAUTIES WILL INCREASE.

When we reflect on the vast amount of opposition this Book has met, and is bound to meet from those who are filled with their own ways, we can but admire the wisdom of God, who so effectually planned all things in regard to bringing forth this Book that not a particle of testimony has been adduced against it which can stand for a moment. The Book of Mormon stands unrivalled; and whatever may be the glory of "the dispensation of the fullness of times," that takes the lead. It is that which has been given of God to try the faith of men, and it does it effectually.

"Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish; for I work a work in your days which you will in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you." This text is very applicable to the work of God in our days, as it exists at present among us. "We are in a land of Eblies," among a praying people—a people who draw near to God with their mouth, and with their lips honor him, but their hearts—. Is there no consolation for those who reject, loathe and despise the Book of Mormon? Oh yes, here it is, they can have this to console them. Not a man of them, priest or people, knows the Book is not true. Let every man who may chance to read this ask his own heart what it knows about the truth of this Book. There can be but two answers—I know nothing about it, or God has borne witness to my soul that it is true.

To those who know nothing about it, let them take the advice of Moroni, page 569, Book of Mormon: "When ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost; and by the power of the Holy Ghost ye may know the truth of all things."

When thousands are rejoicing in the goodness of God, and testifying to his truths, skepticism must surrender, or grovel on in ignorance and shame. "No one ever rightly looked into our religion but what embraced it."—So said an ancient writer, and so say we. "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good, for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." S. P.

THE BEST FAMILY VISITOR.

Among all the visitors which we ever welcomed inside our doors, we hail none with feelings of more lively satisfaction than the newspaper. It is a family visitor which all who wish to store their minds with moral and intellectual improvement, and keep pace with the times, must greet with unfeigned pleasure. But how many there be who have never subscribed for a paper. How many young men growing up to manhood who never gave one dollar for the support of a paper, nor even so much as read one. Ask one of these to subscribe for the paper, I have not got the money to spare, is the reply. But seldom you see such unable to spend monthly enough for frolicking, whiskey, rum and tobacco to pay for a good paper twelve months.

He who does not paper take,
Grudging a dollar once a year,
Will never a good husband make,
And his children will ignorant appear.

How can it be possible that any lady, susceptible of enjoying intellectual happiness, is so depraved that she would prefer a tobacco monger to a newspaper reader?

"Ladies, is this the man for you?
Do you wish for such a beau,
Whose nose is only fit to snuff,
His mouth to smoke and chew?
Spit! spit! spit!
O, 'tis a nasty trick,
Enough to turn any lady fair,
Unless she is able to stomach a bear,
Or a loafer enveloped in whiskers & hair,
Abominably sick."

Another class in which we must rank both the sexes. It is those who cannot get time to read a paper in seven days. These mistaken sons and daughters of pleasure have time to either eat and tumble into bed, or else cling to their bed with unflinching determination until seven in the morning.

"Now is there aught in sleep to charm the wise
To lie in dead oblivion, losing half
The fleeting moments of too short a life,
Wildered & tossed through dumbered dreams?
Who would in such a gloomy state remain?"

Dr. Franklin, whose name we refer to but with feelings of the proudest emotion, with more truth than poetry, says: "Six hours sleep for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool." Now there remains yet another miserable class, deserving of a short notice here, as they are quite a numerous class, rightly named the spongers. It is those who read, but never pay. To them we shall only say—

"He who takes the papers,
And pays not when they are read,
Would sell his corn to buy a horn,
And live upon borrowed bread."

I have now only to say to the reader of this paper, have you not long and impatiently waited for its appearance, since the Herald sloped? Do you realize that its long absence has been for the want of a united support from you, and that many of you are subjects of some of the foregoing puerile excuses? Let them no longer prevail. But let your moral and intellectual propensities prevail over your animal, and cease to any longer worship at the altar of false gods, Idleness and Selfishness. Subscribe for the paper, and let it no longer be said—

"The printer opens his wide domains
Of science, scatters education
O'er the land like April rains,
And yet his labor and his pains
Is half his compensation."

GREELEY.

A WIFE WANTED.

LADIES.—I am in want of a good kind and affectionate companion. One that has got sagacity enough to learn to play a shrewd game of Checkers or Cards. Who knows enough to wait on herself, and too much to wait on me. One that will avoid above all things in God's world, speaking often to her men; for although naturally good natured, I am liable to be thrown into a perfect temper of rage, by such unbecoming and outrageous conduct. I shall however allow her the privilege of occasionally conversing with such ones as I may name, but she must be very careful to tell me (if not present) every word that is said by both parties, else it will bring down my displeasure. To such a wife I should be

To her virtues a little blind,
To her faults very unkind.
For further particulars of my qualifications inquire of my guardian.

For the Northern Islander. THE GATHERING.

BY WARREN POST.

all ye Saints, without longer delay up to Big Beaver, for this is the way, child again Zion, the Saints' last abode, anchor your souls in the kingdom of God.

no design is lifted, the banner unfurled into every nation throughout the whole world;
for the kingdom's establishment, as Daniel, did say.

And the Saints will possess it throughout and less day.

Now make no excuses, for fear of a not right;
Remember we walk by faith, not by sight;
Then bring all your silver, your gold and your pearls.

To beautify Zion, the praise of the world.

We have here the fir tree, the box and the pine;
Then come and help prune them, and Zion will shine.

Her beautiful garments in splendor appear,
The day is fast coming, the bridegroom is near.

We want here no cowards, who dare not do fear.

The truths of the kingdom, even unto the end;
The faithful will prosper, the kingdom remain,
While Babylon falls, and the wicked are slain.

Then be not faint hearted, for God is our shield;
He's promised for Zion his power to wield.
The aliens he'll banish—they can't the Saints harm—

Then come to Big Beaver, don't fear the alarm.

TO THE SAINTS SCATTERED A-BROAD, GREETING.—Inasmuch as many of the faithful brethren have written some things concerning this corner stake of Zion, I, by the advice of the prophet, give my testimony concerning these things. The gathering together of the saints of God, who are scattered abroad, is no new idea unto the saints of the Most High; for the same spirit which inspired the prophets in former days to testify concerning Zion and her stakes (as well as the building of Jerusalem again upon her own heaps) has also inspired Joseph and James, the true prophets of the last days, so that they have again set in order the gospel and Kingdom of God.

The second requisite in the order of God's house seems to be this: after having first obeyed the first principles of the gospel, then to gather, particularly those that are willing to enter into covenant relationship with God by sacrifice. Then the next thing which seems to agitate the minds of the saints is, where is the proper gathering place, what are the facilities for gathering, and what is the general appearance and advantages of said place.

I am aware that the inhabitants of the earth generally prefer walking by sight, and not faith. However there are a few who can believe in the testimony of others.
Then let me certify you, brethren, that this Island surpasses in beauty and goodness any land I ever saw. The soil of this Island is a sandy loam, and mostly of the very best kind. For the ease of cultivation, and natural fertility, I venture to say it equals, to say the least of it, any of the stakes of Zion. And as to the health of the place, and its natural facilities, there has been no stake that I have yet heard of that will compare with it. I believe this land will yield in abundance all the different kinds of grain that are ordained for the use of man; and on the north part of the Island there is the best harbor on the Lakes, and so beautiful in all that pertains to it that the sailors named it Paradise Bay.

This Bay is one of the best fisheries on the Lakes, and I have seen enough fish caught at one haul of the seine to make fifteen barrels of fish after being re-packed. And I have been credibly informed that twenty, thirty and sometimes forty or fifty barrels of fish have been caught at one haul.

I simply mention these things to assure the saints that they need not fear for the belly. And we are often asked the question—
How will the calls of the body be supplied? My answer is: Industry is the sure source of wealth.
And now I will show you how the body can be clothed.

Wood for steamboats, and timber of various dimensions, are in constant demand, and at such prices that any able-bodied man can clear his dollar per day for every day he works. There is at this time four stores on the Island, which trade upon easy terms; and I venture to say that any person who is afraid of suffering upon Beaver, either in body or mind, is not fit for the Kingdom of God. The timber upon the Island is of the best quality.
Upon the dry lands we have sugar-maple in abundance, (so that the saints can make all the sugar that will ever be needed for the consumption of the place), also beech and maple, and in the swamps we find the tamarack, cedar, fir, spruce, hemlock and pine; and we might add, nearly all kind of timber useful for man.
I never saw a place so well fitted for the setting up of the Kingdom of God as this place, for here the saints are remote from the world, and separate from many of the turmoils and perplexities of this age, which thing is very desirable, for there is no saint, that wishes to be constantly annoyed, with the common bustle of the day, but would prefer retirement from the world, and many of its cares and allurements, and live with those of the same mind, actuated by the same spirit, and bound together with the same Covenant, their interests being the same, and their sole object to build up and beautify the waste places in Zion, and also to assist in gathering together in one the Children of God, who are scattered abroad.

Then let me again assure the saints that they have nothing to fear in coming to this place, inasmuch as they are willing to live honestly, and labor with their own hands, walking uprightly before God; for who ever saw the righteous forsaken, or his seed being brought forth, would be doing great injustice to the saints in this place if I did not bear testimony to their faith, charity, zeal, brotherly kindness and unity in this work of the great God, which he has already commenced for the salvation of the children of men.

I presume there has never been a time since the world was when the saints have been more united than at present. The proceedings of the late assembly of the saints stand recorded upon the records of eternity, to the end
"when time is no longer," and where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are forever at rest. Angels and righteous men have long desired to see this day, which we have seen in this place, and to witness the setting up of the kingdom of God, which thing we have witnessed;
a thing long foretold by the prophets, and earnestly expected by every lover of righteousness.

Then lift up your heads, ye scattered saints; for your redemption draweth nigh; and remember that every man who labors with all his might to build up Zion will receive blessings, glory and honor, might and dominion, and become an inheritor in God's holy mountain, where there are pleasures forevermore. Every saint of mature age who comes to this place to live with us, and who will keep God's commandments, shall have one hundred and sixty acres of choice land for an inheritance, and also one acre in some city, where he may choose, for he might desire to live in a city. This land is without money, and without price; but the question is often asked, how did the saints obtain this land? Bear a little with me and I will tell you how they obtained it.

We should always remember that about six thousand years ago this earth was created for the use of man, and he was placed upon the earth, and dominion was given unto him, &c. But the saying went abroad, "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, and the cattle upon a thousand hills are his." But in following this subject we soon find that men began to be covetous, and were not willing that the Lord should claim the earth as his own, and dispose of the same as seemed good in his own sight; but, on the contrary, man claimed the right of this earth by usurpation, just as Satan claimed the right of government in heaven; and when the Lord gave possessions unto his servants, and they wished to possess them, then their enemies were ready to show fight. But the Lord still retaining the right to provide for his saints, gave a large quantity of land to Alexander and his seed, for an everlasting inheritance. But the Gentiles being so greedy, thought to war the saints out of their inheritance, but were not successful.
The Lord being of a merciful disposition, he only retained a small portion of land upon the eastern continent for his saints, thus called Palestine, and left the rest of the continent in the hands of the ungodly.

In searching the history of the past, we find at a certain time the earth was divided, so we now have a western continent aboring, and this was blessed above all other lands, and given unto Joseph for an everlasting possession.
Joseph's seed long ago came upon their possessions here. But in process of time the Gentiles found their way here, and took up habitations in the tents of Shem. And soon the Gentiles became so haughty that they thought to dispossess the rightful owners of the soil, and claim this continent as their own; but long before this they had forgotten that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof."

The Lord still feeling jealous for his covenant people, and in remembrance of his promises unto our fathers, has reserved the Islands of Lake Michigan for his saints, and has now set up his kingdom on Big Beaver, where the Sabbath is remembered, and God's laws are kept. I am aware that the Gentiles will oppose this work of the great God, for the god of this world has blinded their eyes so that they cannot see when good cometh. But they claim the honor of disposing of these Islands also, still making the saying of our Savior good,

"that the son of man hath not where to lay his head."

I am also aware that it will be looked upon as treasonable for the saints to claim this land as a gift from the Almighty. O, the follies of man! What! not willing that the Lord should hold dominion over this small portion of his footstool? If the consciences of the Gentiles are yet tender, let me ask them how they came in possession of this continent.
Was it by the gift of God, by purchase, or by blood and usurpation? By blood and usurpation, undoubtedly.

It is evident that the inhabitants of the earth have not been willing for the saints to hold any possessions on the earth since it has stood, and that disposition has been clearly developed in these last days, for a number of times the saints have been driven from their land owned possessions, and have had to seek refuge among their enemies. I would seem hard to deny the saints the privilege of a resting place on the earth, seeing that God has promised that they shall inherit it.

Scientific progress.—An eminent English professor and chemist, Mr. Henry Baker, has observed a fact, as interesting as it is of practical value as a source of information in practical application. It is known that water is composed of two gases—oxygen and hydrogen—combined in the proportion of one volume of the first to two volumes of the second.
It is also known that the atmosphere of the earth is composed of oxygen and nitrogen, and that the oxygen is contained in the atmosphere in the proportion of one volume of the first to four volumes of the second. It is also known that the atmosphere of the earth is composed of oxygen and nitrogen, and that the oxygen is contained in the atmosphere in the proportion of one volume of the first to four volumes of the second.
It is also known that the atmosphere of the earth

Water-proof cloth.—The best water-proof cloth made, is that of India rubber; no other cloth can equal it; all other cloths next in order. Woollen and cotton cloths may be rendered nearly water-proof by dipping them in a solution of alum and sulphate of copper. These two substances should be used in about equal quantities. The cloth should be dried in a warm room afterwards. If cotton cloth is dipped into a very weak solution of alum, and then dried at a high temperature, a very good water-proof cloth is the result, and one that is nearly indestructible.

see, my grandmother's date and

Why does an aching tooth impose silence on the sufferer?—
Because it makes him hold his

Know Thyself.—"You must not smoke here, sir," said a captain of a North River steamer to a man who was smoking among the ladies on the forward deck. "I mustn't!
why not?" replied the fellow, opening his capacious mouth, and allowing the smoke to escape slowly. "Didn't you see the sign?
Gentlemen are requested not to smoke abaft mean me—I'm no gentleman—never pretended to be—you can't make a gentleman of me, no how you can fix it." So saying, he pulled a way and took the responsibility.—*New York

Importance of a Boundary Line.—An old lady who did not know whether her plantation was in Virginia or North Carolina, found when the line was run, that she was a resident of the former.—

"Well," said she, "I'm glad I don't live in North Carolina! It was always such a sickly State."

"I say, boy, whose horse is that your's ridng?"

"Why, it's daddy's."

"Who's your daddy?"

"Don't you know! Why, uncle Peter Jones!"

"S— you are the son of your uncle?"

"Why, you calculate I am. You see dad got to be a widower, and married mother's sister, and now it's my uncle."

"Well, wife, I don't see, for my part, how they send letters on them ere wire without tossing 'em all to bits."—"La me, they don't send the paper, they jus send me writin in a final state."

"My love," said a lady to her husband, when her mouth screwed up as if she had been eating green peashoots a full month. "My love, will you condescend to hand me those peashoots, that I may swallow the extraordinary matter from the lunatic, that it may send him to his grave more sure, and re-spondently."

"My dear dear husband, my dear husband, only replied the husband.

"Well, then, Sail you wench, come and smell the candle."

Let Ourselves alone.—Some boys playing a game, one (an orphan) was teased by his playmates that he could not tell who his father was. Stung by the reproach, with a ready wit, he quickly retorted upon the teasing boy who asked it:—"I cannot, indeed, say who my father was, but can your mother tell who yours was?" He was reproached no more.

A Leap Extraordinary.—The Pittsburg Emporium tells a story of an extraordinary feat performed a short time since, by a scotch mare, belonging to a Mr. Zimmerman, a very stable keeper. Manesville, which completely knocks the experts of Black Thrum and his celebrated "leap horse" for the shade. It says that Johnnie Hughes, son of E. Hughes, Esq., aged 12 years, was riding the mare, when she became frightened and ran away with him; she ran up the railroad to where it crosses Wolf creek, at which point the plank had been removed for the space of 25 feet. Here, as if guided by an invisible hand, she stopped for a moment, and gathering all her energies, sprung the space at a single bound. Several persons who witnessed the feat, immediately measured the distance jumped, and found it to be twenty-seven feet. Neither the horse nor rider was injured.

Water-proof cloth.—The best water-proof
cloth made, is that of India rubber; no other cloth can equal it; all other cloths next in order. Woollen and cotton cloths may be rendered nearly water-proof by dipping them in a so-

CHAPTER X.

THE DISCOVERY—STORM—SLEEPING BEAR.

Poor Eb. What troubles would he not have spared himself had he been content with revenge without recompense. He had got three boxes of dry goods, but what should he do with them? That question he had never asked himself—but it thrust itself upon him too often, in the next fortnight ever to be forgotten afterwards.

When he had pulled the boxes along side of his canoe he could not take them aboard. It would carry a ton or two, and ride out a tempest that would hurry every merchantman to port or Davy Jones' locker, but he could not lift one hundred pounds over the side of it, without upsetting. Such is the peculiar structure of the bark canoe, that though safe for twenty men in a howling tempest, it requires some degree of skill to get into one while lying upon a fine beach without upsetting it.

After debating in his own mind for some time what he should do, it occurred to Eb. that he could knock the boxes open, and take out the goods piece by piece. This was a slow task, and while he was busily engaged at it, seeing a gleam of light from the N. E. he started suddenly round, and what should he behold but a large steamboat scarcely her length from him making directly to where he was, at ten knots an hour. A cry was uttered by every person aboard the frail bark in the same breath; but suddenly springing to the paddles, the canoe shot forward clear of the bow of the boat. A heavy quick swell was setting in from the S., and fortunately the heavy wave and swell of the boat just carried the canoe clear of the boat's wheel, which however struck one of the goods boxes, tearing it in pieces, and calling the attention of the officers.

This fact was mentioned at the wharf while taking wood. Some one also mentioned having heard a cry immediately preceding, and the question was eagerly passed round among the men employed at getting wood whether any one was out. Satisfied that no one of their crowd was out, they concluded it was nobody but an Indian, and did not trouble themselves to ascertain whether a human being had not been run down and left to perish.

After the customary delay the boat, which proved to be the Nile, left the wharf and struck out around the long shoal point which extends eastwardly from the S. eastern extremity of the Island. In the mean time the wind which had blown fresh all day had freshened to a tempest. The clouds had thickened up, till the darkness was fearful. The Nile was rather too crank for a good sea boat. Passing over the point, where from the shoalness of the water the swells broke with terrific fury, the order was given to put back.

The Illinois had been out as far as point Aux Betsies, the first prominent headland south of the Sleeping Bear, when she also put back. The Sleeping Bear is a very prominent headland, nine miles south of south Manitou light, and upon the east shore of the Lake. It presents itself to the Lake a naked bluff, rising from the water at an angle of forty-five degrees, to the height of three hundred feet. Upon the top of this bluff a round knob rises three hundred and fifty feet higher, naked upon its sides, but covered with timber on the top. It is both a grand feature in the scenery, and the most prominent headland along the Lake, and is the point usually made by all boats bound down from any part of the east shore, or the west above Manitowoc.

While we were passing this landmark, and most of the passengers straining their eyes to make out its outline in the dimness of the evening, Mr. "J. Jackson" first discovered the loss of his "three boxes." A glad man was he when in the howling of the tempest, off Aux Betsies, he found the boat going back.

Not so a fellow passenger named Tom. Moody. He walked straight up to the Capt., old Hurricane Blake, and addressed him: "I say Capt'n are you going back." Yes, was the gruff reply. What in h—l is that for? I'll be d—d if I stand any such pranks. I've paid my passage through, and I want you to turn about and go ahead, and not be foolen a feller in this way. Them may stand it that please. D—d if I will. Blake was not particularly fond of having more than one Capt. aboard the same craft, and usually answered rather crabbidly all suggestions about his affairs, come from where they might. But with the swell sweeping clear over the main deck, and dashing upon the hurricane deck so as to make the footing difficult, the idea was too ridiculous to even get mad at it. Blake never answered a word.

CHAPTER XI.

EB. SUSPECTED OF THE THEFT.

Next morning we found ourselves, with the Nile, at anchor under the lee of the North Manitou, not far from the wharf. Mr. J. Jackson got on shore to make inquiries for his three boxes, and learned the story of the Nile having struck something as she came in. Search was made along the shore of the Island to the north, and one of the boxes was found drifted up, and sufficiently unbroken to show too plainly that it had been opened with a hatchet! The Island was searched, and no further trace of them found. Who had left? Eb. Harris. Then he had the goods. The Islanders concurred readily in this view, because it removed the suspicion from them. Jackson, because he knew he had offended him. No man is so unforgiving; none so uncharitable, as he who is conscious of having done a wrong.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PURSUIT.

Where was Eb. Harris, and the three boxes? That was the question of all questions to one man, at least. To the rest of the company it had little interest.—As it gradually became noised about that the suspected man had an Indian wife, and Jackson had insulted her, sympathy sensibly diminished. However, there were not a few among the passengers who thought that no excuse for so dreadful a crime as grand larceny. The necessity of sending missionaries along the border to christianize the backwoodsmen became an interesting subject of discussion for the rest of the voyage, especially among the gentlemen who had most business in the ladies' cabin. Trunks and baggage were carefully looked after, lest some new depredation should be committed.

With the rising of the sun the wind went down, and as soon as the swell had died away sufficiently the two steamboats started out, the Illinois leading, of course. Jackson remained behind, not a little chop-fallen, but hoping to find his three boxes. He soon learned that Eb. had formerly fished at Carp River, nine miles S. E. from N. Manitou wharf. With the least possible delay he obtained a boat and four men, to take him over. A warrant and a constable was out of the question, but he did not doubt getting the goods, if he could find them. Like every other person, he was ready to resort to a little lawlessness to right his wrongs, on the borders.

A most uncomfortable trip they had over, occupying four hours in the distance, and constantly rolling in the troughs of the dead swells. A most seasick man was J. Jackson. Had he had a fine snail over, he would have been ready to accept his three boxes and forgive Eb., but getting most abominably seasick, he declared he would shoot him down like a deer—he would have his life.

Eb., though not exactly popular, was not disliked among the wood men. With him, they generally were tired of the oppressions and the artificial distinctions of society. With him, they were conscious of the general want of legal justice in the country; and they had got some vague idea of the wrong he had suffered, and had it mixed up with the insult offered to his Indian wife, and the revenge he had taken. In short, though they believed Eb. had the goods, they hoped he would escape punishment. They did not look upon him as a whit worse than his pursuer.

Arriving at the mouth of Carp River, no sign of Eb. and his party could be discovered. His deserted cabin presented not the slightest evidence that it had been visited for weeks past. The foot print of a man could not be found on the beach. Jackson grew violent and bitter. Every sentence was a denunciation, and spiced with an oath. As the hope of recovering his property grew more distant, his violence increased, and he threatened every kind of lawlessness upon poor Eb., who had only collected a lawless fine of him for a lawless abuse.

The search failed. The wood men were confirmed in the opinion that Eb. had the goods, otherwise why had he gone from Manitou, and not gone home?—But as they heard more of Jackson's raving, they became more anxious that he might fail in the object of his search. Nearly sunset they started back. It was a still calm night. The swell had gone down, and the deep blue water so recently lashed to a foam, and carrying terror to brave hearts, heaved as gently as the breast of a sleeping infant.—There was not a ripple on the surface. Except the still long swell, scarcely perceived by the experienced boatmen, it was as smooth as a mirror. The striking of a fly upon the surface produced circle around circle, wave on wave, and the uniform wake of the small boat was lost in the distance, beyond the ken of the eye.

While making their way back, after the darkness came on, they espied a canoe not far off passing to the starboard. Jackson was anxious to give chase, and was certain that he discerned one white man and some Indians in it. His boatmen neither relishing the chase, nor wishing to overtake Eb., could not see so clearly, and continued to lose sight of the canoe, in spite of their best efforts to overtake it. Jackson suspected them of having little sympathy for him, and returned dogged and sullen.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CONCEALMENT.

As soon as Eben could take in his cargo, after his narrow escape from the Nile, he made the best of his way for Carp River. The tempest was as much too severe for his paddles as for the paddle wheels. He soon discovered that it was impossible to reach the shore. It was equally impossible to return. Fox and Beaver Islands lay to the north of him, but he had never been upon any of them. He did not know the precise course or distance to any of them. In the utter darkness of the night if he undertook to run to them he might miss, and if he undertook to avoid them he might run upon some one. And, worst of all, the shores were reported rocky, and he could not haul off if he found himself approaching in a dangerous place.

Still Eb. could not choose. He was afloat, and had to ride out the storm or perish in it. His Indians were superstitious. He had come near perishing by accident, and now the storm was fearfully against them. They were not afraid that Kishi-manitou was against them for the unlawful taking of the goods. All Indians are more or less habituated to plundering their enemies. But there was a something about Eben that caused the Indians to fear him a little more than they loved him. They knew nothing of his wrongs—they knew him only as a man hater—quite liable to practice his hate on them—neither giving nor seeking confidence—ruling by that fear which had been tried in vain on him. They feared they should perish for supporting the cause of a bad man.

But there was no turning back. With dogged calmness they lay down, and left the canoe to her fate. Eb. gave her the proper course, and let her run with the wind. Long before day dawn they heard the roar of breakers, and in a moment were among them. For an instant she dashed among the boiling surges—a huge wave struck her, and rolled along carrying her upon its crest. She struck heavy, and the swell rolled back. The canoe was high and dry upon the sand shore of South Fox Island, and all well.

Here Eb. remained till the storm abated, and started again for Carp River. His almost miraculous escape from destruction, rather gave the Indians confidence in the justice of his cause, and they took hold with alacrity. It was on this voyage that he had nearly fallen in with his pursuers. He did not discover the boat till very near it. Perceiving that it was a boat from Manitou Isle, in so unusual a place, the thought instantly occurred to him that it was in pursuit of him, and in the dim light of evening he thought he recognized his tormentor, Jackson.

Making the best use of their paddles, the canoe was soon out of sight, and as the boat did not return, Eb. flattered himself that he had been mistaken, and that they really were not in pursuit of him. Carp River was his home, and in spite of this uncertainty, and the great danger of pursuit, he had an irresistible anxiety to return there. Late in the evening he landed, and took up his quarters in his own deserted cabin.

The toils of the day had been severe, and he slept till long after the sun was up. Going out on the beach in the morning, he discovered fresh tracks. It was evident that a boat had landed, and that the premises had been carefully examined. Go where he might the fresh tracks of men everywhere appeared, but nothing had been removed. Would they return?

Eb. had been from home a long time, and had been unlucky in his business. His inclination to stop at home was exceedingly strong, but the certainty of being defeated and broke up, and the danger of being imprisoned if they should return, finally decided him to leave for some unknown place till the pursuit was over.

CHAPTER XIV.

DISCOVERY OF EB.

Mean time, during the afternoon of the previous day, a laborer on the North Manitou had strayed to the high ground at the north end of the Island, and while standing on the brow of a clay bluff two hundred feet high, and nearly perpendicular, had discovered Eb. in his canoe, on his way from Fox Island to Carp River. On the return of the search, as the various persons gathered in the one room of the boarding house for wood choppers, were comparing notes, they settled the point that the canoe seen from the bluff and met in the evening were the same, and belonged to nobody but Eb. Harris. And then, for the first time, it occurred to them that Eb. could not have gone to Carp River the night he took the goods, in consequence of the storm. Conscious that they had quite fooled themselves in going to Carp River when they did, they were equally certain that now the game was there. Before going to sleep everything was arranged for an early start back the following morning.

A light breeze from the west favored their start, and they were off in good season. Just as Eb. had come to the very wise conclusion to leave the place for one of greater safety, he discovered their sail some four miles off, making directly towards him.—The purport of the visit was too obvious. He could scarcely get his stuff aboard and start before they would be upon him, and if the wind did not favor him, they were quite likely to be best maned at oars, and to overtake him. To be taken with the goods in his hands was fatal.

Eb. got the two Indians in the canoe as quick as possible, and started them off for the Indian village of Le Arbour Croche, in Petite Traverse bay; instructing them to prolong the chase, if the boat pursued, as long as possible, in order to give him time to remove his plunder before the boat's return. The canoe took the wind on her larboard beam aft, as the boat did on the starboard. Much to Eb.'s relief, he perceived the boat changed her course for the purpose of heading the canoe, as soon as that was well started. Watching the chase till they were too far off to perceive his movements upon the shore, with the assistance of his squaw he commenced putting his goods out of the way.

For a store house he chose a hollow tree a half mile back in the woods, which had a large hole in the side some fifteen feet above the ground, and had usually been occupied as a dwelling place by a litter of bears. Eb. and his squaw packed the stock of stolen goods to this tree, going every time by a different route, and being careful to make as little trail as possible, in order to avoid being tracked, if a new examination should be made. To get the goods in at that elevation Eb. had cut a forked pole and set it up against the side of the tree so that the crotch was about ten feet above the ground, and his squaw, with a shorter pole, reached them to him as he dropped them in.

No sooner was this work accomplished, and he returned to the shore, than the boat which had been in chase returned, having overtaken the canoe in a dead calm, by the superiority of four oars to two paddles; and found that they had been sorely fooled. As the Indians had nothing on board but what belonged to them, and were to all appearance going very quietly about their business, it was not easy to pick a quarrel with them. They affected not to understand a word of English, and therefore had no troublesome questions to answer. Yet Jackson could not divest himself of the belief that their very hearty laugh was at his expense.

But even this result relieved him in some degree of his anxiety. Now he was sure that this was Eb.'s canoe, and that Eb. had stopped at Carp River. He felt sure that his three boxes of goods were also there. He fancied that failure to him or escape to Eb. was impossible, when he returned to Carp River, as we have seen above.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, APRIL 3, 1851.

PROTECTION OF THE LAW.

No fact can be more certain than that throughout the United States there is no legal protection to a Mormon. It may occasionally happen that the law is administered in their behalf, but much more frequently it is not. The few cases where the law is administered in their favor, only show that there is no protection for them. They are only cases of little consequence, where it is not worth the trouble of denying the usual course of legal proceedings.

A large number of the Mormons have been murdered at different times, and in different States by persons well known, and whose guilt could be proved by multitudes of witnesses, yet no person has ever been punished for the murder of any of them. We are not speaking of persons killed while defending their wives, their children, and their firesides, but of unarmed persons murdered outright, and for whose murder the only pretense of excuse was, that they were Mormons.

At one time some eighteen persons, engaged in the worship of God, were murdered in cold blood, unresisting. Joseph and Hyrum Smith were murdered in prison, on a charge confessedly trumped up for the purpose of getting them where it was convenient to murder them—the murderers in both cases being well known, and not the slightest effort has been made by the legally constituted authorities to bring them to justice. In the case of the murderers of Joseph and Hyrum the most prominent actors were indicted and acquitted, for the purpose of preventing any prosecution which at any future time might be attempted.

Last fall prophet Strang was imprisoned for the same purpose, but the object failed by the efforts of a few men, too just to be corrupted to such purposes. Nevertheless, Mr. Strang and various others, including all the principal men among the Mormons, live in the continual consciousness that there are men around them seeking their lives; and that, should they be killed, the murderers would never be brought to justice by the authorities of the State.

We are not aware that they are in any particular fear of being murdered, but there is something very rotten in the institutions of the country, when men of respectability and peaceable and industrious habits must live with the constant assurance that whoever pleases may murder them, and never be called to account for it. And it can add nothing to their comfort to know that there are men in their neighborhood who seek their lives.

Under such circumstances it behooves men to consider their position well, and to act with spirit and decision. A little hesitation or indecision is as much as life is worth, and we are happy in believing that in this case there will be none. Messrs. Strang, Miller, Graham, Aldrich, McCulloch, Johnson, Hopper, Chidester, Greig, and others, the men marked for destruction, will not huddle up like frightened sheep, and turn their backs to be destroyed by a chance blow. They will not suffer their numbers to be picked out one by one, to suffer the malice of evil doers.

Every man may dismiss all such expectations at once, and forever. The Mormons will be crushed as a people, and swallowed in one common ruin, sooner than attempt to gain a temporary respite by sacrificing one another. They have sought for legal protection, till they have learned that it is not for them. They have retreated from persecution as the Indian has from the white man, till they have learned that there is no retreat for them. They can fall back no further.—If the administrators of the law will not protect them, they will take care of themselves.

We are induced to make these remarks, in consequence of information that Mr. Praiseworthy Bower has offered to join a band, if one can be got up, and burn down the houses of some twenty of the Mormons of Beaver Island, and Mr. Thomas Bennett expresses a determination to have the life of Mr. Strang before another harvest. We do not expect them to do any such thing, and are quite easy on the subject of all such threats.

But our confidence is not in the sanctity of the law, for we well know it has none. It is in the certainty that should such an aggression be committed, the aggressors would be wiped off the face of the earth, before they found rest for the soles of their feet.—It is not safe to have such men left in our vicinity. They will forever be seeking to excite hostilities, and will never be at rest while their neighbors are at peace; and if suffered to remain among us will contrive by some means to put an end to the good feeling prevailing among the community here.

But the facts of which we speak are not peculiar to us as a people. This lawlessness is practiced on the weak and defenceless throughout the United States.—The tendency of all things is, to despising the laws and those that administer them. No great interest or valuable right is safe, merely because it is legal. The owners of legal franchises are never at rest on the assurance of the laws. They depend on making themselves strong by political combinations, rather than constitutional rights. Equally those who wish to exercise prerogatives forbidden in the law, move forward disregarding all statutes and legal precedents, if backed by sufficient influence to trample down the law.

Many have looked for the downfall of the nation by the array of the north against the south. That will not be. The nation will perish in the anarchy of laws despised and trampled on by the whole people. There is no wickedness, no act of oppression ever undertaken by a despotic government, which has not been successfully accomplished in this. There is no conceivable act which cannot be done under it, either in accordance with the law, or in spite of it. The most influential men in society, are many of them engaged in the constant and shameless violation of penal statutes and criminal enactments, without so much as being less respected. The effect of all this can be nothing less than the despising of magistrates, trampling on law, and the crumbling in pieces of the government.

All the old governments have a kind of heart: a body of people, generally among the most intelligent, who have a permanent interest in the integrity and respectability of the administration: men whose standing, property, and even their personal safety depend on a respectable share of justice in the administration; and who at the same time control its affairs. In the United States there is no such class. Whoever administers the government for the time being, is sure of being turned out in a short time, to an obloquy equally sure whether deserved or undeserved. Their utmost interest is in the amount they can speculate out of the administration of public affairs.—In the election the voice of the vicious counts equal with that of the virtuous. Such institutions must fail of accomplishing any good, and in the end must perish. Injustice and oppression is their natural fruit.

AGRICULTURE.

We cannot too strongly urge upon the Islanders the importance of more general attention to agriculture. So long as the cultivation of the soil is neglected, we shall experience an occasional scarcity of food, with oppressively high prices. There is much land on Big Beaver which with very little labor could be cropped, and would yield abundantly. Not only in the region about the harbour, but at the southwest extremity of the Island there are large tracts of valuable land with very little timber remaining on it, with a rich soil. These can be prepared for crops the present year, in most cases with less labor than the mere expense of plowing. The emigration is likely to be much larger this year than last, and the demand for domestic productions will undoubtedly be large and the price high. Many cattle have been slaughtered the last two years for want of fodder to winter them. And at the same time the land was lying unoccupied and nearly ready for a crop, on which the fodder might have been raised. It would doubtless be a good project for a few men to join together and go up and crop a large field in company at the southwest extremity of the Island. But in the settlements every man should cultivate what he can, and not fail of attending to it in season.

Hog Island has all the facilities for an extensive grazing farm. It is disgraceful that it should lie unoccupied, and such a scarcity of beef, butter and cheese as there is here at all times. A hundred cows could be kept there from the very beginning.

High Island presents nearly similar advantages, though probably not to the same extent. The Fox Islands are also well adapted to agriculture. But upon all there is a lack of domestic animals, and too little disposition to cultivate the soil.

In saying this we do not wish to in the least disparage the fishing, lumbering and other interests. Every man can cultivate a little and some carry on extensive farms, without withdrawing anything from occupations, by merely establishing more industrious and business like habits. The home productions of food will diminish the expense and increase the comforts of life.

FENCING.

The custom generally prevails in Great Britain and the United States of fencing in crops, and, to a limited extent, allowing cattle to run at large. In all other parts of the world crops are grown without putting a fence around them. It is to us unaccountable that the Anglo Saxons are the only exception to so wise a rule.

Nothing can be more clear than that crops need no fences. They will not go astray, nor trespass upon the adjoining lands, when left to themselves; but cattle will. If all the grain crops are fenced, the cattle still must be; otherwise oxen cannot be found in season for labor, nor cows for milking. If pasture lands alone are properly fenced, every other crop may be raised at large, without difficulty or loss. But if every other crop is fenced, it is still necessary to fence the pastures.

Besides the question of convenience, there is one of right involved in the two customs. If
A. owns a farm he owns the right to use that farm, and his neighbor B. does not own that right.—
But if B. does not own the right to use A's farm, he has no more right to pasture his cattle on it than to grow his grain upon it.—
He is as much bound to keep his flock off as his crop. It is every man's duty to keep his cattle on his own land, rather than to keep his neighbor's off; to fence his own cattle in, and not others out.
If A's ownership of the land does not give him the right to the use of it, fence or no fence, it is no ownership; it is only a right to war against the dishonesty and shrewdness of his neighbors. If a man can be placed under obligation to build a fence four and a half feet high, against common cattle before he has a legal protection to his crops, he may equally be required to build one ten feet high, against goats and camels, or forty feet against doves and turkeys. If cattle have a right to trespass wherever there is not a fence to stop them, so have pigs and fowls. The same rule of right that will allow one man to pasture his cow on his neighbors' grass, will allow another to keep one thousand hens at large on their gardens.
The best rule is for every man to take care of his own, whether fowls or four footed beasts, and if by any accident they break out upon his neighbor, to cheerfully make recompense for the injury.
Then if a man is too poor to own cattle or build fences, he can raise a crop for his family. If he keeps orderly cattle, he may make his fences accordingly; and if he choose to get those that are unruly, he puts himself, and not his neighbors to the expense of high and strong fences. It has been suggested that though the rule is good as a general one, it would not apply here. We answer, if it is a rule of right, it applies everywhere. But as a matter of policy, we think it of great utility here. Nearly all the ground in this vicinity which produces any pasturage can be fenced for one-tenth the expense of fencing the town lots; and when so fenced those who occupy it will know where to find their cattle. What would be then left at common, and not cropped, would not, if pastured, support five cows in good condition. And for the indifferent feeding of five cows, every garden and every field must be fenced, and then the cattle turned out to go astray, and break through every fence that a strong and vicious ox can throw down.
There is not pasture in the vicinity of the harbor for the cattle that are owned here, and will not be till grass is sown and fenced, by men who expect to have the use of it to themselves.—
Those who intend to keep stock must make the fences around their farms and pasture the woods, and get in grass by the time the woods feed fails. The few who have pasture ground nearer by, ought to make pastures back against the time that these are wanted for building lots.

VALUABLE INVENTION.
Professor Hadley, of this place,
has recently invented a very valuable machine for filling net needles, a model of which can be seen at the Islander office. This machine is simple in its construction; works with ease and accuracy; will fill sixty needles an hour without an effort, and a child of five years can work it. The cost of a machine will not be above five dollars: it is neat enough for the parlor: and will effect a saving of nine-tenths the expense of filling needles, or about one-fourth the expense of making nets. We commend it to the notice of fishermen and knitters. No one should be without it. Prof. Hadley has taken the necessary measures to secure a patent for the invention, and will be prepared to supply the market with machines in a few days.
The fishing has commenced this season earlier than common. Mr. Kauffman hauled some fifty barrels of fish, principally suckers, at two hauls of the sein the 31st ult. We think those that keep their seines housed for fear of rotting the twine, and those that let their mills rest for fear of burning wood, or wearing the belts, had better quit grumbling, take a hearty laugh at each other,
and all be at work.
FIRE WOOD.
Martin G. Seace, a gentleman of much experience, tells us that cord wood piled with the bark upward is much more valuable than if piled in the usual manner.
The bark is a shelter to keep the rain and wet out while left upward, but if turned the other way it becomes a pan or receiver to hold the water that works down rather freely between the wood and bark. This is a matter of importance to all in the wood business, because the wood is sooner fit for use, and keeps longer without taking injury.
Mr. Seace assures us that the experiment was thoroughly tried by himself on the farm of the celebrated Jesse Buel. He has observed the fact for a long time, and can designate the sticks in a heterogeneous mass of wood which were seasoned with the bark up by their superior quality.
SEED POTATOES.
The practice has prevailed to some extent in this vicinity of cooking the best end of potatoes, and planting what is called the seed end. This economy is like that of planting the tip ends of corn ears, or sowing the wheat from the screen box. A potatoe is not a seed, but a bundle of seeds, of which the best are in the large end. Plant them continually, and cultivate well, and the stock will improve.
April has come in fine,
and no boat yet. The harbor has been clear of ice some time, and indeed there has been but little time the past winter that boats could not have come from above and made the harbor.
They could have made the head at all times. The navigation would have been good at any time in the last fortnight, past the new light house at point Waw-be-shance, and we presume through the straits.

HO ALL YE LANDLESS,
Come up to the Islands and receive a perpetual inheritance for yourselves and your posterity.
There is rich and beautiful wild land here which will not float away, and you can have an abundant without money and without price. Land speculation is abolished here, by giving each man enough for his own use, without price, and treating all sales as frauds upon heirs, and therefore nullities.
There is land enough in the world for all the people, and God made it; who shall deny each of his creatures a share? It is not done here.
The B. B. Co. have made arrangements to run a sailing packet from this harbor, to Mackinac, Petite Traverse, and Grand Traverse every week during the ensuing season. It is their intention to run from this harbor direct to all the principal stations on the fishing grounds at stated periods. They will also get a sailing vessel of the large class to make regular trips up and down the Lakes, for the transportation of lumber and various heavy articles.
Tobacco is the only article of food for which men here have come to the starving point.
One man went fifteen miles and paid $2.31 for a pound of very poor, after having eaten some twenty pounds, in the course of the winter. Another went off to a distant neighbor and begged a single plug for draughts for his child's feet! We advise such

A WIFE WANTED.
LADIES.—I am in want of a good kind and affectionate companion. One that has got sagacity enough to learn to play a shrewd game of Checkers or Cards. Who knows enough to wait on herself, and too much to wait on me. One that will avoid above all things in God's world, speaking often to other men; for although naturally good natured, I am liable to be thrown into a perfect temper of rage, by such unbecoming and outrageous conduct. I shall however allow her the privilege of occasionally conversing with such ones as I may name, but she must be very careful to tell me (if not present) every word that is said by both parties, else it will bring down my displeasure.
To such a wife I should be
To her virtues quite blind,
To her faults very unkind.
For further particulars of my qualifications inquire of my guardian.

BABYLON.

I climbed the cliff—I crossed the rock—
I trod the deserts old—
I passed the wild Arabian's tents,
The Syrian shepherd's fold;
Behind me far all haunts of men
Stretched into distance gray,
When spread before me, lone and wide,
The plain of Shinar lay;
The boundless plain of far Linjar,
Where long, long ages back,
Abdallah read the silent stars,
And watched their mystic track.
Where art thou, gem of the rich earth?
City of far renown,
The glory of the proud Chaldees,
The green earth's ancient crown!
Where lies the lake that, gleaming wide,
Gave back thy hundred towers?
Where are thy gardens of delight?
Thy cedar shaded bowers?
Where, where—Oh, where rolls rapidly
Thine ever flashing river,
Past marble gate and columned tower,
Guarding thy walls forever.
There is no voice of gladness here,
No breath of song floats by:
I hearken—but the moaning wind
Is all that makes reply.
Solemn and lone the silent marsh
Spreads endlessly around,
And shapeless are the ruined heaps
That strew the broken ground.
Sadly, above huge outlines dim,
Sighs the lone willow bough—
The last, last voice of Babylon—
Its only music now.
Son of Mandane! by whose hand
The doomed city fell—
The swift feet of whose soldiery
Climbed tower and citadel;
Thou foundest revelry and mirth,
Thou foundest dance and song,
Thou foundest many a banquet fair,
And many a joyous throng:
Like the death angel camest thou,
When men were care bereft;
And is this lone, waste wilderness
The total thou hast left?
Oh, glorious were her palaces
And shrines of fretted gold!
Then rose the fane of Merodach,
The house of Belus old:
And busy life was in her streets,
Where countless nations thronged;
Light footsteps glided through her homes,
And mirth to her belonged:
But prophet voices murmured,
Even in her festal halls;
And angel fingers wrote her doom
Upon the palace walls.
At midnight came the Persian,
Mingling amid the crowd;
He heeded not the beautiful,
He stayed not for the proud:
False was her fated river,
Heedless her gods of stone;
He entered at the open gates,
He passed—and she was gone!
Her place on earth abideth not—
Memorial she hath none;
Darkness and ruin thou may'st find,
But never Babylon!

UTTERLY HOMELESS PEOPLE.

The utterly homeless or desolate people in London are always very numerous, the place being resorted to as a general refuge by the unemployed from all quarters; and the amount of human misery congregated here from year's end to year's end would harrow the very soul in the recital, if it were possible for any pen to portray all its bitterness.

Some of the workhouses, that of St. Marylebone, for example, will contain, at times, two thousand of these poor creatures, besides affording casual out-door relief to twice as many more; and, when you consider the number of workhouses in and about the metropolis, some idea may be formed of the aggregate of unfortunates compelled to seek shelter within their dreary walls, or to accept at the hands of overseers temporary escapes from starvation.

A tour through the wards of a workhouse is a truly melancholy sight. You behold the wreck of toil worn women, who having struggled through laborious lives, augmenting the stock of general and individual wealth, are left, in the evening of their days, to the homeless desolation of the workhouse. Many, no doubt, are those who have earned, by dissipation and improvidence in their youth, this poor asylum of their age; but many more there are who could not, by any human exertion, of forethought or self-denial, escape their lot. When the precarious and uncertain tenure of labor is considered—when we reflect on the tremendous competition for employment among all classes, especially the humbler, the extravagant prices poverty compels them to pay for every necessary of life, and the never ceasing requirements of their families, it is easy for the educated rich to say, be economical, be prudent. Economy is very easy for those who, without self-sacrifice, can afford to lay by, and prudence may be preached to those who have enough for their present wants, and something to spare for the future. Nobody who has not lived among the poor has any idea of the extortions and frauds practiced upon them by all classes of little dealers.

The poor man can afford but a single room, and for this he pays two hundred per cent. more than he who can pay the rent of a house. He gets in his coals in pounds' weight, and for these, the worst of their kind, he pays a higher price than the Duke of Devonshire. It is the same with his groceries, his meat—everything. The poor man pays more than the price charged to the rich, simply because he is poor.—How melancholy is it to reflect, that it was reserved for enlightened penny knowledge times, and for men calling themselves liberal, to wage an unequal warfare with the destitute children of labor—to bring into fashion a "coarser food" for those whose best days were spent in the service of the rich—to enact penal laws, imprisoning the heart broken wife in one side of a prison, and the worn out husband in the other; while honorables and baronets, with eight hundreds a year salary, and we know not how many guineas a day traveling charges, itinerate from bastille to bastille, gauging water gruel, testing dog's body, and gathering up tags and empty bottles!

How admirably the spectacle of Mr. Commissioner Nicholas, with his two thousand five hundred pounds a year, and his swarm of deputy commissioners on salaries equally extravagant, contrasts with the damning fact, that in many of the bastilles under the control of these persons, upwards of sixty per cent. per annum of the children admitted, have perished miserably, and the rate payers have been called upon not only by the commissioners for the where-with to build these bastilles, in the form of a compulsory tax, but for subscriptions to take their inmates out of them, to save their lives. Is not this most horrible? These be your christian fathers! If we must have abuses in the administration of the Poor Law, let us have those abuses that fill the bellies of the poor, not swell the already bloated pockets of the rich. If we must have extravagance, let it not be monopolized by commissioners. If we must have "coarser food," we do not see how the honorable and knightly paupers who administer the law should not have their share of it. A stipendiary aristocracy of pauperism is most revolting to decency, humanity and prudence. The country calls loudly, let us hope no longer in vain, for the disbanding this stipendiary partisan army, inflicted upon us by a profligate ministry, the source of their strength and of our weakness.

It was a cold, cheerless, and desolate night—the partial thaw had left the pavement damp and sloppy, while a thin, sleety snow fell thick and fast; giving a consistence to the slippery mass beneath your feet; at every doorway and recess stood thinly shod females, shivering in their places of shelter, yet afraid to pursue their way: it was a night when one feels painfully for his fellow creatures who may not have where to lay their heads; when the sense of one's own domestic comfort increases the feeling of our unworthiness, and of our deep responsibility to that God who has graciously allowed our lines to fall in pleasant places; when we suffer pain from contrasting our own condition with that of thousands more deserving than ourselves, or when we feel the bitterness of heart which comes over us, when reflecting, that thousands at that moment want what we have not the power to bestow—the poor benefits of a morsel of bread, and a shelter from the storm. Upon such a night we took our way, with the purpose of visiting an institution lately established for the nightly shelter of the homeless poor. In a poor neighborhood, near White cross street, this truly benevolent society has recently opened an asylum, where, at the time of our visit, upwards of three hundred and fifty miserable creatures had found a refuge within the hospitable walls. The relief afforded is of the most limited kind. Abundance of good, dry, warm, clean, straw, disposed in compartments upon the floor, each compartment forming a separate sleeping place, numbered for the convenience of classification. In the centre of each ward blazes an ample fire, diffusing a comfortable temperature; order is preserved by inspectors appointed for the purpose, and as the punishment for misbehavior is summary ejection, it is altogether needless to say that there is very seldom an occasion to resort to this alternative. On arriving at the asylum each person receives a pound of bread, and on leaving in the morning the like quantity; a detailed statement of the causes of his or her destitution, is transcribed for the information of the investigators of the society, who are appointed to make inquiries into the truth or falsehood of the statement of each claimant, to accompany them to their parish, or generally, to aid and assist in replacing them in some way of honest industry. It is hardly necessary to mention, that the separation of the sexes is attended to, or that provision is made for the celebration of divine worship twice on the Sabbath day, at which the inmates belonging to the Established Church are expected to attend; those who do not, are at liberty to go to their respective places of worship. There is no distinction, in this truly Samaritan society, of color, creed, or clime; to be homeless and destitute is enough for those who "claim kindred there, and have their claim allowed;" the list of individuals received comprises Americans, East and West Indians, Irish, Scots, German, and natives of almost every country on the face of the Globe.

Of occupation the number is equally various—laborers forming the great majority; as might be expected from the precarious nature of their employment; hawkers and peddlers, or, as they are properly called "tramps," stand second in point of numbers; servants, a class peculiarly liable to casual distress and by no means well calculated to contend against it, come next; charwomen occupy the fourth place; seamen—the fifth; literary men and governesses, we believe come next; and after them, but in vastly diminished numbers, artisans of various denominations. The unhappy creatures who are compelled to seek refuge here, seem perfectly sensible of the kindness extended to them, and of its value; it is not merely the shelter and the morsel of bread that constitutes the good, it is that they feel that there is a fellow feeling with the poor in the breast of men; there is advice, interference for their ultimate good, kindness generated by the deservings by the recital of their misfortunes; the benevolent have a record before them of those to whom they can, without fear of imposition, extend their charity or countenance. When we consider what an awful calamity homelessness is, how the sense of utter desolation sinks, like iron, into the soul; how it generates hatred towards the fortunate, contempt of life, and despair; arms the suicide against his own life, and disgrace, by the memory of inhumanity and selfishness, all those who live and look on their fellow man, when,

"Homeless, beside a thousand homes he stood,
And, near a thousand tables, pined and wanted food,"

it is folly to say any more in the praise of such an institution; let those who have done honor to human nature by establishing such, enjoy the consciousness of having earned Heaven, and let those in whose streets, while they lie warm in their beds, the destitute perish for the want of such, dread the just vengeance of God upon their cold blooded inhumanity. We sometimes read of such things, and for the inhabitants of towns where such things occur, we feel a contempt amounting almost to hatred. It is a sin and shame to talk of free born Englishmen, Glorious Constitution, Bill of Rights, and Magna Charta, while people are allowed to perish in our streets.

A WORD TO PARENTS.

I have long been an observer, as I am a sympathizing lover of boys. I like to see them happy, cheerful, gleesome. I am not willing that they be cheated out of the rightful heritage of youth—indeed, I can hardly understand how a high-toned, useful man, can be the reformed fruit of a boy who has not enjoyed a fair share of the glad privileges due a youth. But while I watch, with a very jealous eye, all the rights and customs which entrench upon the proper rights of boys, I am equally apprehensive, lest parents, who are not forethoughtful, and who have not habituated themselves to close observation upon this subject, permit their sons in indulgences which are almost certain to result in their demoralization. If not in their total ruin; and among the habits which I have observed as most surely to ruin, I know of none more prominent than that of parents permitting their sons to be in the streets after nightfall. It is ruinous to their morals in almost all instances; they acquire under cover of night, an unhealthy and unsettled state of mind—bad, and vulgar, immoral, and profane language, obscene practices, criminal sentiments, a lawless and riotous bearing; indeed, it is in the street after nightfall, that boys principally acquire the education of the bad, capacity for becoming rowdy, dissolute criminal men.—But few boys in any city, or town, or village, or who have this ill-advised and totally unnecessary indulgence, ever attain to the desired eminence of useful citizens. Parents should in this particular have a most rigid inflexible rule, that they will never permit a son, under any circumstances whatever, to go into the streets after nightfall, with the view of engaging in out-of-door sports, or of meeting other boys for social or chance occupation. A rigid rule of this kind, invariably adhered to, will soon deaden the desire for such dangerous practices.—Boys should be taught to have pleasure around the family centre-table, in reading, in conversation, and in quiet amusements. Boys, gentlemen's sons, are seen in the streets after nightfall, behaving in a manner entirely destructive of good morals. Fathers and mothers, keep your boys at home at night, and see that you take pains to make your home pleasant, attractive, profitable to them; and above all, with a view to their security from future destruction, let them become, while forming their characters for life, so accustomed to regard the moral sense of an intelligent community, that they cannot, without a sense of shame openly violate the Sabbath day, by indulging in street pastime during its day or evening hours.—Anonymous.

HOW TO GET TO SLEEP.

How to get to sleep is, to many persons, a matter of high importance. Nervous persons, who are troubled with wakefulness and excitability, usually have a strong tendency of blood to the brain, with cold extremities. The pressure of blood on the brain keeps it in a stimulated or wakeful state, and the pulsations in the head are often painful. Let such rise and shake the body and extremities with a rough towel, or rub smartly with the hands, to promote circulation, and withdraw the excessive amount of blood from the head, and they will fall asleep in a few moments. A cold bath, or sponge bath, and rubbing, or a good run, or a rapid walk in the open air, or going up and down stairs a few times, just before retiring, will aid in equalizing circulation and promoting sleep. These rules are simple, and easy of application in castle or cabin, and may minister to the comfort of thousands who would freely expend money for an anodyne to promote "Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep."

THE "EXTRAORDINARY" NUMBER SEVEN.

On the 7th of the 7th month a holy observance was ordained to the children of Israel, who fasted 7 days and remained 7 days in tents; the 7th year was directed to be a sabbath of rest for all things; and at the end of 7 times 7 years commenced the grand jubilee; every 7th year the land lay fallow; every 7th year there was a grand release from all debts, and bondsmen were set free. From this law might have originated the custom of binding young men to 7 years apprenticeship, and of punishing incorrigible offenders by transportation for 7, twice 7, or three times 7 years. Anciently a child was not named before 7 days, not being accounted fully to have life before that periodical day. The teeth spring out in the 7th month, and are shed in the 7th year, when infancy is changed into childhood. At three 7 years the faculties are developed; manhood commences, and man becomes legally competent to all civil acts; at 4 times 7 a man is in full possession of his strength; at 5 times 7 he is fit for the business of the world; at six times 7 he becomes grave and wise, or never; at seven times 7 he is in his apogee, and from that day decays; at eight times 7 he is in his first climacteric; at nine times 7, or 63, he is in his grand climacteric, or year of danger; ten times 7, or three score years and ten, has by the royal prophet been pronounced the period of human life.—Ex.

EDWARD BUCKET'S COURTSHIP.

Old Mr. Posey, the father of Polly Posey, used to live close by our house, and Polly used to come right often, she was a dainty purty gail, and I used to have some mighty queer feelings about her, at last one day my mother says, "Ned, why don't you court Polly?" "Oh," said I, "mammy I do want to, but I don't know what to say to her." "Why, Ned," says she, "jest go, and the first good chance you git, say, fine weather, Miss Polly, and that will be a beginning, and that word brings on another, and if she likes you, you may soon tell it; and when you get in a good way of chat, jest say, Miss Polly, you've got my heart, and if she likes that purty well, so then pop the question." So one Sunday evening I told mother I thought it was a good time to go and see Polly, she said so did she. So I fixed up, put on my best clothes, and combed my hair, and ax'd mother, if she thought I'd do. "Oh yes," says she, "I'd call you the clean thing now." So off I starts, and soon found myself at Mr. Posey's door. "Who's that," says Mrs. Posey, "Edward Bucket," says I. "Walk in Mr. Bucket, how's your mammy and the children?" "All storin, I thank you, how's all your folk?" "All well, sir." That sat Polly. Says I, "what's the news Miss Polly?" "Oh, Mr. Bucket," says she, "nothing, I believe, only I hear you were about to get married." That, thought I, the subject's broach'd already. "Oh no," says I, "Miss Polly, only wants to be." About this time, night comes on, and it began to rain dreadfully; in ran the old man. "How are you, Mr. Bucket?" "Well, I thank you." After a while supper was over, and I begun to think I ought to be saying something on the subject. So I sot in my chair and my heart swell'd; and all was full of life but me; I was thinking of my bizzness; so at last Mrs. Posey said, "Polly, go to the door, and see if the rain don't quit." Polly jump'd up and ran to the door, and looking out, said, "It's so dark, Ma, I can't see nothin but lightnin. I see another cloud just behind." Now thought I, is my time. Polly kept standing in the pizzer, and I sot still, singing in my chair, till at last I called up all my courage, and walked to where Polly was; it was so dark I couldn't see her, and so I spoke that she might answer, so as how I could find her. "Fine weather, Miss Polly," "Oh no, Mr. Bucket, it's too rainy." Well, I don't know but the rain does make it worse, says I, and by this time I got my hand on her shoulder. "One word brings on another," says I. "Sometimes," says she, "Laf. Mr. Bucket, what an ugly night for a wedding." That, thought I, now's my time, so says I, "Miss Polly, mother says you've got my liver." "Oh no, Mr. Bucket, it may be your heart." This stump'd me, and if I could have got my hat, I believe I would of left off then, but kept talking on, full of life, but I couldn't forget the liver—so I told her I would come again before long, and she said she didn't care if I did; so I got my hat and started home, after the usual good night, and all the way home I kept thinking about the liver, but I thought nobody would know it, and I would rub off. But Polly told all the galls of it, till mother got hold on't, and I guess as how I got a gentle scolden—but the people all luffed at me so much about it, that I got right mad with Polly and haint spoke to her since, and every time I see a young feller without experience, after the galls, I think of the fine weather and the liver.

A newly arrived Irish girl was recently ordered by the family with whom she had gone to live, to crack some shell barks. The lady stepped to the head of the stairs, and called, and called—"Peggy!" "Marm!" "Have you those nuts cracked yet?" "No, marm." "Well, make haste—we are waiting for them." Another half hour elapsed, and no nuts appeared. "Peggy! Peggy!" "Marm!" "Come, come! have you not those nuts cracked?" "No, marm! they ain't half cracked; and me tathe are a most out o' me head alridy!"

FIFTY CENTS ON THE DOLLAR.

A gentleman in Great Jones street, who is in the habit of sending his boots out to be blackened, could not find his polished understandings, one day last week. He sent his little son to the darkey's cellar, but he returned saying that it was shut up. The gentleman went himself in his slippers, and after rapping some time, he heard a noise inside. Presently a window was partially opened and Cuffee's head poked through.

"I want my boots," said the gentleman. "Sorry to 'form you, massa, dat you can't have 'em," replied Cuff. "Fac is, I is busted, failed, broke, cleaned out, jammed up, split, I is."

"But, Cuff," said the gentleman, "I can't help that. I must have my boots." Cuff finding his customer rather riled up, poked out of the window one of the boots and said—

"Massa, I isn't tellen' no lie. I is clean burst and no mistake. I's taken a inventory of my a'tects, and as I b'lieves on de honor of a gentleman, dat I shall be able to pay fifty cents on de dollar. I is willen' to gib you yours now. Dar it am. Take de boot."

So saying, he slammed the window, leaving our friend to go home in his slippers, with one boot in his hand—his fifty per cent. on the dollar.

AN INDIAN'S RECEIPT.

Joe Seobasin, a Penobscot Indian, not long since, was sued for the sum of $5, by a white man, before Squire Johnson. On the day of trial, Joe made his appearance and rendered the requisite amount, for debt and cost, and demanded a receipt in full.

"Why, Joe, it is not usual; it is unnecessary," said the Squire.

"Oh yes, me want 'un receipt, sartin."

"I tell you, Joe, that a receipt will do you no good."

"Sartin, Squire, I want 'um."

"What do you want it for, Joe?"

"Oh, s'pose me die and go to heaven—then they say, 'well Joe Seobasin, you owe any man now?' Then me say not. 'Very well, did you pay 'um Ben Sanders?' 'Oh yes, me pay 'um.' 'Well, then, show 'um receipt.' Then me have to go way off down—and run all over it—to hunt up Squire Johnson."

"How do you sell peaches?" asked a young gentleman, of one of the boys who deals in the article. "Two for a cent," was the boy's polite answer. "Two for a cent, sir?" exclaimed the gentleman, with apparent astonishment—for the peaches were very large. "Two for a cent!" and he began fumbling in his pocket; "two for a cent!" and he kept up the search with his fingers—

"two of them great peaches for one cent!" he repeated very deliberately. It was evident now that his fingers did not find what they were searching for. "Two for a cent!" he said once more, in a somewhat lower tone, and turning round to leave the basket. "Two for a cent—well, by thunder!—that is cheap enough, if I only had a cent!"

A negro was brought up before the Mayor of Philadelphia for stealing chickens.—They conclusively proved. "Well, Toby," said his Honor, "what have you got to say for yourself?"

"Nuffin, but dis, Boss: I was as crazy as a bed bug when I stole dat pullet, cos I mite hab stole de big rooster an' nebber done it.—Dat shows 'clusively to my mind that I was laboring under de delirium tremens."

MRS. PARTINGTON'S LAST.

"An act to take the senses of the people! Well, I vow," said Mrs. Partington, "if things ain't coming to a pretty pass; these Legislatures want to take everything from a body; I think they might have left the senses alone, there's precious little of 'em to spare any how," so saying, the old lady dropped her spectacles and relapsed into a profound melancholy.

THE QUEEN OF TERRORS.

Mrs. J., of —, Maine, had a wife of "strong intellectual force," a terrible termagant. When he was on his death bed the village parson came to offer spiritual consolation. "Neighbor," said he, "your earthly career will soon be closed."

"I feel it—I feel it," said the dying man. "You have led," he continued, "an honest upright life, and are, I trust, ready to meet with calmness the King of Terrors."

The old man raised himself with difficulty, and in a feeble voice murmured, "I ought to be able, if the power is ever given to mortal man; have I not lived, for the last long thirty years, with the Queen?"

BROTHERLY LOVE.

"Jack, Jack!" cried a sailor, on board a ship at sea, to one of his companions. "Halloo!" replies Jack; "what is it?" "Your brother's overboard!"

"Overboard?"

"Yes!"

"Blast the luck! he's got my sea boots and monkey jacket on!"

"You want a flogging, that's what you want," said a parent to his unruly son. "I know it, dad, but I'll try and get along without it," said the brat.

CHAPTER XV.

SECOND SEARCH AT CARP RIVER.

Jackson returned to Carp River while the sun was not more than two hours high, and was greatly disappointed at finding no one there. The tracks however assured him that Eb. had been there, and certain unmistakable marks on the sand made him equally certain that the object of his search had also been there. But where were they now? Jackson looked the cabin, the beach, the woods, everywhere near at hand, in vain. Not the first indication of their whereabouts could he get. The excitement of the chase and the search were over. He had laboured hard all day, in the broiling sun. The hope, the almost assurance of success which had buoyed him up, was departed. He counted the loss, and then added to it the expense incurred in the search.—His goods were but partly paid for, and the means he had left would not pay the debt incurred and leave him able to carry on business.

Poverty stared him in the face. His snug home and flourishing business seemed to fade from his imagination as though sliding into nonentity. The recollection of a slender wife and increasing family, and that crushing weight, the thought of sheriffs, poor houses and prisons, came rushing upon him at once.

With all the native harshness of his nature, could Eb. Harris have read his heart now, he would have returned his merchandise to him.

CHAPTER XVI.

A BY-SCENE—RETURN TO MANITOU.

There was one man in Jackson's boat's crew actuated by different feelings. Thomas Jones was fifty-six years old, white bearded, but not bald; had a hard withered face, looking more like old parchment than the human countenance; had been everywhere from Lake Superior to the Gulf, and pretended to a knowledge of all kinds of business; but, nevertheless, could get none requiring more skill than that of an indifferent axman.

Tom had amused the company by telling yarns during the trip, and pretending to manage the boat, at which he proved himself exceedingly unskillful. On first landing he had strayed off negligently into the woods, and while listlessly whiling away the time that others spent in the search, his eye fell upon a fresh cut stump of a small tree. The next moment he perceived that the piece taken out was a small short crotch. His suspicion was aroused, and did not rest till he had traced out the track upon the dry leaves to the very tree where Eb. had stored his goods, and with the ready eye of the backwoodsman perceived by the fresh appearance of the dry leaves, and the slightest perceptible marring of the bark of the tree, to what use the crotch had been put.—He did not stop till he had tracked Eb. to the top of a fallen tree where the crotch was hid, and brought it back, and by the help of it gloated his cold leaden eyes with a sight of the merchandise, which he was already resolved that neither Jackson or Harris should ever possess again.

As they sat around their fire in Eb's cabin, Jackson in moody melancholy, Jones was endeavouring to persuade them that Harris had finally left with the goods for Manistee. This he argued with apparent force was the most probable, as Eb. had married his wife there, and was well acquainted with the traders and Indians.

To make this conclusion certain, Tom asserted that he had seen a boat in that direction about the time they gave chase to the Indians' canoe, and added assertion on assertion, till, if his word was to be credited, he had recognized Eb. and his squaw, the goods piled in the boat in plain sight, and at no great distance off. And the only reason he could give for having kept his discovery to himself was, that the company had discredited some of his tough yarns, "so he thought he wouldn't say anything, but let them find out by their larnen."

Jones' word probably might have passed current for just what, under other circumstances, it was worth; but the great probability of the suggestion, and the ill-natured reason which he gave for having concealed his knowledge of the fact, gained him a kind of credence which finally settled down on Jackson's mind as a certainty. But he was in no small degree exasperated against Jones for having thus suffered the prey to escape him, and much to Jones' satisfaction, declared that he would never again take with him such a traitorous humbug—Jones however acted well his part, and kept up the delusion by affecting both anger and mortification. They started to Manistee early the next morning. Jackson to hurry off to Manistee, and Jones to contrive ways and means for carrying off the merchandise.

CHAPTER XVII.

DISCOVERY OF EB.

Early the next morning Jackson roused his men to start for Manistee Indian Reserve, at the mouth of a river of that name, some sixty-five miles south of Manitou. On going down to the beach the boat was missing. An inferior one was taken in stead; all concluding that Jones had heedlessly left it without fastening, and that it had drifted off in the irregular tide which continually ebbs and flows in all the upper lakes.

Jackson and his party had gone but a short distance before the wind freshened, and with an indifferent boat, and an inexperienced crew, he dared not go forward. The wind was north-west, and he could not go back. He therefore dropped away before it, and in an hour landed in the bay three miles east of Sleeping Bear point.

He had not been long camped here before two persons came suddenly in sight from a projecting point of timber, but a few steps off, and at the first glance he recognised Eb. and his squaw, on foot, and destitute, making the best of his way to his own point of destination, Manistee Reserve. Escape, Eb. could not, and affecting total ignorance of their business, he yielded himself prisoner, with reluctance; not as though in fear, but annoyed.

From Mr. and Mrs. Hall's Ireland. PROCESS SERVING.

Jim was once employed to serve a writ upon a Roman Catholic clergyman, and he did it on a saint's day, at the door of his chapel, when the place was thronged with his people. The manner was this:—He persuaded an excise officer that he knew where a private still was at work, and induced him to obtain the assistance of a party of military. As they approached the chapel, Jim directed the troops to remain a little in the background, while he advanced to reconnoitre, placing them just where the glitter of their bayonets could be seen from the rising ground. He then went forward boldly and put his paper into the priest's hand; and perceiving a hostile movement among the crowd, he pointed to the military, to whom he speedily returned, and whom he subsequently led "a fool's march" in search of the whiskey still that had, of course, vanished.

Another of his doings he told us at greater length. A country gentleman had eluded all Jim's efforts to "serve" him. "I've known," quoth Jim, "a matter of fifteen simple writs against him at one time, besides greater law in the courts; there was more paper, wax, and red tape wasted on him than on any other man of his age. And yet," added Jim—and an expression of the most triumphant cunning animated his bitter eyes—"I nabbed him at last; and I'm prouder of it than of anything I ever did. He was called 'the foxy-fighter.' There were ever so many of us on the watch, trying to give our bits of paper into his hand; but he was too 'cute for them. One thought he had found the right way, for he climbed to the top of a great old-fashioned chimney that belonged to his bed room, and stole softly down it, and the nearer he got to the ground, the plainer he could hear the foxy-fighter discoursing his housekeeper; and at one time he got a little frightened, thinking of the treatment he might get; but he had friends among the servants, who, though they would not let him in, would not see him murdered. So down he went; and when he put his foot on, as he thought, the bottom, what should he find but an iron grating across—so there he was stopped. "A thief in the chimney," roars the fighter, and in less than no time he was surrounded with fire and smoke; and between the burning and the smoking it was many a long day before that man was able to go up or down a chimney again. I was often on the watch for foxy; and at the back of his house there was a little square yard, and over one corner of it hung the bough of a large tree. I wondered where he could go for a little air, and I found he took great delight in the gray of the morning in tending a few ducks and geese that gabbled about a pond in the midst of the little yard; he had no dread over him by reason of the high wall, as he could take in the whole wall at a glance, and sure enough he had an eye like a process.

Well, I turned it over in my own mind, and got a nice large goose egg, and round one end of it I wraps the copy of the writ, and letting myself down from the wall a little before the break o' day, I placed the egg just on a tuft of grass, and seated myself in the branch of the old tree watching; and presently out comes the old fox, after first looking through a peep hole he had in the door. "Ah! ah!" he says, and the ducks and geese came running out; and presently he spies the egg. "That's the grey goose," he says again, "that always has such consideration for my breakfast," and seeing the bit o' paper about the egg, in course he peeps into it; and "what's this?" says he, turning pale and looking about him. "It's the copy," says I, roaring from the tree, "and here's the original;" and while he runs in for his pistols, didn't I show him the heels o' my brogues!"

On another occasion Jim, finding insurmountable difficulties in the way of a desired interview with a gentleman who was always upon "the watch," arranged a very scandalous mode of accomplishing his purposes. He bought a brace of remarkably fine trout and a fishing rod; and, for the first time in his life, practised the "gentle craft" of the angler; throwing his fly across the river at a point where he well knew the gentleman might see him from his parlour window. Presently down came a message to Jim to the effect that he was trespassing, the water being preserved. This was exactly what Jim anticipated; so he sent his best respects to his honour to say that he cared only for the sport, and not for the fish, and hoped he'd be pleased to accept the trout he had already caught.—The bait took; the gentleman was pleased to find that fish so large were in his river, and returned his compliments that "lunch would be ready at three." When the fellow had partaken heartily of the hospitality he proceeded to business, and horrified his host by the production of a writ!

Jim was placed under precisely similar circumstances with a gentleman less wily, because more confident, who lived in a wild and remote district, from which escape was out of the question, and well the party knew that no process-server would dare venture into it. But Jim was too cunning for him. He ascertained that the gentleman's "custom in the afternoon" was to drink his punch in a rural alcove. Suddenly, Jim presented himself before the astonished sight of his victim, while enjoying the dolce far niente, and, making his bow, begged his honour's pardon for the intrusion. His honour knew Jim well, and coolly asked him at what rate he valued his life. "Faith, sir," said Jim, "at very little if I meant your honour any harm, but at a great dale this present writing, for it's to do you a service I came here, else I think I'd just as soon put my ugly body betwixt the horns of a mad bull." After some further questioning, Jim told his story. He came to warn his honour that one of his own servants was a "rap," and meant to betray him; that he (the said Jim) had been tempted by an offer of ten guineas to serve a writ; that he had taken the bribe; but would "as soon cut his own tongue out as serve it upon his honour."

The gentleman's suspicions were disarmed; he gave the fellow plenty of whiskey, and, putting a guinea in his hand, thanked him and bade him good by.—Jim had hardly gone a hundred yards, however, before back he came, laid the guinea upon the table, and declared he couldn't and wouldn't rob so good a gentleman, and again departed minus the gold. Upon this, he was summoned to return, and questioned; when, with all the appearance of generosity and rectitude, he declared that, if he took the money his honour would think him a "cheat," who came pretending to have the power of serving a process on him when, in reality, he had nothing of the kind to serve. The scene lasted for some minutes, the gentleman assuring Jim he was satisfied and obliged, and entreating him to pocket the gift, and Jim declared he could not do it and be suspected of cheating him. At length the discussion was brought to an issue by Jim, violently excited, exclaiming the only way to settle the matter was to convince the worthy gentleman of his probity by showing that he was not pretending to have a writ when he had one; so, drawing it from his pocket, he showed both copy and original to the worthy man.—“You see, sir,” said he, “that I was not a cheating blackguard; and now, if you are content, I’ll accept the guinea.” It was of course given; Jim departed in peace, taking especial care that the “copy” was left behind, went directly to his employer and swore the service.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, MAY 1, 1851.

The late persecution has made a considerable delay in the issue of this No. of the Islander. We know all our readers will excuse us, but it irks us that we are thus interrupted.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE—HUNTING MORMONS LIKE WILD BEASTS—EMPLOYING INDIANS FOR A POSSE.

The O’Malley clique have commenced a new persecution of the saints at this place, with the aid of Mr. Granger, Sheriff of Mackinac county, but we believe without any aid or encouragement from any respectable part of the community. The process of persecution is a descent upon Beaver by the Sheriff with criminal warrants against thirty-eight persons, backed by a posse of thirty intoxicated Indians, and eight or ten drunken Irishmen, armed with guns.

Such an assault has a public officer made upon the peaceable inhabitants of this place, without one act of resistance, and before the slightest attempt was made to execute his process. Among the very grave charges upon which men are thus hunted like wild beasts by savages and drunken Irish, we are informed that Mr. Samuel Graham is charged with the very grave offence of standing by while somebody had some unpleasant words, and not interfering.

Mr. Charles M. O’Malley is the Justice to issue warrants on such charges, and Mr. Sheriff Granger is the man to take every third man in community on such pretences, and carry them fifty miles from home to be tried by an Irish bog trotter, who has declared beforehand that he will regard no testimony in their behalf.

Some of the prisoners, when taken into custody, were put in charge of the vilest drunken scoundrels that can be found on the wild borders, who were suffered to beat, abuse and threaten them at pleasure. They even went so far as to gather a rabble around Mr. Joshua L. Miller, who asserted with many assurances that the party who had been sent to arrest his father, Gen. Geo. Miller, when he was at work in the woods, had murdered him, and exhibited some portion of his clothing which they had prepared for the purpose, as evidence of the truth of the assertion.

From time to time the Indians were despatched off in large parties, drunk, and well supplied with arms and ammunition, and led by such worthless wretches as

Jim Lambert, to hunt over the adjacent islands, on which it was supposed that some of their victims might be found; and Mr. Sheriff Granger, hearing the savages boast how many white men’s scalps they had taken, and that they would now have Mr. Strang’s also, sent them on their errands of blood.

Such a perversion of ministerial administration; such a prostitution of the powers of office to the purposes of crime, was never heard of in a civilized country.—Let the citizens of the United States take the matter home to themselves. Let them imagine a tribe of wild savages, first made drunk, then provided with arms and ammunition, and then let loose upon the peaceable inhabitants of a town, with authority to make prisoners of all the town officers and principal public men, have them whooping about your houses and swearing death against the men they are ostensibly sent to arrest, and you have but a faint picture of the scene that Mr. Sheriff Granger has created for his malignant pleasure upon Beaver Island.

Whether this new outrage will meet with any rebuke from the public press, or the constituted authorities, we have yet to see.—Certainly we have seen nothing in the past to assure us that it will. Last fall the most vicious statements were made in many political papers, charging us with gross frauds in the election of the Hon. J. P. Irvine to the Legislature, and of the county officers.—A Legislative investigation was had, in which we had no opportunity to offer one word of testimony, and yet the Legislature treated the complaint against us as merely ridiculous. Not one of all the papers that made and reiterated the accusations has retracted them.

We have a right to presume that in this case rumour, not on the wings of the wind, but in the columns of the newspapers, will accuse us of a thousand crimes, and when a legal investigation vindicates us of all, not one word of rebuke will be heard for the false accusation—none for hunting us like so many wild beasts.

If the Mormons were really guilty of high crimes, this mode of proceeding against them is a violation of all law and of the principles of civilized government. It is the duty of the Sheriff, his officers, and the posse comitatus, to protect as well as to arrest the accused, and herein is the obligation of non-resistance. But in this case the Sheriff, instead of calling on the power of the county to arrest resisting culprits, calls on a tribe of Indians to murder those who do not resist an arrest, and have never shown the slightest disposition to do so.

And what is the crime for which the lives of a whole community are thus put in jeopardy? Nothing but going with a Constable to assist in arresting a criminal with arms in his hands.—Mr. Constable Field went with a few of his neighbours to arrest E. J. Moore on a criminal process.—Moore, with his friends, after firing several guns upon the Constable’s party without effect, escaped to the woods, and fled to Mackinac, where he obtained warrants against them for that act, and that is the head and front of their offending. That is the crime for which Mormons are hunted like wolves.

We appeal to the sympathies of humanity—to the common feelings of the human heart against such wickedness. But we do not appeal as men begging for favours. We only ask some approximation to justice. And if we are not to have it, we only wish to be told so. We are able to take care of ourselves, by the help of God. If it is a settled principle that officers exist in this region not to protect but to murder us, we wish to be told so distinctly, and we will look to the rest.

THE CONTESTED ELECTION.

At the election of members of the Michigan Legislature last fall, Dr. J. D. Irvine was elected for Mackinac county. The O’Malley clique, however, not at all satisfied with this result, induced Mr. Edward Guilbault, the opposing candidate, to contest the election. As the first step in the contest Michael Douseman, one of the Board of County Canvassers, and who, from being the wealthiest man in the county, assumes to be Chairman, refused to sign the certificate of election. Mr. Childer, the Canvasser from this place, signed it, and the county Clerk added his name and seal to the certificate, in due form.

Upon this, Douseman, assisted by Tully O’Malley, a kind of universal ex-officio, made out a new canvass, leaving out the entire vote of the township of Peaine; and certifying the election of Guilbault.

O’Malley and Guilbault came up here to trump up some kind of evidence on which to justify the rejection of the Peaine vote, and we presume got an affidavit of Mr. Praiseworthy Bower, and one or two Paddies, but to what effect we have never learned.—Armed with these, Mr. Guilbault went through the forests, on foot, from Mackinac to Lansing, to contest Mr. Irvine’s seat.

The scene at Lansing was ludicrous. Mr. Guilbault failing to produce any evidence against the election of Irvine, claimed to have his seat also, under that provision of the new Constitution (not yet adopted at the time of his election) that the Upper Peninsula shall hereafter be entitled to three members! Failing to be elected in his own county, he claimed that he was nevertheless elected for the several counties comprising the Upper Peninsula.

Poor Guilbault! It was too bad to thus make him the football of the entire State, just for the loan of his negative virtues, against the Mormons. How the vanity of Douseman and the O’Malleys was ever convinced that they were too infamous to accomplish their malice in their own persons, is more than we can tell. But by some means they did determine to rely on the better character of poor Guilbault, a man who, though rather troubled with fidgets and vapours, is nevertheless free from all the grosser traits of their characters.

To say nothing of the loss of a winter’s time, and the money expended, it was quite too much for such a man to be brought up here in December, frightened with the false tale that the Mormons were under arms, so that he dare not pass their houses, taken back to Mackinac in a fish boat in a furious December storm, and then trotted off on foot, through the winter’s snows, to Lansing, just to give the grave members a laugh at his request, that inasmuch as he was not elected for Mackinac county, he might represent that and all the adjoining counties.

The Detroit Tribune is out on the people of this place in a lying and blackguard article, for the crime of refusing to vote the Whig ticket at the last fall election. He is quite mistaken in the premises. Some of the Mormons in this place were anxious to vote the Whig State ticket, but could not learn who was in nomination. Usually refraining from political matters, and having no political associations formed since they came into the State, the Whig leaders had not spirit enough to so much as send them a ticket.

The manner in which they have been abused and belied by the Tribune and Advertiser has well nigh cured them of the predilection. A party which builds itself up by belying everybody who do not support its nominations, is unfit to be supported. But here is the article:—

THE MORMONS ON BEAVER ISLAND.

Beaver Island, which is the largest of a collection of group of that name, lies in Lake Michigan, about twenty-five miles above the Straits of Mackinac. It contains about twenty-eight thousand acres of land, (a large portion of which is still in the hands of Government,) and forms one organized township.—There is, upon this island, a population of about five hundred, the larger proportion of which are Mormons. Those not professing this belief, are styled Gentiles.

A bitter fight has sprung up between the Mormons and Gentiles, and the same state of hostility that marked the course of this sect in Illinois and Missouri, toward other sects, and vice versa, exist at this place.

It is doubtless true that the Mormons, as a sect, have suffered wrongs and persecution at the hands of individuals and whole communities, through the influence to some extent, of prejudice, and, to a certain degree, through their own misconduct. This persecution has not been blessed with benign results upon the temper and character of the sect generally; but has resulted in making its leaders, and some of its members, vindictive, tyrannical and dishonest.

The leaders of the Mormon colony on Beaver Island, are unprincipled and worthless men, and the chief, or “King,” as he is styled—a man by the name of Strang—is an open profligate and blackguard.

Early in the last summer, a rumour was current through the island, that the Indians, half-breeds, fishermen, and other inhabitants from the surrounding islands, were to make a descent upon the Mormons, and drive them off. The Mormons, consequently, organized themselves, fortified their “Tabernacle,” or church, planted ordnance in front of it, and blazed away a bold defiance at the world in general. No attack took place; but the rumour was sufficient to furnish Strang with an available argument in favour of a “strong Government,” which argument he immediately applied, and procured himself to be proclaimed “King” for his natural life, and G. J. Adams, (an theatrical performer,) Viceroy, in case of his death, until the succession should be filled. The sequel has shown that—was not large enough to hold them.” These persons have again left, as all faithful subjects were forbid from harbouring them. Mrs. Adams, the wife of the Viceroy, remains upon the island; and it is supposed that it was in consequence of certain infamous propositions made toward her by Strang, that his Majesty was arrested, and thrown into jail at Mackinac, on a charge of bigamy; from whence he was liberated, in order to enable him to return to his “Kingdom,” and exercise “the glorious privilege of a freeman,” by making his subjects vote the Loco Foco ticket, under pain of death, and without distinction of age, sex, or race.

The entire township organization of the island is in the hands of the Mormons, though Mr. Bowers, the Township Clerk, who refused to sign the election returns, in consequence of the gross frauds, is little more than one in name.

The sect are forbidden by “King Strang” from buying Government land. They are, however, encouraged to pillage Government timber, which they do with great industry.—When this laudable enterprise is accomplished, they will probably pull up stakes, and go elsewhere, as they can make nothing there by farming.—Det. Trib. Dec. 11

Has the Tribune ever found occasion to belabour his wealthy neighbours for pillaging government timber, who have cut over thousands of acres for lumber without purchasing or improving an acre? We have never seen it. We believe other men are not called pilferers for cutting timber on government land, without permission. We had permission from the United States District Attorney at Detroit, a Whig public officer, to remove timber from here, when nearly all the lumber vessels on the lakes were in the hands of United States Marshals for pillaging timber from government lands. And that founded on the very just reason that the timber cut here, was cut in the regular course of improvement for farming purposes.

The assertion that we can make nothing by farming is a lie, which we care little about. If the Tribune can make all the land pirates credit it, they may be less disposed to rob us of it than in Missouri and Illinois. Be that as it may, the Tribune need not flatter himself that we shall leave here. And as for the charge of industry in cutting timber and blazing away at our enemies when they come to rob us, we plead guilty on both, and intend to keep doing so. We will even acknowledge further, that this people are so united in their confidence in Mr. Strang that he seldom makes a proposition but it is unanimously concurred in. We think another man cannot be found on earth so honest that all his acquaintances will acknowledge him the standard of right, and so just that no one will open his house to one he has condemned.

The weather during the past winter has been quite varied in the same latitude in the United States. In New England and New York there has been good sleighing all winter, while in Wisconsin, in the same latitude there has been little or no snow. In looking over our exchanges we observe that there has been colder weather 250 miles south of here, than at this place. The winter has been very mild here. There was no sleighing till past the middle of Dec., which continued till the tenth of March. The lowest range of thermometer was two deg. below zero, and that at but one observation. The weather since the disappearance of the snow has been fine. Gardening and putting in field crops is being extensively attended to.

TOWNSHIP MEETING.

The township meeting for the township of Peaine came off the 7th ult., and presented an example of unanimity we believe without a precedent in the annals of the State. But seventy-one votes were cast, which is a good vote for a non-contested canvass. A majority of the elected received every vote, and the lowest had sixty-seven; but four short of the whole vote. The meeting was conducted in as good order as any religious meeting. The Senate of the United States never presented better order. Liberal sums of money were voted for highways, schools, &c., and wise township regulations concerning animals running at large, and for preserving the fisheries adopted.

Mr. Sheriff Granger, when he made his descent upon Hog Island, in pursuit of the Prophet, took away the boat and provisions of the company, and left Mr. David Bates there to perish of starvation. He survived twelve days, subsisting on the heads of the fish that had been dressed for the dinner of the previous day, and some raw hide our looks. He was finally taken off by a party of friends, out on a reconnoitre, and is safe.

We are informed that the Prop. Allegheny was run into by the Ohio, about a week since, off Saginaw Bay. The Allegheny was crossing the Ohio's course when the accident occurred. Both received considerable damage.

The May No. of the Lady's Book is on our table, stored with its usual rich productions of popular writers, and embellished with splendid engravings. We have not received the Dec. or Jan. Nos., and but a few days since received the Feb. and March Nos. The April No. has not yet come to hand. It gives us satisfaction to lay before our readers a notice of such a valuable work. It should be upon every lady's Book Table.

By the politeness of Capt. Bryant, of the Prop. St. Joseph, we received New York papers to April 19th.

It is proper to say that Mr. Sheriff Granger has made an explanation, which is an excuse for the course taken by him, to wit: his predecessor had represented the people of this place as being very dangerous, for when he was up here last fall he saw several joints of stove pipe, and was so much excited that he believed that they were cannons. Mr. Granger is not afraid of being hurt personally by the people called Mormons.

CONSISTENCY.

There are a lot of hypochondriacs in and about this place who make great pretensions to goodness and refined sensibility, trusting in the vituperation and abuse they bestow on others for the promotion of their own selfish ends. Among this class may be found those who are continually ranting against the Mormons on Beaver Island. The "Islander" also comes in for its full share. These saintly faced apes declare they will not have it in their houses, nor even take it into their hands; but at the same time they will hang about the post office, saloons, hotels and stores, and if a subscriber chances to be reading a number, they will stew at and quiz him until they get him to read it aloud, while they devour its contents with as much greediness as a buzzard does carrion.

JAKE.

Mackinac, April, 1851.

GREAT STORM IN NEW YORK.

The City Flooded.—On the 18th of March last a severe storm passed over New York, doing great damage to the shipping and landings in the vicinity of the city. The tide rose to a fearful height in the North and East Rivers, covering the docks, and fears were entertained that some of the Collins Steamers had received serious damage.

On Washington, West, and other streets, many families have been driven from their homes, and some compelled to take refuge in the station houses. One family was rescued from a cellar, in which they nearly lost their lives. The goods along the shore were submerged by the heavy tide, which made a complete breach over them and several of the docks.

Beds, bedding and other articles may be seen floating about the docks, and, altogether, the scene is one which has never been witnessed here by the eye of man.

On the Jersey coast much damage is feared, as the storm must have been severe in that quarter.

DIGNITY.

This sketch is as full of truth as an egg is of meat. The best evidence of a vulgar man is to be found in the quantity of dignity that he wraps himself up in. In the opinion of such men, the only way to set a proper value on yourself is to treat with contempt every body else. Such men are generally rich and very ignorant. The "biggest feeling" man we ever knew was a swelling blockhead, who imagined that the tragedy of Hamlet was written by Damon and Pythias, and who couldn't tell, without consulting his cale meum, whether Shakespeare was the author of Shakespeare.—As a general thing your dignified men are great asses. They keep at a distance, that their neighbours may not discover what counterfeits they are. Across the street, a galvanic watch appears to be bullion. Men are like ships—the more they contain, the lower they carry their heads.

The following love epistle was handed to us for insertion by a friend in Mackinac. Comment is unnecessary—it speaks for itself:—

Mackinac, March 4th, 1851.

MY DEAR E.—Along with a heavy heart I venture to lay before you the promptings of a troubled spirit. There are moments when solitude and a seclusion from the bustle and gaiety of the cheerful and happy are preferable to the most fascinating assemblage. I perceive that there is a kind of pleasure in an interrupted communion with one's own thoughts when the spirits are borne down with disappointment and sorrow, and instead of seeking means to dissipate grief, one loves to dwell on the object that is the cause of it. When your answer to my proposition fell on my ears with the melancholy words, "I hope you will try to banish the idea from your mind," it perfectly grieved me, and it was with the greatest effort that I could recover myself from the shock. But heart melting as the answer was to me, I was forced to admit that more than romantic love, truth, constancy and fidelity which actuated you, and much as before I esteemed you. Never did I—H—appear to me so invaluable, so captivating, so noble as on that occasion. Oh! what man that would not give worlds to gain the affections of such a woman! of such an angel! Who so true to the dead, could prove false to the living?

My dear E.—when I was first introduced to you at Adam's, (pardon me for mentioning the wretch.) little did I think that in you were centred those qualities that adorn our mothers' sex, but are an honour to human nature. For I confess to you that what I have heard of the society of Beaver Island, I did not form a very excited opinion of the moral character of the ladies of the place, although I was aware there were many honourable exceptions. But when I perceive from my own experience with what effort and resolution you tore yourself from those people, and the moral contagion in which they are immersed, so dangerous, to the innocent and innocents, and that too against the urgent solicitations, entreaties and enticements of a fond and confiding brother, the conviction of your transcendent worth, purity, chastity and peaceful virtuous forced itself upon me. From that moment you became the absorbing subject of my thoughts, until I formed a deep, indelible, pure, holy love and attachment for you. Yes, E.—I love you with all the ferveur, ardour, warmth and devotion of which man's heart is capable—a love that is not tainted with the utmost selfish or worldly consideration.

I love you, E.—for yourself alone. I love you for those estimable virtues that can only give beauty, loveliness, attractions, dignity and charms to your sex, and would give empires, were they at my disposal, to possess you. I know your character and your worth, and know how to appreciate them—the height of my ambition would be to make you happy. I know that in you meet those solid and shining virtues that neither the frowns of capricious fortune, the ingratitude or deception of false friends or the corruption of a wicked world can either weaken or affect. The rude storm of adversity may beset your path, clouds may gather thick around you, but your queenly virtues like a bright meteor in the heavens will receive additional splendour from the surrounding gloom. E—, you are the only woman whom I ever addressed in the language of passion; you are the only one to whom I ever offered my hand, my affection, my love, my heart, my ALL. If you knew the heart that loves you, whose every pulse beats to you, you would not treat me thus coldly.

"I dreamed in morning slumbers
That in the heavens afar,
Glowing with beauty bright and clear,
There was a queenly star,
That from its vaulted canopy
Looked kindly smiling down on me.
That virgin star, to view it,
My frame and spirits fired
With passions mad'ning ecstasy,
And all my soul aspired
To gain that gem in night's calm hour,
When lo! it changed—it was not there.
Oh that that peerless gem of light
Would cheer again my spirit's might."

E—, you may have the homage of those who are far more worthy of your hand than myself, but never can you have the tribute of a more sincere heart—one who can appreciate your wants than the one offered. I would not be so cruel as to ask you to forget the object of your love, for he must have been a noble soul to have made such a lasting impression on your faithful heart. I would not expect you to love me with that ardour that you loved him whom death so rudely snatched from you—for perhaps it is impossible that you would ever love another with the intensity that you loved him. If you would not like to live at Mackinac, as I own I do not like over well myself, I would go with you to Ohio, G. T., or somewhere else more congenial to our spirits, where we might spend our days in mutual love together.

When first I made up my mind to make known my passion to you, I did not have the remotest doubt of success, although that opinion was not based on any idea of my own superiority; but now I feel that I am justly punished for my presumption. I know that I have urged an answer with too much haste and impatience, which is a proof how ignorant I am in the art of courtship; but had I known your reason, I would have acted differently, as I would not have pained you for the world. But you told me not to consider that as a final answer, that you thought as much of me as any one being. I would those consoling words could only shield my bosom from the fatal arrows of despair. Now my dear E—, all that I wish is that I may yet hope—I care not how long you may keep me in expectation, but bid me hope. I am happy, and although I should cease to hope, I never can cease to love you. If you care anything about me, can I not have your society alone during your short stay at Mackinac? All my thoughts are with you. I am your admiring and affectionate lover.
TULLY O'MALLEY.

TOWNSHIP ORDINANCES.

Be it ordained by the qualified electors of the Township of Peaine, in Township meeting assembled—That cattle, sheep, swine, horses, asses, mules, goats and any other domestic animals, be, and are hereby prohibited going at large in the highways of said Township, and for the violation of this ordinance, the following penalties shall be incurred and recovered according to law, to wit:

For every day that any of said animals shall go at large contrary to this ordinance, from the first day of April, to the last day of October in each year,

For every Stallion horse or ass two years old and upwards, going at large contrary to this ordinance ten dollars,

For every other horse or ass and for every mule going at large contrary to this ordinance, five dollars,

For every ox going at large contrary to this ordinance five dollars,

For every other of neat cattle going at large contrary to this ordinance three dollars,

For every horse or ass three months old and upwards going at large contrary to this ordinance five dollars,

For every other swine going at large contrary to this ordinance three dollars,

For every buck sheep or goat going at large contrary to this ordinance five dollars,

For every other sheep or goat going at large contrary to this ordinance one dollar.

From the first day of November in each year till the last day of March following, one half the several above mentioned amounts shall be incurred and collected for all cattle going at large contrary to this ordinance.

The penalties above mentioned for the violation of this ordinance shall be incurred by and recovered of the owners of said animals, or any person having them in custody so turning them at large, contrary to this ordinance: also

Be it ordained, that the Supervisor of said Township, cause to be erected at the expense of said Township, a good sufficient and substantial fence for the impounding of cattle, sheep, swine, horses, asses, and goats which may be found going at large, contrary to law or any by law of said Township.

That said fence be located in the vicinity of Beaver Harbour, on such lot as the Supervisor shall select.

That the Supervisor secure the title of the lot when he locates said fence, to said Township, on such terms as he shall deem just: and,

Whereas, the fisheries of Peaine Township have been seriously injured by the carelessness of Fishermen, (particularly Fishermen coming from abroad, to fish for the season only,) in the manner and time of setting gill nets, and leaving dead fish and offal upon the beach and in the waters of the Lake,

It is therefore Ordained in conformity with the provisions of chapter 16, sec. iv, of the Revised Statutes of the State of Michigan,

That the boundaries of each Fisherman shall be ascertained, designated and established by the Supervisor of said Township, and a record of the same kept on file with the Supervisor and Township Clerk.

Any person not an actual resident or citizen of the Islands which compose the Township of Peaine, who shall fish upon any of the fisheries within the boundaries of said Township, without the permit of the Supervisor of said Township, shall for each offence forfeit and pay the sum of ten dollars.

Any person who shall trespass upon the fisheries of others whose boundaries have been established by the Supervisor, shall for every offence forfeit and pay the sum of five dollars.

Any person who shall leave fish, the offal of fish, or any other matter injurious to the fisheries, upon the beach or in the waters of the Lake, or so near as to harm or affect the water, or shall otherwise injure the fisheries, shall for each offence forfeit and pay the sum of five dollars.

The Supervisor may grant permits to non-residents upon the following conditions:

If the applicant shall pay into the hands of the Township Treasurer the sum of ten dollars, to be held in security for the right use of such location as may be designated in the permit, and upon the return of said permit to the Township Treasurer, endorsed by the Supervisor, the Treasurer shall refund for dollars to the said applicant, retaining the balance for the use of the Township.

Adopted unanimously at the annual Township meeting held at the store of M. M. Aldrich, on the seventh day of April, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifty one.

THE FARMER'S SONG.

The camp has had its day of song,
The sword, the bayonet, the plume,
Have crowded out of rhyme too long
The plough, the anvil, and the loom!
O, not upon our tented fields
Are Freedom's heroes bred alone;
The training of the workshop yields
More heroes true than war has known!
Who drives the bolt, who shapes the steel,
May, with a heart as valiant smite,
As he who sees the foeman reel
In blood before his blow of might!
The skill that conquers space and time,
That graces life, and lightens toil,
May spring from courage more sublime
Than that which makes a realm its spoil.
Let labour, then, look up and see,
His path no pith of honour lacks;
The soldier's rifle yet shall be Less honored than the woodman's axe!
Let Art his own appointment prize,
Nor deem that gold or outward height,
Can compensate the worth that lies
In tastes that breed their own delight.
And may the time draw nearer still
When all this sacred truth shall heed,
That from the thought and from the will Must all that raises man proceed!
Though pride should hold our calling law,
For us shall duty make it good;
And we from truth to truth shall go,
Till life and death are understood.

THE TRUE GOD.

The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob is our God; this is his name forever, and this is his memorial unto all generations. He created the heavens and the earth, and all things that are in them are the workmanship of his hands. He created man in his own image, that he might have dominion over the earth, and over the beasts of the field, and over the fowls of the air, and over the fishes of the sea.

Man, being in the likeness of God's person, they all recognize him as their Lord, and fear him as a God. And, notwithstanding his degeneracy, he has retained so much of the divine likeness, that beasts, birds, and fishes, fear him, and his power is over them as a mighty one: It is diminished as he has departed from the likeness and perfection of his creator: and that spirit of rebellion, which man has received so redundantly, he has communicated to them also, that they rebel against him, as he rebels against God. Yet the fear of man is on them continually; and his dominion is over them throughout the earth.

God conversed with Adam as a familiar friend; and walked with Enoch, who was faithful unto him in the midst of a corrupt race: he communed with Noah, the father of a new world; and covenanted, by his own oath, with Abraham, the faithful.

He commanded a fiery law, with a voice of thunder, in Sinai: the earth quaked at the tread of his foot: the rustling of his garment was as low thunder; and his voice as a mighty thunderbolt: the beaming of his face was as the sun in the morning; and the flash of his eye as the fierce lightning. The nations trembled at his presence; and the tribes said, Not unto us; not unto us, Oh Lord God, but unto Moses, be thy voice known.

For they heard the voice of God, as the voice of a trumpet; and as loud thunder: and they saw the lightning; and the mountain smoking; and they felt the earth tremble; and they fled far away, crying, Not unto us; not unto us; but unto Moses, declare thy law, Oh God, and we will obey his voice and live; for, who shall abide in thy presence?

His word was made known to the prophets, and his sacraments were established in Israel. Kings ruled in his glorious name; and the nations who forgot him were destroyed.

He hath appointed everlasting life in the Lord Jesus; and given the keys of death and of hell unto him who, alone among mortals, hath kept his glorious word in all things. He hath chosen him the first born among many brethren; for he is the first begotten of the dead, and hath the keys of the resurrection, and of life forevermore.

He maketh his apostles the witnesses of his law, unto the nations; and of his gospel unto every kindred, and tongue, and people. His word is among men; and the revelation of his power in the midst of the earth.

The Lord our God is glorious in his perfections; there is none like him. The gods of the heathen have no voice: neither do they see, nor understand. The god of Babylon the great, the mother of churches, before whom all her daughters bow down, is naught; he is as wind, and vanity; he can neither be seen, nor heard, nor felt; he hath no dwelling place: where shall any abide with him? Passionless, is he; and can neither love the good, nor hate the evil: who shall adore him, or fear him?

Without members and parts; he cannot hear, see, feel, smell, or taste. Neither can he speak, nor come unto those that worship him, nor smite the disobedient and rebellious.—Handless, footless, mouthless, eyeless, and earless; a shapeless chaos, conceived in the imagination of the vain: ye shall not fear him, nor bow down unto him, nor adore him.

The Lord our God hath an incommunicable name; never polluted by the breath of the ungodly: which none can know, but he who ministereth in his holy sanctuary; by which he revealed himself unto Moses; and in which he establisheth this law, for an everlasting covenant.

God alone hath immortality. Adam, the first of men, the Ancient of days, the great Prince; Abraham, to whom God gave an everlasting possession; David, whose throne was established as the days of heaven, forever; all died. Enoch, who walked with God, and was not found, because God took him; and Elijah, who ascended to the throne of God, in his own fiery chariot; shall return to the earth to sleep with their fathers. The change which is sealed upon all the sons of Adam, shall come upon the faithful, who stand on this earth, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel. And he, the prince of the kings of the earth; who, in days to come, shall speak with the voice of a trumpet, and the dead shall hear his voice and live; died once, that he might live forevermore. He praised God, who alone hath immortality, that he would not leave him in the place of the dead: he preached the gospel to the spirits in prison, and obtained the key of life everlasting; but God alone liveth forever: the eternal ages are unto him as moments to us: infinities, as units to the mathematician. Our God alone hath immortality. Thou shalt love him with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

God alone hath omniscience. He clothe himself in light as a robe: his ministers, who at midday, are as a flaming fire in the dark night, are blind before him; he apprehendeth the motion of the atom which floateth in the invisible element, and discerneth the speck in the centre of the star, which the light of the sun hath not reached since the day that the sons of God shouted for joy that the earth was created, as a mountain in the eye of mortals.—He never sleepeth; his eye doth not; and there is no darkness before him. Our God alone hath omnipotence. Thou shalt love him with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

God alone hath omnipotence. He looketh upon the nations, and they melt in the fury of his countenance; he frowneth, and the mountains dissolve to smoke; the valleys are consumed in the breath of his nostrils. He spoke, and worlds were created: he thought, and they were lost in space. Earthquakes are but the whisperings of his voice; the rustling of his attire causeth lightning, and thunder; and with the shadow of his garment he bloteth out the sun. The Prince of the kings of the earth; by whom the world was created; and who liveth and reigneth forever; receiveth power from him, and rendereth it unto him. Who shall stand before him? Our God alone hath omnipotence. Thou shalt love him with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

God alone is omnipresent. His presence filleth the immensity of space as a point. In the midst of the bottomless pit, is he: the pavilion of his feet, is the face of the earth: the stars, are his home: his breath, is fragrant odour to the blessed, in the highest heaven; and it enliveneth the crumbling frame of the dead. The rays of the sun, have not found his bourn; nor the light of the stars, the place he inhabiteth not. His rest outstretcheth the lightning; it leaveth the morning ray behind it; and his speed is more rapid than the thought of angels. Our God alone is omnipresent. Thou shalt love him with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

God alone is one. There are choirs of angels; hosts of spirits; and multitudes of men: but God hath no fellow. A great king, is to him as the unseen spawn before the monsters of the deep; Methuselah, as the ephemera of a day: the most glorious spirit, is bodiless, and a breath. And the Lord Jesus, who created the earth, and redeemed it; whose kingdom filleth the earth, and the heavens; possesseth but a speck, amid the stars he made. He alone is one. Thou shalt love him with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. Thou shalt adore him, and serve him, and obey him; and beside him, thou shalt have no other God; for he alone hath immortality, and omniscience, and omnipotence, and omnipresence. He alone is one; and they who obey his law, shall be like him.

THE FARMER—A BEAUTIFUL PICTURE.

The man who stands upon his own soil, who feels that by the laws of the land in which he lives—the laws of civilized nations—he is the rightful owner of the land he tills, is by the constitution of nature under a wholesome influence, not easily imbibed from any other source. He feels—other things being equal—more strongly than another, the character of a man as the lord of the inanimate world. Of this great and wonderful sphere, which fashioned by the hand of God, and upheld by his power, is rolled thro' the heavens, a portion is—his from the centre to the sky. It is the space in which the generation before him moved in its round of duties; and feels himself connected by a visible link with those who will follow him, and to whom he is to transmit a home. Perhaps his farm has come down to him from his fathers. They have gone to their home; but he can trace their footsteps over the scenes of his daily labours. The roof that shelters him was reared by those to whom he owes being. Some interesting domestic tradition is connected with every enclosure. The favourite fruit trees were planted by his father's hand. He sported in his boyhood beside the brook which still winds through the meadows. Through the field lies the path to the village school of earlier days. He still hears from his window the voice of the Sabbath bell, which called his father to the house of God, and near at hand is the spot where his parents laid down to rest, and where, when his time is come, he shall be laid down by his children. These are the feelings of the owner of the soil. Words cannot paint them—gold cannot buy them; they flow out of the deepest fountains of the heart; they are life-springs of a fresh, healthy and generous national character.—Edward Everett.

LAMARTINE AT HOME.

The correspondent of the Presbyterian, who writes from Syria, in his last letter has an episode, which relates to the French poet and statesman. It seems that Dr. C., one of the founders of the Protestant College at Malta, accompanied M. and Madame de Lamartine to their property near Macon, and spent some days with them there. The return of de Lamartine to his estate, Dr. C. said was the most affecting scene that he had ever witnessed.

The peasantry had prepared a great fete for his arrival, of the following description. The house was completely covered with garlands and devices; and when, at the appointed hour, M. and Madame de Lamartine arrived, the little girls in their Sunday clothes, first presented themselves, offering them a basket of the finest fruit that can be found anywhere; one of them delivered a charming little address, then they gave place to the boys, carrying likewise a basket of fruit, and what was more original, a basket filled with fresh butter, sculptured, so to speak, and representing M. and Madame de Lamartine seated in a chariot drawn by sheep. Other children brought a lamb, a little sucking pig, entirely covered with silk ribbons and flowers, a superb calf, and in a large cage, a hare. These peasants, who cultivate nothing but the vine, had purchased these gifts with their own money.

A peasant, mounted on a cart, made an excellent address, thanking God for bringing M. and Madame Lamartine back into the midst of them. Lamartine replied in a speech against socialism. The French peasantry, said he, are calumniated, when they are accused of want of attachment to their landlords: he desires no other proof of this than that which was before his eyes; it is the part of the landlord to do his duty. The day was closed by a grand dinner, given to those honest people by M. and Madame de Lamartine.

In the evening, the peasants came and asked a favour: it was to permit the cure, next morning, to celebrate, in the chapel adjoining the mansion, a thanksgiving service for the happy return of their Landlord and Lady. In connection with this circumstance, Lamartine learned that on the morning after his departure for the east, a mass was collected, at the request of the peasants, for the purpose of praying God to preserve them during their journey. After this statement, I need not say that both Lamartine and his Lady do much for the benefit of those who are around them. Madame Lamartine takes an active interest in the schools, and has a fellow-feeling with her husband for improving, as much as possible, the condition of the peasantry.

VERIFICATION OF A DREAM.

Just two weeks since, last Saturday night, says the Boston Transcript of the 12th inst., a young lady residing in Hanover street of that city, retired to bed at her usual hour, and in her usual cheerful happy frame of mind. After having fallen asleep, she had a frightful dream or vision. She dreamed that her brother, who was in the western part of New York, was killed, and his body horribly mangled in death. This dream seemed so vivid and real, and impressed her mind so forcibly, that she awoke, and even rose from her bed, and walked her room weeping in great anguish. Another lady, who was sleeping in an adjoining room, was awakened by her wailings, and on going into the room to ascertain the cause, found her sitting in a chair weeping. The lady endeavored to soothe her fears, and finally persuaded her to retire once more to bed, and try to forget the dream. The next morning the young lady received a telegraphic despatch, announcing that her brother, Mr. Wise, a brakeman on the Western Railroad, had fallen from the cars on one of the freight trains near East Chatham, New York, was run over and instantly killed.

A WONDERFUL CHILD.

"You see, grandma," said a hot-bed specimen of juvenile precocity, "that when I suck this egg, or more properly speaking, when I extract the nutritive matter by a sudden and peculiar action of the muscles of the throat, I first make an incision in the apex, and then a corresponding aperture in the base." "La suz alive! why heaw things du change?" exclaimed the old lady, in such surprise that her old spectacles dropped off at the flash of her almost sightless eyes; "when I'ze-a gal, all we done was to make a hole in each end, and daoun it went. My stars! this 'ere child haint got long to live, I know, sartin."

"Tommy," said a toping father, a little "tight," to his son—"Tommy, my boy, mind your daddy, and ever walk in his—hic—footsteps." "That might do, perhaps," replied the juvenile, "if I wanted to go into the cork-screw or Virginia fence business." The paternal guardian raised his cane, but Tommy dodged it.

GETTING USED TO IT.

Somewhere about here, writes a Southern correspondent, lives a small farmer, of such social habits that his coming home intoxicated was once no usual thing. His wife urged him in vain to sign the pledge. "Why you see," he would say, "I'll sign it after a while, but I don't like to break right off at once; it ain't wholesome. The best way always is to get used to a thing by degrees, you know." "Very well, old man," his helpmate would rejoin, "see now if you don't fall into a hole one of these days, while you can't take care of yourself, and nobody near to take you out."—Sure enough, as if to verify the prophecy, a couple of days after he tumbled into a well, and after a deal of useless scrambling, shouted for the light of her eyes to come and help him out. "Didn't I tell you so?" said the good soul, showing her caprill over the edge of the parapet, "you've got into a hole at last, and it's only lucky I'm in hearing, or you might have drowned, you old dog! Well," she continued, after a pause, letting down the bucket, "Take hold." And up he came, higher at each turn of the windlass, until the old lady's grasp slipping from the handle, down he went to the bottom again. This occurring more than once, made the temporary occupant of the well suspicious. "Look here," he screamed in fury at the last splash, "you're doing that on purpose—I know you are!" "Well, now I am," responded his old 'oman tranquilly, while winding him up once more. "Don't you remember telling me it's best to get used to a thing by degrees? I'm 'fraid if I was to bring you right up on a sudden, you wouldn't find it wholesome!" The old fellow could not help chuckling at the application of his principle, and protested he would sign the pledge on the instant, if she would lift him fairly out. This she did, and packed him off to "swear in," wet as he was. "For you see," she added, very emphatically, "if you ever fall into the well again, I'll leave you there—I will!"

A HOOSIER IN BOSTON.

The editor of the Cincinnati Inquirer, writing from Boston, tells the following story:—Western folks feel in this city as though in a straight waistcoat, for their personal liberty is so hedged in that freedom of action is gone.—Those addicted to smoking, especially, feel twice the desire to promenade the streets, cigar in mouth, from the fact that the enemies of the fragrant weed have forbid its use in the streets of Boston. I heard an excellent anecdote of the adventures of a live Hoosier in this city, which illustrates the municipal regulations of this mummy dissecting city, better than a book. After a good dinner at his hotel, he ignited a cigar, and started out for a stroll. After a few steps a policeman tapped him on the shoulder, and informed him that the penalty was two dollars for the offence of smoking. He promptly pulled out a five dollar bill, and received a three in change. Proceeding on his walk, in a few minutes he next met a beggar girl, who asked him for something to eat. Recollecting that he had the remains of a hunk of gingerbread, the peculiar diet of Hoosierland, in his pocket, he generously proffered it to the mendicant. Again was he tapped on the shoulder by the policeman, and told it was against the laws of Boston to give away offal, as it all belonged to the city, and requested two more dollars for his grave offence. The three dollar bill was drawn out, and when the policeman tendered one in change it was refused by the Hoosier, with the cool remark, "No, keep it; I shall want to whistle in a few minutes."

A lawyer, the other day, went into one of our barber shops to procure a wig. In taking the dimensions of the lawyer's head, the boy exclaimed:—"Why, how long your head is, sir?"

"Yes," replied our worthy friend, "we lawyers must have long heads."

The boy proceeded in his vocation, but at length he exclaimed—Lord, sir, your head is as thick as it is long! The lawyer mizzled.—Etc.

CHIPS FROM THE ALBANY DUTCH-MAN.

Good men may change—bad men don't—Time will tarnish the best steel—but who ever saw gold rust? A scamp may join the church forty times, but you will never learn him to forego the luxury of cheating. The only habits a rogue changes when he experiences religion are those made by his tailor.

The best crop a man can raise, after all, is a crop of children; provided he only educates them properly. We know a friend of ours who derives an income of sixteen hundred dollars from four boys, which is a better yield than any farm in the country turns out. As a matter of money, therefore, matrimony is among the most productive pursuits that men and women can engage in.

BREACH OF PROMISE CASE.

A charming, business like young milliner who had been in the habit of tripping into a bank for her small change, made her visit the other day, and said—

"Good morning, Mr. Cashier. I have come for five dollars worth of your small change again."

"I am sorry to say, Miss—, that we cannot accommodate you," was the reply.

"But here is your promise to pay on demand."

"I cannot help that."

"Then you break your promise?"

"Certainly."

"And with impunity?"

"To be sure, our charter allows it."

"Allows you to make as many promises as you please, and break them when you please?"

"It may be so construed."

"Ah, dear me, how I wish I was a bank and had a charter."

"Why so?"

"Because I have made a promise—not a promise to pay a five dollar note, which I would blush to break—but a promise of my very self to a person that I do not love."

"Why don't you break it then?"

"Ah, Mr. Cashier, there's the rub. Unlike your bank, I have no charter, and should be sued for breach of promise, and heavily fined."

A GIANT.

The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer says, that he lately saw three hundred thousand dollars in gold eagles and Washingtons, in the hands of one man. They say that man is a printer, but certainly his hands must be larger than those of all the printers in our office. Our private opinion is that the gentleman must be very—strong in his arms.

"Is there anything really the matter with you?" said a physician to a person who had sent for him.

"I don't know how it is," was the reply. "I eat well, sleep well, and have a good appetite."

"Very well," said the doctor, "I'll give you something to take away all that."

A KNOWING BOY.

A minister at church approached a roguish looking little urchin, about ten years old, and laying his hand upon his shoulder, thus addressed him:

"My son, I believe the devil has got hold of you."

"I believe he has, too," was the significant reply of the urchin.

A NOVEL TEST.

BY A COUNTRY EDITOR.

"Every man," says Burke, "has his price." There is a great deal more involved in this than is generally supposed; and hundreds who indignantly reject it as a libel on human nature, show, almost daily, that they have their price. The sentiment just quoted is most commonly understood to mean, that there is a certain money consideration, by which every man may be tempted into a violation of honour and honesty. But this is only its most palpable and grossest signification; and, thus interpreted, it will not bear a universal application. Hundreds and thousands, who are constantly giving evidence, in one form or another, that they have their price, would reject, with indignation, any attempt to bribe them from integrity, no matter how large the consideration offered.

What then does it mean? is asked. Simply, that every man, by nature, has an evil will; and that there is some form of temptation which, as an easily besetting sin, will draw him aside from a just regard to his neighbour's rights, unless he be fortified by a true religious principle formed in his mind after he has attained the age of rationality and freedom. And it is not speaking too boldly to say, that no man reaches the age of rational freedom, without, in something, small or great, being drawn into acts that were not just to others. In proof thereof, let every man examine his own heart and review his own life. Beyond this, no evidence is asked to substantiate the position that every man has his price. One will yield a point of principle, in order to secure some trifling advantage. Another will speak ill of his neighbour, from the fact that it makes him feel pleasant to do so—the pleasurable feeling is his price. Another, whose love of reputation, or desire to have the credit of being a truly honest man, in order to forward his interests, leads him to strict rectitude before the world, will withhold a sixpence or ghillins of the full amount really due to a porter, coal-heaver, wood-sawyer, or other poor persons from whom he has received a service, and experience a feeling of satisfaction at having saved the paltry sum. Is there a question of the fact, that men have their price? None. Hundreds and thousands thus sell themselves daily and hourly, who would reject, as an insult, beyond atonement, an offer of money to make a false accusation against another, or betray a friend, or his country.

Let every one examine his own heart, and his own conduct, and see if, in certain acts of his life, so secret as almost to pass without reflecting upon them, he is not, for a consideration felt to be desirable, parting with honor and integrity? The examination is worth making.

But we are saying too much by way of introduction to a little affair, that occurred in a certain town that shall be nameless, and, perhaps, rendering obscure, by many words, what we wished to make clear.

Mr. Justice Gregory was a city magistrate, in the town of Y—, and had the reputation of being an honest man. He was soken of as "Honest Squire Gregory" by every one; and, knowing the reputation in which he was held, he felt not a little pride thereat. And few men were more strictly honest than Squire Gregory. In his dealings, he was careful to regard other's rights as well as his own, and more frequently called and paid such bill as happened to be against him, than waited for them to be sent in.

"I don't know how others view the matter," he used to say; "but, for my part, when I have enjoyed the property obtained from another, it seems to me that the least I can do is to pay for it."

"If money is not worth calling or sending for, it is not worth having," was the usual reply to this. "I wish I could get my own by simply calling for it. You may be sure I would think it no hardship."

"Perhaps not," returns Squire Gregory; "but that doesn't remove the simple obligation under which every man lies, to pay what he owes the moment he has the ability to do so. The waiting-to-be-called-on system, is grounded, say what you will of it, in a secret reluctance to pay what is justly due. Now, I don't call that a clearly honest feeling. I know what it is—I've felt it hundreds of times; and have to fight against it now. We all have our weaknesses."

It happened, one day, that Squire Gregory and his character for honesty, formed the subject of conversation among several persons, one of whom was the editor of a newspaper published in the town.

"Squire Gregory," remarked the latter, after listening for some time to what was said; "is no doubt, one of the most honest men living. Still, I do not believe him to be strictly so."

"While I believe," said one of the company, "that Squire Gregory could not be tempted, in the value of a sixpence, to wrong another by withholding what was justly his due, or by over-reaching in a bargain."

"Understand, gentlemen," said the editor to this, "that I think as highly of Squire Gregory as any man in town. But I am satisfied, that I can put him to a test, as well as every man present, that will show a palpable disregard to the plainest and most common sense views of honesty. The fact is, and its no use trying to deny it, we all, as Burke says, have our price. That is, there is appertaining to us all some weakness, or easily besetting sin, that leads us, almost unawares, into acts by which our neighbours suffer wrong either in person, property, or reputation. Or, if not led into direct acts, we are betrayed into omissions of duty by which others are equally wronged."

"Then we are evil of necessity," says one.

"No, not of necessity, but by nature."

"What is the difference?"

"Necessity would make the state a fixed one; but inherited evil propensities may be overcome; and it is the duty of every man to search into his heart and life, and to see in what he is tempted of this nature to do wrong to others. When he has discovered the lurking devil in his breast, let him cast him out, as he can if he will."

"Humph! That's your theory! And so you don't think our Squire Gregory honest in every-thing?"

"I do not."

"Well, all I have to say is, if he is not a strictly honest man, I don't believe there is one in the world."

"I don't know how that may be," replied the editor. "I only know that we are all born with propensities to seek our own good at the cost of even the rights of our fellow men; and that no man rises superior to this evil state, without many and sore struggles with the evil will that is ever prompting him to unjust actions. Even the best are not wholly good."

"No; of course not."

"Nor do I believe Squire Gregory to be perfectly honest in all his dealings with the world," added the editor.

"Then you think him wilfully dishonest in some things?"

"No. I do not say that. But I am well satisfied that I could probe him in such a way as to show that, by a neglect, almost wilful, he has wronged for years and still wrongs his fellow man. That he has enjoyed, in fact, the goods of another without paying for them."

"That's rather a grave charge."

"I know it is."

"Will you make it to his face?"

"Certainly."

"Then suppose we all adjourn to the office of the squire, and have the point settled."

"No objection in the world," said the editor.

So the party went to Squire Gregory's office. As they entered, one of them said:—

"Good morning, squire! We come to try a case in your office."

"Ah! Who's the defendant?"

"Yourself."

"Me!"

"Yes. Our friend B—, here, says that you are not a strictly honest man, and we've brought him to prefer the charge to your face. So consider yourself on trial."

The blood mounted to the very forehead of Squire Gregory, at such an unlooked for and scandalous allegation.

"Not honest! What does he mean?" said the squire, in a disturbed manner.

"Just what he says," returned the editor, smiling.

"Oh! you're trying to play off a pleasant joke," said the squire, brightening.

"No—not by any means," was replied. "B— is perfectly serious. In fact, he won't admit that any man is, by nature, strictly honest. And avows that even the best sometimes permit themselves to be led away by some easily besetting sin, into acts of wrong to others."

"Perhaps he is right there," said the squire. "But I should very much like him to put his hand on any act of mine, by which another has suffered wrong. Let him point to the fact, and I pledge myself to make restitution and reparation instantly."

"There friend B—; there's a chance for you," said one and another.

"And you are willing to be put to the test," said the editor, addressing Squire Gregory.

"Oh, certainly! Speak out. Lay your hand upon the act, and I will acknowledge it."

Still, though the squire said this promptly, his countenance wore a serious and retrospective aspect. He was, plainly enough, running over the past, to see wherein he had been derelict.

B— smiled, half humorously, and then said:—

"Squire Gregory, I think I have seen at your house the Saturday Post?"

"You have."

"And the North American Review?"

"Yes."

"And Godey's Lady's Book?"

"I take all three, and have done so for these six years."

"And, I suppose, wouldn't be without them."

"No. The Review is a work I read with much interest; and, as for the Lady's Book and Post, my family would be lost without them."

"So I should suppose. Now, squire, pardon me for one more question."

"Ask as many as you please."

"Have you regularly paid your subscription to these three works?"

"Ye-ye-yes! No-n-no, not exactly," stammered out the squire.

"B-b-but, it is not my fault."

"And you are sure of that?" was the editor's calm interrogation.

"I have not been called upon by the collector of either publication for two or three years. The money has always been ready, and would have been paid down had the bills been presented."

"A thousand miles, squire, is a good ways to send a collector for a bill of two or three dollars," said the editor.

"True. But mine is not the only account due, of course."

"No, of course not, much to the grief of the publishers. But suppose there are half a dozen bills to collect in our town, would it pay to send a collector a whole thousand miles?"

"It might pay a collector to come from the nearest town, to which, in the course of his regular collecting tour, he had progressed."

"It would cost him to come from the nearest town here, remain a couple of days, and then return say five dollars. Could he do it for less?"

"No, I think not."

"If, then, he collected twenty dollars, he must deduct twenty-five per cent, for expenses, besides commissions. After that, how much do you think would be left for the publishers?"

"Why don't they appoint local agents? That would save this expense."

"And have to send a collector, in the end, to get the money out of the local agent's hands."

"Let them appoint honest men."

"How is a publisher, a thousand miles away, going to know who is honest? He may select thirty honest men in thirty different places, and ten dishonest men in ten other places. The ten dishonest agents will collect promptly, and keep the money; and the thirty honest ones will have perhaps, too much to attend to matters of their own, to look after the publisher's interests. I've seen the practical working of this system, and know precisely what are its evils."

"Then I can only say," returned the squire, "that publishers must have a pretty hard time in getting what is justly their due."

"You may well say that, Squire Gregory."

"What is the remedy?"

"For every man who takes a periodical to feel that he is bound in honour and honesty to pay for it."

"I feel that; and yet I have not paid for the Lady's Book in two years, nor for the Post in three. I have not had an opportunity."

"Rather say squire, that your honest and honourable feelings have not been permitted to come into activity."

"There has been no opportunity."

"Perhaps you are mistaken as to that."

"Oh, no. Not at all."

"Would you embrace the opportunity now if it were presented?"

"Certainly I would."

"Give me a sheet of paper and pen," said the editor.

"They were handed to him, and he sat down and wrote:—

"MR. L. A. GODEY,
DEAR SIR:—Enclosed you will find twelve dollars. Six, for my

CHAPTER XVII.

STAY NEAR SLEEPING BEAR.

Jackson exulted in having caught Eb, with the pride of a Roman General to whom the Republic had granted a triumph.—Commencing with a harsh, cold hearted volley of blackguardism, he treated him as the rabble are expected to treat a condemned culprit in the public stocks.—Making no allowance for the provocation, none for the possibility of his innocence, and disregarding those feelings of the human heart which excite sympathy, even for criminals in jeopardy and suffering, he poured upon him a continual volley of abuse and threatenings.

Not at all satisfied with this, he attempted to extort from Eb. a confession of his guilt, and of the place of concealment of the goods, by threatenings, and even resorted to some small degree of violence. But his harshness and ill temper had roused the spirits of his men, and one of them, known by the cognomen of "Dutch Hank," with a rough unprepossessing exterior, but an honest heart, squared up to Jackson prepared to "twig him in the peepers" for fighting a prisoner, who had nobody to back him.—High words ensued, and Hank, strong in his prejudices as he was honest in his intentions, though before bitter against Eb., having once enlisted on Eb.'s side of the controversy, was soon heartily engaged in his defence.

From simply undertaking to maintain that a prisoner should not be beaten without law or evidence, he soon satisfied his own mind at least of the entire innocence of Eb. The boatmen sided with him, and some one suggesting that they had no process for Eb., they hesitated about holding him prisoner. Louis Roby, another of the boatmen, who, having lived with a country pettifogger, had obtained a share of the logomachy of that profession, considerable captiousness, and the slightest possible knowledge of the different forms of action, seeing the tide setting in Eb.'s favour, discoursed with ignorant positiveness about the action for false imprisonment which Eb. could maintain for his arrest, till not even Jackson himself dared retain him as prisoner.

When first arrested, so confident was Jackson's assertion that Eb. really supposed some positive fact had transpired, fixing guilt upon him. He soon learned, however, that Jackson was destitute of evidence, and that he had no track of the goods. His want of confidence in men, growing out of the ill treatment he had received, rather than skill in manoeuvring criminal matters, had carried him through the ordeal of Jackson's inquisition, and putting on a quiet, unpolished but resolute dignity, he turned as though he had been injured by a wasp sting instead of an arrest for crime, and pitched his own camp not ten rods from Jackson's, disdaining to ask even the favour of a coal of fire to kindle with, but striking fire with flint, steel and spunk, and proceeding in all things as though not a soul was near. Jackson was confounded. All his calculations of human nature failed to give him the slightest clue to the matter. But he gave up that he was on the wrong scent, and laid down with a heavy heart, again giving up his goods as lost. To the same conclusion the boatmen had come, and Jackson being restless, and a light breeze from the south springing up in the evening, it was readily agreed to return to the North Manitou, which they reached by midnight. Eb. was again left alone, and again in conscious security.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TOM JONES' EXPEDITION TO CARP RIVER.

Soon after Jackson left the Manitou for Manistee, Tom Jones got a fellow labourer in the wood chopping business of the name of Ab. Hazzard out aside, and commenced feeling of him as a partner in the business of secreting, and if unavoidable, appropriating Jackson's goods. Without tracing the course of his feeling, suffice to say that he ventured the information that he knew where the prize was, and engaged Ab. to accompany him to Carp River to remove them.

Ab. was stout, shiftless, cowardly, and of a suspicious and faithless turn of mind. When Tom informed him that he had removed and hid the boat that was that morning missed, for the purpose of using it in securing the goods to himself, and proposed to go immediately, Ab. was alarmed at the sure suspicion and obvious danger. He would not go. Tom however continued to ply him through the day, and in the darkness of the following evening rallied him to the sticking point.

Long before break of day the following morning Tom and Ab. started with the lost boat for Carp River, ignorant that Jackson had already returned, he having got in after they turned in.—They were missed by breakfast time, and suspicion next to assurance charged them with having gone with the lost boat.—When Jackson became acquainted with the circumstances, he immediately guessed that his goods had gone in the boat also, having been concealed in some thicket on the Island the mean time.

This suspicion he made an accusation on Tom and Ab., with the same positiveness with which he had before accused Eb. But the robbing had become an old story. His harshness of manner and positiveness of assertion destroyed the sympathy he otherwise would have obtained, and no one but himself took much interest in the matter. He could not learn a single fact or circumstance giving a clue to where Tom and Ab. had gone, and out of funds, worn out with anxiety and discouraged, he took a boat that stopped that day and went home.

Mean time Tom and Ab. had a pleasant trip to Carp River, reaching there soon after the sun was up, and went immediately to Eb.'s secret store house, cut it down, and loaded the goods into the boat they came in. What should they do next? Though they had the goods, they were but stolen property. It just occurred to Ab. that as the thief had not been certainly found, finding the goods in their possession would be pretty strong evidence against them. The thought of sheriffs, courts and prison grates left him room for no other.

Where to go, or what to do with the goods, he knew not.—Unable to overcome Tom's resolution, or to quite resist the promptings of his own avarice, he proposed to take the goods back to Manitou and deliver them to Jackson, for the best reward they could bargain for; a proposition containing all the elements of a popular compromise: for it is an essential element of a compromise that each party should either do or suffer wrong as the price of foregoing or forgiving the wrong of the other. But Tom was an old hand in such jobs, and was fast, 'neck or no joint,' for the lot of goods; he was indeed willing that Ab. should back out, but the goods were to be removed, and he could not spare him till that was done.—They remained at Carp River till the next morning, engaged in coaxing and quarreling.

ABSTAINING FROM FOOD FOR A LONG TIME.

Can any one account for these wonders?—The singular history of Cicely de Ridgeway, found in records of Towers of London, occurred in the reign of Edward III. She was condemned for the murder of her husband. She remained forty days without food or drink. The king granted a pardon—her abstinence was considered miraculous.

The Cambridgeshire Farmer's wife was buried under the snow for ten or twelve days, during which time she swallowed nothing except a little snow.

In the Medical Essays for 1720, the case of a young girl is recorded, who, in consequence of the sudden death of an indulgent father, fell into a state of tetanus, could not swallow food or drink for thirty-four days; and subsequently for a period of fifty-four days—yet she lost but little flesh.

Hildanus, Haller, and other physiologists, have collected a great number of similar cases, though the abstinence was often of longer duration, some of them extending to sixteen years. But their cases were so loosely written and attested, that we cannot place much reliance on them.

The different volumes of the Philosophical Transactions contain numerous cases of the same character, apparently drawn up with scrupulous accuracy, and supported by the best kind of evidence. We there read of four men who were suddenly buried by an excavation of earth, under which they were employed. The earth covered them in a manner which left them free to move about for some little distance.—They had free access to a spring of water; and were not extracted for twenty-one days, during which time they tasted nothing but water. They all lived.

The same journal records the case of a young man who drank very freely of cold water when in a violent perspiration, and was, thereby, thrown into an inflammatory fever, from which he with difficulty recovered. But the fever left him with a dislike for all kinds of food. At the time this account was drawn up by his physician, it is stated that he had not tasted anything but water for eighteen years. Several persons who saw the young man suspected imposition. To test the correctness of their suspicions, it was agreed that he should be confined closely for twenty days, having access only to water. At the expiration of the time, no change was manifested in his appearance, which, it is said, was uniformly good. In most of these cases it appears that water was used; but Hildanus mentions a case where both solids and liquids were abstained from for sixteen years.

One of the most singular, and at the same time the best authenticated cases on record, is that of Jane McLeod, published in the Philosophical Transactions, by Dr. Mackenzie. She was thirty-three years old at the time the case was recorded, and had had epilepsy, and tetanic affections for the eighteen years preceding.—The power of speech and swallowing was lost, and with it all desire to eat and drink. She was confined to her bed, slept much, passed nothing from her system, except some blood from her nostrils, which seemed to come from the lungs. She had occasional periods of relaxation, when the muscles employed in swallowing would be disposed to act. On a few of these occasions, and after several months of abstinence, she would be prevailed upon to swallow a few crumbs of bread, soaked in water, in the hollow of her hand.

With these few exceptions, and even in these cases, most of what she swallowed was immediately ejected. She lived many years without food or drink. She lay motionless most of the time, though she lost none of her freshness of countenance; she had a regular but feeble pulse, and a fulness of muscular development. Dr. Mackenzie visited her for about nine years, at the end of which time she had slightly improved. Before the history of this case was sent to the Royal Society, it was read to the parents of the patient and certified to by the minister of the parish, all of whom were persons noted for their excellency of character; also by several persons, including the sheriff and justices of the peace of the town.

A great multitude of hypothesis, conjectures and opinions, have been offered in explanation of these wonderful phenomena or anomalies. The medical world has never given any satisfactory explanation of them. Suppose we try to give one. If it be incorrect it will do no harm. It will be observed that in most of these cases, if not all, the patients were persons whose nervous organizations were deranged; they were epileptic or tetanic patients. Disease had made inroads or changes in their constitutions.—We know so little of the laws which govern the nervous system, or so little, in fact, of the causes of animal life, that it will be presumptuous in us not to confess much ignorance on the subject.

We know that certain animals will live a long time without food. We know that toads have been found impacted, and alive, in solid blocks of crystalized marble, that must have been a century or more in forming, and where they could have had nothing more in the shape of nourishment than a little moisture. In the most of these cases that we have alluded to, where persons have lived a long time without food, they partook of water. It is possible that from disease or some other cause, the system may be so changed that it can live without any of that food which seems absolutely necessary to sustain it when in health. Besides, water contains two of the four chief elementary substances which constitute all animal bodies.

Oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, and carbon, are the four elementary or simple substances which constitute nine-tenths of our bodies. Three of these are gaseous bodies, and one—carbon—is a solid body. Water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen. The atmosphere is composed of oxygen and hydrogen. So, it will be seen, that a person who freely breathes a pure atmosphere, and drinks freely of water, takes into his system at least three of the chief elementary ingredients which compose his body. True, the weight and solid contents of the body are chiefly derived from carbon, and pure air and pure water contain none of it, as we can ascertain; though the air we breathe, and the water we drink, often contain myriads of animalcula which may furnish at least some carbon to the system.—Ed. paper.

A WORD TO HUSBANDS.

BY A WIFE.

Happy is the wife who can say, with a smiling face and joyful heart, "I have never been disappointed in my husband! He has in all things come up to the high standard I marked out for him, when I chose him from all the world, as the one I could most desire 'to honour, serve and love.' He has ever been as gentle and forbearing, as tenderly alive to all my joys and sorrows, as I fondly supposed he would be when he drew me to his heart, and promised to love and cherish me till death."

Happy, indeed, if she has now no more fear of a harsh or cold reply, an unkind look, or a cutting reproof, than in the days of early love, when every wish was anticipated, and every feeling consulted. How few consider that love is a sweet and delicate flower, which may, indeed, be easily planted, but which demands an ever careful and tender hand to rear it, so that it may bud and blossom in fragrance and beauty—which requires to be sheltered from the frost of indifference, and protected from the storms of passion, that it may not droop and die. It cannot be exposed, like a hardy evergreen, to the chilly blasts of winter: it is a delicate house plant, which needs a fostering hand, and a kindly atmosphere.

Husbands, presume not too much on the strength and unchanging nature of woman's love. Fear to test it, by exposing it rudely to the blighting influence of indifference, peevishness, or passion. If she have a true woman's heart, she has often thought and felt how delightful it would be to yield everything to you: but her spirit will rebel against anything like tyranny in the man she loves. Do not change the persuasive request into a cold demand, if you would preserve the affections you were so solicitous to win.

What a pang is sent to her heart, as recollections of the past crowd upon her, and she thinks of you, as you stood before her in manly pride, the very ideal of her dreams, and tenderly asked to know her every wish, that it might be gratified. Say not, "she is my wife, and all services are justly my due." Your thanks and considerate kindness is more justly hers. Mark well the expression of your wife's countenance. Do lines begin prematurely to trace themselves on the fair and open forehead? Does your wife often hesitate when she speaks to you, as though fearing a rebuke? Then be assured you are embittering her life, and should you survive her, your own life also.

Of what nation is the laughing Khan of Tartary? A Merry Khm American.

When does the carpenter put the wind in debt? When he makes the wind owe.

Why is an old man like one under direction? Because he is man aged.—Boston Trans.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, MAY 15, 1851.

"We shall be compelled to delay our next issue one week, on account of not receiving a supply of paper, which we had ordered."

Of late there has been considerable said in regard to the settlement at this place, and tending to discourage those who wished to locate among their brethren of like faith, and enjoy with them their own religious principles by themselves. Among the things that are set forth to discourage, is this: that the people here are in a state of starvation. Well, be this as it may, what has it to do with others but those concerned? We have yet to learn that the first person has come any where near to starvation on Beaver, although provisions are quite scarce at present, nevertheless there is and will be enough for the present wants of all, notwithstanding it may not all be sweetmeats and pastries, yet it is of the kind that gives health and vigour to those who eat and are thankful to God that he has not forsaken them, but does remember them in his mercy.

There has been considerable excitement of late, occasioned by those who love to tell news, and are more industrious at that than in putting in seed to raise something to feed their children and themselves upon in the coming winter. It is a truth, that should sink deep into every heart, and be borne in mind by every one who lives here, that so long as the people here (we mean those who are permanently located) continue to be an importing instead of an exporting community, so long they will be poor.

The man who raises half the potatoes to support his family, saves a handsome sum. Why? Because there is so much produced that is not to be paid for: and further, it is produced at less expense than to buy it, even at home. A man may chop wood, make staves, or shingles, and after he has them made he has to market them, buy his provisions, &c. In the first place, it costs something to get his lumber or whatever he has to a market, and if at any distance a freight both ways, one on the article to be sold, the other on the provisions he has obtained, which leaves him but a mere pittance for his labour. Whereas, should he spend the time in putting in a crop, he would have raised a greater portion of what he has obtained, at less expense.

But, says one, how can a man put in a crop, when he has no place to put it in? Well, let us see. A. has a small lot which he has cleared up, and a large amount which is chopped, but not cleared, and by a little work in clearing a large crop can be raised. B. has no place to plant a potato or hill of corn till he gets a spot cleared for himself, and by that time it is too late for most crops to get to maturity. Now, A. says to B., here is this fallow chopped, and if you want to plant just pick up and burn what you choose and plant or raise what you can, you are welcome.

B. seizes the opportunity, and raises a good crop. Another, with the same offer, says, I won't do it; for I would be clearing land for A., and have no benefit of it myself. This is unjust; for here you have a chance to raise a crop, and get something of your own to sustain you while you can prepare a spot for yourself, and thus, instead of A. getting all the benefit, you get the first. And yet this is not all. A's land is now ready for another crop, to supply the increasing demand, or to sell for exportation, and thus all get the benefit.

We are glad to see the industry manifested in this that there is, and after a crop is in there is time to prepare another job work. Gardens and early grain are thriving finely. Early sown wheat looks beautiful, and all things bespeak an abundant harvest for the labourer.

We heartily recommend to our readers, and to those going to and from this place, the staunch and well known Prop. Lady of the Lake, as one of the safest boats that call at this harbour.—Her Capt., A. W. ROSMAN, is a gentleman; and also the Clerk, under officers and crew are the most civil and polite of any boat with which we are acquainted. Those wishing business done in order, and in a punctual manner, would do well to patronise this boat. We wish her success.

We learn from the Chicago Tribune that the cholera is raging to some extent in New Orleans. There were thirteen deaths in one week, ending April 13th.

Considerable excitement still prevails in regard to the Cuba invasion. Some, however, think it nothing but wind.

We have seen some very polite notices of the Islander in various papers, for which we return our thanks.

FIRES.

In Palmer, Massachusetts, a fire broke out on the 16th ult., destroying $70,000 worth of property. In Boston, on the 14th, a ware house was burned, valued with contents, at $15,000. In Waterford, Michigan, Mead's mill was burnt on the 13th. Loss of mill, wheat and flour, $30,000. Insured for $13,000.

In connection with the mysterious appearance of a steamer in the Chesapeake Bay, it is rumoured that some 300 men have embarked at Baltimore, to join the Cuba expedition.

The steamship Pacific has made the trip from Liverpool to New York in 9 days, 21 hours, and thirty minutes—the quickest passage on record.

GANG OF COUNTERFEITERS DISCOVERED.

A gang of counterfeiters of U. S. coin has been rooted out at Detroit. The affair creates great excitement, inasmuch as those thus far arrested have heretofore sustained excellent character as lawyers, doctors, farmers, &c., in various towns in the State. The Advertiser gives the names of some thirty of the gang. They belong in the neighbourhood of Jackson and Leoni, and have been the perpetrators of the railroad outrages in that vicinity, burning the Detroit Depot, &c. They were brought into the city on Saturday in charge of the U. S. Marshal.

The Detroit Advertiser states that it has been ascertained that there is a perfect and systematic organization, extending through several States, of which these men were doubtless members, who make common cause in every species of rascality. Among the means for accomplishing their ends they have invented, it is said, an infernal machine for the purpose of blowing up railroad tracks, which is made to explode by the passing of the cars over it.

The same paper adds:

We have obtained the following list of names of those arrested, which includes all. The list includes Doctors, Lawyers, Farmers and others. They mostly belong in the towns of Leoni and Jackson—and live at Jackson, Mich. Centre, Leoni and vicinity.

Dr. Fitch, E. Tillip, Alonzo Holms, Hiram Hay, J. R. Blackburn, Nathan Cradit, Harry Wakeman, John E. Lockwood, Erastus Chapman, E. Rice, Wm. Chapman, L. Champlin, Henry Spaws, James Champlin, Jacob Turrill, L. B. Long, Walcom Hill, A. J. Quinn, John Palmer, Mino Lacrox, Eri Babby, Wm. Corwin, Daniel Myers, E. D. D. Farnham, E. N. Molton, Wm. Warner, Oreen-son Fillen, John Ackerson, Wm. W. Long, Lester Pedfield, Ebenezer Mount, Minor R. Stone, A. E. Barret, Judge Burnett.

The two last live in this city, and O. D. Williams went East a day or two since, and was accompanied by an officer, who arrested him at Buffalo, and brought him back on the Mayflower. Great credit is due to Sheriff Baldwin and his posse of about 60, for the admirable manner in which they carried out the plan of this wholesale arrest. They were assisted by Darius Clark, Esq., and officers of Calhoun and Berrin counties.

LATER. By Detroit papers of day before yesterday, we learn farther particulars of this extraordinary case. The conspiracy was ferreted out by the Railroad Company, who employed persons to get into the confidence of the gang. The late firing of the Niles Depot, was done by one of these agents in order to get their full confidence, due precautions being taken that the fire should be subdued. The Tribune gives the following:

On Friday night, the time it had been agreed to make the arrest in the interior, an extra train of cars was sent out from this city with a large number of officers and assistants, engaged for the occasion, and so well were the arrangements made and carried out by leaving squads along the line, that at Leoni, Michigan Centre, and Jackson, some thirty-three men were arrested simultaneously about daybreak, on Saturday morning, and brought in and lodged in jail on Saturday afternoon. Among the prisoners arrested are THREE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, FIVE PHYSICIANS, ONE JUDGE and FOUR CONSTABLES—the latter belonging to the township of Leoni, not an officer of which, from Sept. vi. down to Postmaster, but is said to be implicated in the affair.

In this city, Washington Gay and Erastus Smith were arrested on Saturday, and in the house of the former were found a variety of implements for burning buildings, and so constructed as to burn one hour or three days before setting fire to the building. By one of these machines it has been discovered that the Depot in this city was fired, last fall, and which resulted in the loss of one hundred thousand dollars worth of property.

These arrests were made on a writ from the U. S. Court for stopping the mail, and counterfeiting U. S. coin; and the prisoners will probably be detained until the next session of the District Court.

From the commencement of detection, eighteen months ago, the landing of the prisoners in the Beaubien Street Jail, the whole affair has been well managed by the Central Railroad officers, who deserve the thanks of the whole community for their endeavours and success in breaking up this wonderful conspiracy.

The Free Press says that more arrests have been made, there being now 37 in jail.

THE RECENT STORM AT THE EAST

Prof. J. Desjardes, and Loss of Life in New York, Boston, and vicinity.—The storm continued for three days, ending on the 17th of April, in New York City, and produced much damage. The tide overflowed several of the wharves, and flooded the cellars in West and South streets, and several poor families living in the cross streets running from Washington and Greenwich streets to the river, were driven from their homes, and had to take refuge in the station houses, and wherever they could find shelter. So suddenly did the tide come into some of the houses, that the inmates fled in terror.

A large amount of property in basements, consisting of flour,ams, butter, &c., was damaged. In some of the cellars the water rose to the height of three feet. At the south ferry the water rose three feet and a half above its usual level, and the cellars on South street were, almost without exception, overflowed. The watchmen removed from them whatever goods could be easily conveyed. The water took its course up to Front street, each cellar on either side being entered. Thousands of rats were driven from their holes, and the boys amused themselves with a hunt. The amount of property damaged is said to be about $100,000.

The Sound steamboats did not arrive at the city, until some five or six hours behind their usual time. Several of the large trees in the Battery were prostrated. At Staten Island the tide was higher than has been known for eight or ten years previously.—The water overflowed the docks. The ferry boats to the Quarantine could not make their last trips on account of the difficulty of getting to the landings. The shad fishermen have lost most of their nets. Those rows of nets which remain—ed in good order produced large numbers of fish. In one row 2,000 were taken.

It is the most severe storm that has occurred at so advanced a period of the season for many years.

In Boston, a large portion of the commercial part of the city was submerged from three to six feet deep. The cellars in Ann, North, Market, India, Broad, Sea, and several other streets, were more or less flooded with water. Families were driven from their abodes, and with no place for shelter. There were several groups of children, varying from the infant to the boy and girl of ten years, thoroughly drenched, near India street.

A large number of vessels were wrecked or damaged, and from one schooner all hands were supposed to be lost. The various railroads centering in the city were more or less damaged, and the passage of the cars interrupted. The ferry boats were obliged to stop running. Chimneys were blown down, and wharves badly injured. The Bee says:—

"We visited one cellar in Battery-march street, where one woman was lying prostrate on a sick bed, the water a foot deep, and fourteen children about in the room, on chairs, benches, &c.—And this with a prospect of a second edition of the tide.

"We visited, during the afternoon, several cellars in Broad street. In one of them we found the floor covered with eighteen inches of water. Three women and several children were in the cellar. The children were placed on the table, while the women stood in the water. They had been in this condition for the whole afternoon, nor did they propose to move. On expressing an opinion that it might open the way for a smart fever, they almost scouted the idea, and intimated a resolution to remain as they were till the water receded."

Incidents of a similar nature occurred in New York. Various estimates of the loss have been made, some think $500,000 too low. Mr. Bennett, keeper of the Light House on Minots Ledge, and known throughout the United States as the inventor of a new style of life preservers, was not on the light when it went to pieces. The two men left in charge were drowned. Marblehead, East Boston, Charleston and all the ports in the vicinity, suffered in like manner. It is said to have been the most violent storm known for thirty years.—Weekly Wisconsin.

VILLAINY.

The Cairo Sun says that, a few days since, two men in a wagon, when within a couple of miles of Jonesboro', Union county, Illinois, asked a farmer who was the heaviest merchant in the town. The farmer mentioned some merchants, and among the number spoke of a Mr. Dishon. They drove their wagon up to Dishon's store, and requested him to permit them to place a box, (which they had in their wagon,) in his store for the night. After urging some objection, Mr. D. finally consented to take the box into his store room. The men then put up their horses for the night, and early on the following morning had their wagon at D's store door to get their box and start on their journey. Mr. D. then mis-

ed a bolt of fine broadcloth from his counter. His suspicions being roused he examined his desk, and discovered that five hundred dollars had been stolen during the night. He then told the men that the box must not be taken from the store until it was examined. They swore that they would take their box, and as they rushed to take hold of it Mr. D. stepped out of the door and locked them in. Having obtained assistance, the door was opened and the men taken. The lid was knocked off, when a stout, daring looking man sprang forth, and the missing cloth, money, some silks, and a dark lantern were found in the bottom. The fellow pretended to turn "State's evidence," and declared he had long sought an opportunity to leave the other men; that to have left them voluntarily would have brought their deadly vengeance upon him; that he had never been detected before; that he remained with them only because he was compelled to do so to preserve his life; that there were now six hundred men in the United States engaged in the same business; and that the last time he was at the general money deposit station the company had over fifteen bushels of gold and silver. He would not be put in the same room with the two accomplices, fearing they would kill him. The two men swore to the officers that it was folly to put them in jail, for they had money and friends; it would take at least one hundred well armed men to guard them, and notified them that they could not possibly be detained three weeks.—New Albany Ledger.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE AT OSWEGO.

As the British steamer Comet, with a full head of steam was preparing to leave this port, her boiler exploded, tearing out the centre of the boat, throwing her smoke pipes overboard, and injuring her so severely that she sunk in five minutes. 2nd Engineer, carpenter, and one deck hand are missing—supposed to be drowned. 1st Engineer and five deck hands very badly scalded. The Captain was on deck, and was thrown below, though but slightly injured. The boat now lies a perfect wreck in nine feet water. The body of one of the hands has just been taken from the hold, but not yet recognized. Oswego, April 21st.

RISE AND FALL OF WATER IN THE LAKES.

A writer, C. W., in the Cleveland True Democrat, who has been at considerable pains to make an abstract of the rise and fall of the Lakes since 1793, controverts the theory of a periodic rise and fall of the water in these Lakes. He says:—

The tables show no such regular rise and fall; and the only theory or mystery there is connected with the subject, is that of the fluctuations of the seasons, operating upon these great ponds as upon all reservoirs of water. When rains and cloudy and cool weather prevail over the lake country, in due time the lakes and rivers rise, and when the reverse happens they sink away.

The results of the rain gauge and the observations of lake levels go exactly together. There is also an annual rise and fall, owing to the seasons. But the subject is a long one, and at present I can do no more than promise to furnish you at some future time some figures showing the various stages of the Lakes since 1819, by recorded observation, from which every one may draw his own conclusions.

A PETRIFIED CORPS IN WISCONSIN.

The Fond du Lac Journal relates the following very extraordinary case of rapid petrification: "On the 20th of August, 1847, Mrs. Phelps, wife of our informant, Abner P. Phelps, died and was buried at Oak Grove, in Dodge Co. On the 11th of April instant, she was taken up to be removed to Strong's Landing. The coffin was found to be very heavy, and the body to retain its features and proportions. After its removal to Strong's Landing, a distance of forty-five miles, the body was examined and found to be wholly petrified—converted to a substance resembling light coloured stone. Upon trial, edge tools made no more impression upon it than upon marble. In striking upon the body with metal, a hollow ringing sound was produced.

"The disease of which she died was chill fever and dropsy, and when the body was buried it was very much swollen. The ground in which she had been buried was a yellowish loam, and the body lay about three feet above the lime rock."

ARREST OF AN OLD DESPERADO.

At the last session of the Circuit Court, in Hillsdale Co., Michigan, a notorious thief and desperado, extensively known as "old Sile Doty," was convicted of highway robbery, and sentenced to Jackson Prison for 17 years. He has spent a whole lifetime in the character of a desperado, thieving, counterfeiting, robbing and murdering; has served one term of two years in the Penitentiary, been pardoned once by the President, and has broken jail nearly one hundred times in the course of his infamous career. He was once convicted of murder in the first degree in Indiana, escaped while going to prison, and afterwards got a new trial, on the ground that the sentence should have been in the second degree, and on this trial got clear by the hard swearing of his particular friends.—Weekly Wisconsin.

ADVICE TO YOUNG MEN.

The following lines, penned by the noble bard of Avon, seem to develop a course of conduct truly worthy of imitation and example. The writings of Shakspear, though frowned down and scorned by the christian world, as being poisoned with infidelity, are still the greatest composition of morality and beauty that ever vibrated from the lyre of any poet. His works, though principally dramatic, yet often approximate almost to inspiration.

"Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportioned thought his act.
Be thou familiar; but by no means vulgar.
The friends thou hast, and thy adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel;
But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
Of each new hatched, unfledged comrade.
Beware of entrance to a quarrel; but being in,
Bear it, that the opposer may beware of thee.
Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice.
Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
Costly thy habit, as thy purse can buy,
But not expressed in fancy, rich, not gaudy:

For the apparel oft proclaims the man.
Neither a borrower nor a lender be:
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
This above all—to thine own self be true:
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

SHORT DRESSES.

The new fashion for ladies dresses is being introduced into our city, says the Syracuse Standard of Tuesday. Several ladies appeared in the street yesterday, with dresses of a very laconic pattern, and pantaloons a-la-Turk. The new style looks decidedly tidy and neat, and imparts to the wearer quite a sprightly and youthful appearance. Syracuse is a great town for all kinds of foolish and odd freaks to take root in. We do not know of a place where the people are so readily humbugged by everything that comes along as this same "salt city." Abolitionism, Fourier, Rochester Rappings, and every thing of this kind appears to flourish as in congenial soil. No wonder, therefore, that the ladies should become affected with the prevailing mania, and that they should adopt something to make themselves as ridiculous as the "Lords of creation."—Ex.

A WONDERFUL PROJECT.

We have on the authority of McLaughlin, recently returned from abroad that there is a project on foot at Naples to extinguish the fires of Vesuvius! It is understood that the bottom of the main or grand crater, is several thousand feet below the level of the sea. The plan is therefore, to dig a large trench or canal from the sea to the crater, the expense of which will not exceed two million of dollars, and thus extinguish the fires that have been burning for thousands of years! It is said that the fine lands thus to be reclaimed, will more than ten times pay the expense of executing the grand design.—Laf. Courier.

There is only one thing worse than ignorance, and that is conceit. Of all intractable fools, deliver us from an overwise man. You may make idiots philosophers—but don't ever think of driving common sense into the heads of conceited persons.

We are not to suppose that the oak wants stability because its light and changeable leaves dance to the music of the breezes; nor are we to conclude that a man wants solidity and strength of mind because he may exhibit an occasional playfulness and levity.

It is said of the Marquis of Townsend, that when a young man and engaged in battle, he saw a drummer at his side killed by a cannon ball, which scattered his brains in every direction. His eyes were at once fixed on the ghastly object, and seemed wholly to engross his thoughts.

A superior officer observing him, supposed he was intimidated by the sight, and addressed him in a manner to cheer his spirits.

"O!" said the young Marquis, with calmness but severity, "I am only puzzled to make out how any man with such a quantity of brain ever came to be here."

DURABLE WHITE WASH.

Take two quarts of skim milk, two ounces of fresh slacked lime; two pounds whiting, or the same proportions for a large quantity.—Put the lime into a stone vessel, and pour upon it a sufficient quantity of milk to make a mixture resembling cream: then add the remainder of the material. When this is done, crumble and spread the whiting on the surface of the fluid, in which it will gradually sink.—It must then be well stirred, or ground, as any other paint. By the addition of any coloring matter, you may make it suit your fancy. It must be put on with a paint brush, and when dry, a second coat should be given. The quantity named, is sufficient for 25 square yards.—Cultivator.

THE SUNSHINE.

I love the sunshine every where—
In wood, and field, and glen;
I love it in the busy haunts
Of town-imprisoned men.
I love it when it streameth in
The humble cottage door,
And casts the chequered casement shade
Upon the red brick floor.
I love it where the children lie
Deep in the clover grass,
To watch among the twining roots
The gold-green beetles pass.
I love it on the breezy sea,
To glance on sail and oar,
While the great waves, like molten glass,
Come leaping to the shore.
I love it on the mountain tops,
Where lies the lawless snow,
And half a kingdom bathed in light,
Lies stretching out below.
And when it shines in forest glades,
Hidden, and green, and cool,
Through mossy boughs and veined leaves,
How is it beautiful!
How beautiful on little streams,
When sun and shade at play
Make silvery meshes, while the brook
Goes singing on its way.
How beautiful, where dragon flies
Are wondrous to behold,
With rainbow wings of gauzy pearl,
And bodies blue and gold!
How beautiful, on harvest slopes,
To see the sunshine lie;
Or on the paler reaped fields,
Where yellow shocks stand high!
Oh, yes! I love the sunshine!
Like kindness or like mirth
Upon a human countenance,
Is sunshine on the earth.
Upon the earth, upon the sea,
And through the crystal air,
On piled up clouds, the gracious sun
Is glorious every where!

AN ADVENTURE WITH PIRATES.

The West Indian seas have long been infested by pirates, of savage atrocity and desperate valour. They are composed of men of all nations,—runaway sailors from English, Danish, French, and Dutch vessels,—though probably, the large portion of them are men of Spanish race, natives of Cuba, or of the old Spanish settlements of the Southern States of America. The attacks made by these men upon our merchant vessels have considerably diminished of late years, chiefly because of the increased activity of the cruisers of Britain and the United States, and also because of the general prosperity of the shipping trade, which renders it easy for any honest sailor to find remunerative employment in the commercial marine.

I had taken a passage on board the merchant brig, Mary, at Belize, and we were on our voyage to Liverpool, when the following incident befel me. It made a striking impression on me at the time, and I shall never forget it. I had seen the captain standing on the after-deck, and, from time to time, eagerly surveying with his glass some object in our wake.—I walked up to him on one of these occasions, and inquired what he was trying to make out, and whether the vessel was in sight,—for my own eyes could detect nothing.

"There is a strange vessel in sight, sir," he answered; "but I can't quite make her out."

"She may be one of those Bristol traders, that were nearly ready to sail when we left port."

"No; she doesn't look like one of that sort. She seems of some bastard rig; but we may make her out by-and-by."

"You do not think we are pursued?" I asked, feeling alarmed, as landmen are usually disposed to be at sea, when they encounter anything that looks mysterious.

"Really, I cannot tell," was his answer; "but I suppose it will be time enough to cry out when we're likely to be hurt."

And so saying, he strode forward with his glass.

Night fell, but the air was so hot and stifling below, that I found sleep next to impossible. If I slept for a moment, I was haunted by dreams of pirates, sharks, and shipwrecks; so I hurried on my clothes, and again sought the deck.

The moon was half way up the heavens, and not a cloud was in sight; countless stars of wondrous beauty and brilliancy gemmed the sky, and the ocean was flooded with their light. A long line of quivering rays lay flashing on the bosom of the sea, like a vein of quicksilver, right under the moon's eye. All was quiet, peaceful and beautiful; it was a magnificent night, such as is only to be seen within the tropics, and not often there.

The winds were almost laid. The gentlest possible breeze filled the sails, just enough to set them to sleep, though not to prevent them giving an idle flap now and then, when the vessel rolled a little heavier than usual on the long swell. Nothing stirred about the deck. The watch had dispersed forward; but I found the captain still on the alert, and again surveying the remote object he had before observed, through his night glass. I did not interrupt him by my questioning; I paced the deck in the delicious night air; but my attention was shortly attracted by the sound of the boat-swin's shrill whistle calling the watch. Orders were given by the captain, and every stitch of sail was crowded on the ship. Each mast bore its full load. As I stood aft, and looked up, the sails seemed, in the moonlight, like towers of snow set against the dark blue sky. In a few minutes all was still again; the vessel seemed to make better way through the water, from the increasing ripple of the wavelets heard against her sides. Drowsiness gradually stole upon me, and I went below again to court my pillow.

I was startled from my slumbers toward morning, by the sound of alarmed voices, and of hurried tramping on deck. I threw on my clothes, and hastened up the companion ladder; on my way up I met black Sambo, the cook. Though nature had put it out of his power to look pale, the poor fellow looked the picture of terror. The pallor of fright seemed positively struggling through his skin, and his eyes had the expression of alarm, which terrifies more than even the pallid cheek or the quivering lip.

"For God's sake," I asked, "what is the matter?"

"Sharks, sa!" he replied in an intense whisper—seemingly afraid to speak above his breath.

"Is that all?"

"All," he instantly said, "Pirates, sa!"

"Where?" I asked, my heart suddenly bounding against my ribs.

"See!" said Sambo, and he pointed aft.

I looked in the direction indicated, and my eyes rested on an object yet at some distance, but enough to strike fear into the stoutest heart. It was "the strange ship," which the captain had been scanning the preceding night, and there could now be little doubt as to her character. A smart breeze had now sprung up, and she was now rapidly gaining on us. Her rig and hull were now recognized by some of the older hands on board; she was a notorious pirate ship, in full chase of our vessel, and, but for some merciful interposition of providence, we seemed doomed for capture.

I walked up to the captain: "Well, sir," I said, "the secret's at last out?"

"Yes, sir, I knew her from the first, but I tried the chance of an escape, not knowing whether she might have seen us or not; but you see we have failed. She is one of the most determined pirates in these seas—manned by a crew of about the biggest ruffians that ever trod a deck."

"But what is to be done?" I asked.

"Surely you do not think of offering resistance?"

"There is no other way for it; at all events, we must try. We may wing her and escape."

"But, if you fail, you will only have exasperated them, and provoked their revenge."

"Resist or not, we have no mercy to hope for from them, and my mind's made up."

"But, what means of resistance have you? your vessel is short-manned; you are without guns or ammunition."

"You have not yet seen our means; and such as they are, we must use them against that ruffian."

His eye glanced again in the direction of the pursuing ship. She was a long, low, hermaphrodite sort of craft, evidently very swift.—Her foremast and bowsprit were immensely strong, and of great length, both covered with canvas, under a press of which she came bowling along, the now freshening breeze filling her sails. The rapidity with which she gained on us, showed that we had no chance of escape by flight. Our every rag of canvas had been for some time set, and the old lumbering ship, heavily laden as she was, went snorting and groaning through the water. The match was as unequal as between a cart horse and a thorough-bred racer.

Turning my eyes again towards the deck, I found the men all activity and bustle. One group I observed busily engaged in breaking and sawing old iron hoops and spikes. These were for grape shot!

"But where are the guns?" I asked of the captain.

"You shall see presently," he replied; the men are dragging them from their concealment below, for we carry more than the regulation number. In the mean time, may I ask you to go below, and break the matter to your fellow passengers. There may be some of the gentlemen not unwilling to aid in the defence of the old ship. At present I cannot leave the deck. My wife!"—a shudder seemed to pass across his face, and he added, "would to God she had not been here!"

I pressed his hand, and went below.—Need I say what screaming, sobbing, and crying there was, when I informed my fellow passengers of the danger so near at hand.—Some fell upon their knees and prayed, who never prayed before; others shrieked, and gave way to the wildest outbreaks of grief; some swooned and fell down as if dead. One tender girl there was, fair and graceful, beautiful as light, who displayed the most charming courage and self-possession. She was on her way home to England, in search of the health which she had lost amid the hot swamps of the tropics. It might be, that she felt the hand of death already upon her, and the ties that bound her to life were thus feeble. She tried to soothe the shrieking women, cheered those who seemed as if stricken down by their terror, and she urged upon all to reflect, that it was their duty rather to aid and encourage those who were about to risk their lives for their protection, than to embarrass and distress them by shrieking and clamour. The captain's wife, I found, was more composed than the others, and she suggested that the other females should at once proceed to disguise themselves in ordinary seamen's clothes, and proceed upon deck, so as if possible to escape detection, in event of the ship being boarded by the pirates.

I left them in these preparations, and hastened upon deck. I found that the men had now dragged from their concealment nine eighteen pound carronades, which were mounted and ready for action. Some were busily engaged in loading them, each with a round shot and bag of iron-cuttings, broken nails, musket bullets—the most destructive kind of grape.—They worked as if life and death depended on their efforts, which was indeed the case. Of the eleven gentlemen passengers on board, of nearly all nations, the greater number, with praiseworthy alacrity, aided the crew in their preparations for defence. All the guns, rifles, pistols, swords and cutlasses that the ship could muster, were brought on deck, and distributed among the passengers and crew.

The pirate ship was now rapidly approaching, and was almost within gunshot. We could see her deck distinctly, and perceived that it was crowded with men; booms and all were filled. She was evidently well armed, for we saw six guns of a side, and a long gun on pivots, planted in the fore-castle. The occasional gleam of steel caught our eye. We saw a man, evidently a person in command, standing in the shrouds, with a polished speaking trumpet in his hand, closely scanning us. He wore white trowsers, and had a red sash bound round his waist. On his head was a broad panama sombrero, the now burning sun rendering such a defence highly necessary.

Notwithstanding, however, the steadiness of the pursuit, the stranger seemed as yet uncertain what next to do. To be sure, we had a fair show of men on board; and though we still carried a full press of sail, there seemed to be about no evidence of great haste to get out of his way. Our men were all at their posts, and they evinced that steadiness and resolute bearing which the English sailor generally displays in moments of trial and danger. The pirate, seemingly undecided, kept off and on; now hauling her wind a little, and keeping away from us—now pressing closer in our wake, but as if irresolute whether to attack us or not.

But our attention was suddenly attracted in another direction, by a new object of interest,—perhaps of danger.

It must here be observed, that we were now off the coast of Cuba, whose high lands to the west of Cuba Maize rose clear and strongly-defined against the northern sky. One of the old hands on board pointed out, not very far off, a spot which, he assured us, was one of the most noted piratical haunts in Cuba.

"These fellows," said he, "even venture out in their boats to attack and board merchantmen of the first class. I have known—"

"Boat ahoy!" sung out the man on the look out.

"Where away?"

"Under our forefoot!"

And sure enough there was a boat almost in our track, though, at first sight, there seemed nothing in its appearance to excite suspicion or alarm.

"Keep your eye on that ere, captain," was the remark of the old seaman at our side. And the captain, to do him justice, seemed alive to the necessity of keeping a sharp look out in all directions.

We were soon within hail of the boat, and perceived that there was only one man visible on board, who seemed as if fishing with a rod and line at the boat's bow. An immense tarpaulin covered the boat, which was large as a jolly. The only circumstance which excited our suspicions was an object very like a carronade on a pivot, planted forward, and on which the man sat, as if to conceal it. He soon hailed us in Spanish.

"Hay algo de bueno, para los probes pescadores!"

Our captain, not understanding Spanish, hailed in English. "Hilloa, sir, what are you about there?"

"Feeshin," was the man's reply. "Will buy feesh?"

"And what kind of fish do you catch here, so far out at sea?"

"All sorts, sare."

"And what's the use of that gun I see at your bows?"

"Ah sare! keep off de pirates wid dat."

"Now, men," said our captain, turning round, "I smell some devilment here. Whatever happens, be ready, calm and collected; we may have a double danger to run; I fear this is a pirate's trick. Sambo (turning to the black cook) see that the poker is kept red hot, and be ready to hand it up!"

"Ay, ay, sa!" said Sambo, showing his ivory; for Sambo's poker had been appointed to do the duty of port-fire or match.

We were within less than pistol shot of the boat, when we observed a sudden bustle under the tarpaulin. The man at the bows changed his position, pointed the carronade in the direction of our brig, and, bang!—a round shot went whistling through our foresail. At the same instant, the tarpaulin was thrown off, with a loud shout, and some thirty half-naked fierce and savage-looking ruffians displayed themselves to view. They were of all shades of colours, from the black African to the fair Biscayan; and they were of all tongues, if one might judge from the howling and discordant voices which rose from among them. But we had little time to think of this, for the scoundrels immediately saluted us with a volley of their small arms, which, however, did but little damage, though I saw one of our men fall.—

The others were with difficulty restrained from firing upon them—the black cook now brandishing his heated poker. But the captain shouted out—"Forbear! not a shot till I give the word!"

The pirate boat rapidly approached, and her crew fired another volley upon us; but firing upwards, and our men being sheltered by the bulwarks, no damage was this time done.—The ruffians were now close upon us, and I could see their gleaming pikes and cutlasses; the pistols and long knives in their belts; and their fiendish and revolting looks. There was a faint scream of the females on deck. We seemed as if already in the tyrant's power!

But our turn for action had now come!—The boat had almost struck the ship's side, when the clear voice of the captain was heard—"Now, men, steady! run out the guns! mind your aim! Now, blacky, with your poker!"

The guns were run out through the port holes in an instant, and one fiery storm of death after another was poured down upon our assailants. At least three or four heavy shot went slap through the boat's bottom, when she almost instantly filled and sank, leaving the crew in the water, struggling and swimming for life. A cry of horror rose from among them, when the first volley of grape and round shot crashed into their midst, and they howled for pity and mercy! But there was little time for consideration now; and the piercing cry of "Miser-cordia, por amor de Dios," was little heeded. One by one the swimmers disappeared. Some sunk; others seemed to be suddenly dragged under water. Two sharks which had followed in the ship's wake for some days, now enjoyed a high carouse. There was an occasional splash, an up turned belly, a crunching of bones, and in a moment all was over with the victim. At last, the captain, implored by the passengers, took pity on the only two who continued to swim after the ship, beseeching our mercy. A boat was lowered, and two ruffian-looking Spaniards were dragged in by the neck, and firmly pinioned to the mainmast.

And what of the pirate ship, the first object of our fears? What was our surprise to find the stranger gradually sheering off? Most probably our warm reception of the Cuba "fishermen" had shown them that we were fully prepared for resistance—and pirates don't like coming to blows when they can avoid them, nor probably, did they like the sound of our heavy metal. However this might be, certain it is, that they parted company with us forthwith, and troubled us no more.

The joy of the crew and passengers, thus rescued from perils so imminent, need scarcely be described. The captain was quite beside himself with joy, and seemed almost disposed to embrace the black cook, Sambo, for the gallant handling of the poker. Double, if not treble allowances of grog were served out to the men; and the captain and passengers also indulged themselves in more than usually heavy potations that night. Had the pirates then come upon us we must have fallen an easy prey.

A few days after, the two pirates we had taken on board were got rid of. When off one of the Bahama Islands, about a mile from the shore, they were made to "walk the plank." They were good swimmers, and we watched them buffeting through the waves for a long time. The captain said there was little fear of their reaching the shore, unless picked off by the sharks.

For ourselves, we reached port in safety, without further incident, about three weeks after this adventure with the pirates.

my country, and could never bear the name of tory; and, as I was passing by the man's house, that red-headed baste steps up and calls out tory, tory, and I would not bear it at his hands, so I took and brought him to the camp for trial.

"Well," says his Captain, "but you have brought the hen, and she has done no crime."

"Ah! but," says he, "she was the only witness I had against him."

The witty turn of the Paddy so pleased the court martial, that they paid the owner for his turkeys, and gave them to Jemmy to take and punish in his own way.

PRICES AND WAGES AT THE LAKE SUPERIOR MINES.

A letter from Ontonagon, dated Feb. 23d, says:—
Everything is enormously dear. Mess pork $18 to 20; Flour 9; Beef 16; Corn Meal 7. No butter or dried apples. Sugar, rice, fish, or lard cannot be had, at any price. Wages are also very high; 200 more men could be employed if they were here.
Labourers get from $14 to 29 and found per month.
Miners from $20 to 30 and found. I do not think that industrious men can come to a better place than Ontonagon, where wages are so high, and where every one enjoys such good health.

SAVING TIME.—A clergyman, who had considerable of a farm as was the case in our forefathers' days, went out to see one of his labourers, who was ploughing in the field, and found him sitting upon his plough, resting his team.

"John," said he, "would it not be a good plan for you to have a stub scythe here, and be hubbing a few bushes, while the oxen are resting?"

John, with a countenance which might well become the clergyman himself, instantly replied—

"Would it not be well, sir, for you to have a swingling board in the pulpit, and when they are singing swingle a little affx."

The reverend gentleman turned on his heel, laughed heartily, and said no more about hubbing bushes.

A NAVAL AID.—A person, on whom the temperance reformation had produced no effect entered, in a state of exhalation, a temperance grocery in a neighbouring town.

"Mr. —," exclaimed he, "do you keep anything good to take here?"

"Yes," replied the merchant "we have some excellent cold water, the best thing in the world to take."

"Well I know it," replied the Bachanalian, "there's nothing that's done so much for navigation as that."

AN IRISHMAN'S THEFT.—and for a good cause too.—In the American war, an Irishman, who was reputed a faithful and brave soldier, and much esteemed by his officers, obtained leave one night to ramble out of camp, and as he passed by a farmer's house, he saw a cock and hen turkey sitting on the fence.

The cock, agreeable to nature, gobbled at him—Paddy caught them both and brought them to camp without injury.

The owner followed and entered a complaint against him.

"How," said the president, "is this Jemmy, that you have stolen the farmer's turkeys?"

Jemmy denied stealing them, saying—"My Captain knows well that I have been a good friend to

ACTION AND REACTION.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

There is a law governing in the affairs of life, with its award of good or evil, according to the tenor of every one's obedience or disregard thereto. Ignorance of this law exempts no one from punishment; and yet at least four-fifths of the human race appear to be utterly unconscious of its existence. The law is that of action and reaction, which may thus be stated, in order to make it clearly comprehensible.

Every act of a man's life, whether good or evil, has a reaction of consequences. Whatever we do, affects others or ourselves in some way; for there cannot be such a thing as an act without an effect proportionate to the action.

This, upon a little reflection, will appear self-evident.

The importance of a life in obedience to this law must strike every one at a glance, for happiness or misery here and hereafter depends upon it. In great things, so to speak, all see and acknowledge the existence of the law we have stated, for examples of its unerring visitation are of daily occurrence. How sad and various are the punishments that men receive for evil actions. But in little things, as they are called, where no violations of penal statutes or public opinion take place, and where no reaction is apparent, we imagine that none will ever come; that what they have done is lost as in a void immense. But this is a fatal error. There is not an act of a man's life, little or great, good or bad, that does not, sooner or later in life, react upon him with its full quota of consequences. A philosopher has said, that the stamp of a man's foot upon the earth will shake the universe. The remark is more likely to be true than false. We can believe it more easily than we can disbelieve it. And a single word, a look, or smallest act of a man's life, forgotten by him in the next moment, may shake his soul to the very centre.

Alonzo Turnham had never heard of the existence of the law to which we have alluded. But that was of little consequence. He would not have credited the fact if he had heard it stated. The law which he laid down for his government, was to seek his own gratification in all possible ways that it could be done, without so far trespassing upon the rights of others as to give them the power of retaliation. At the age of twenty-one he started in life with a determination to succeed in the world. He saw that wealth gave the means of self-gratification to almost any extent, and he resolved upon its attainment.

He had been for two years engaged in the study of law; but the law he perceived to be too slow a means of attaining the object of his wishes, and he therefore began to look around him for some quicker mode of advancement. He possessed some literary ability, and had indulged an early passion for literary pursuits by writing for the columns of a weekly newspaper. This made him, to some extent, acquainted with individuals connected with the press. Conversing, one day, with the owner of a popular periodical, the latter enumerated many instances of persons who had become wealthy in the publishing business. Turnham caught at this, and pondered it in his mind. He had a few thousand dollars, with which, after mature deliberation, he determined to purchase a half interest in a newly started weekly newspaper, the projector of which found himself in difficulties, and compelled to take a partner.

Upon this new pursuit in life, Turnham entered with great spirit. There was a newspaper in the city of the same class. It had been in existence for some years, and was firmly established. Before coming into the business himself, Mr. Turnham had been a regular subscriber for this paper, and written for its columns. He had always liked it, and considered it a very excellent publication. But now it wore an indifferent aspect in his eyes, and he never took it up without a disparaging remark.

"Isn't it astonishing," he said, to his partner in the business, one day, "that a paper like this should have such a circulation? It isn't comparable with ours."

To this the partner readily assented.

Turnham commenced reading the number of the paper upon which he had just commented.

"Just listen to this!" he said, suddenly; and he read a few paragraphs. Then he added:—"What do you think of that?"

"I shouldn't like to see that in our paper," the partner answered.

"No; it's enough to kill any concern. I'm sure that no parent, who sees it and reflects upon it, will allow another number of the paper to come into his house. Very certain am I, that I would order a discontinuance instanter."

"So would I," returned the agreeing partner.

After sitting silent, with his eyes upon the floor, for some time, Turnham said, speaking slowly—

"It would be a capital move for us just now, to take this matter up, and remark with some severity upon it."

"And get a storm about our ears for our pains."

"There is nothing that I would like better. It would be the very thing for us. We circulate six or seven thousand, and they twenty thousand. The controversy would make us known to all their readers, and known as the advocates of religion and a high morality. We should have the public all on our side. Without doubt, in three months, their list would diminish at least five thousand, perhaps more, and ours increase that number. It is a tide in our affairs, depend upon it, that we should take at the flood. If you do not positively object, I will fire a Paixhan gun upon them next week, and then prepare my batteries for a regular fight."

"Just as you like," returned the pliant partner. "There is no doubt of its doing us good."

"None in the world. This false step of our neighbour is a lucky thing for us."

In the hope of building up his own establishment by ruining his neighbour's, Turnham opened upon the rival newspaper with his Paixhan gun, as he called it, and then waited anxiously for the return fire. A week went by; and, at length, wet from the press, and, to his imagination, smoking with wrath, came the paper he was so anxious to see. He opened it with eager hands, and starting at the first editorial column, ran his eyes over the whole inside page, in search of the rejoinder he expected. But, to his mortification and disappointment, not the slightest allusion was found to the violent attack he had made. But, in his search, one paragraph, more conspicuous than all the rest, attracted his attention. It was this:—

"ENLARGEMENT.—The publishers of this paper have determined to enlarge and greatly improve it. They have ordered an entire new font of types, and will add a column to each page, and increase the length of the pages several inches, so as to give at least one third more reading matter. Their large and rapidly increasing subscription list enables them to do this. In advance of every other paper in the country, it is their intention to keep in advance, spite of all competition. To this they stand pledged to the public, and prepared to redeem their pledge."

Turnham read this over twice, and then laid aside the paper, in a very quiet and deliberate manner. He had been completely outgeneraled; and he felt it. Instead of breaking down his neighbour and building up himself, his movement was likely to result in the establishment of his neighbour on a broader basis, and the complete overshadowing of his own concern, that would be in danger of growing feeble for want of sunshine. He took it for granted, that the determination to enlarge and improve was the mode taken to answer his attack; and he was right. It was the reaction upon his selfish attempt to ruin a neighbour, in order to build up himself.

Ashamed, after having written

so warmly against the rival establishment, and after promising to refer to the subject again, to drop the matter, Turnham concocted a still more bitter article, in the hope of provoking a reply. To this, he received the effectual and silencing rejoinder of an enlargement and improvement. The appearance of his neighbour, so superior to his own, completely disheartened Turnham. It was plain, that unless a paper of equal pretensions were published, it would be no use to struggle for an existence. The list they had, by no means justified increased expense. The profits were yet only in prospect. But it became a question between enlargement and abandonment, and they chose the former.

Not six months had elapsed from the time Turnham entered the business of newspaper publishing, before he was heartily sick of it, and determined to sell out his interest for the sum paid for it, which was three thousand dollars—more than double what he now considered it worth. He had a young friend, just of age, who had been smitten with a love of the muses, and who imagined himself to possess literary abilities of no common order. This person received, at his majority, some six or seven thousand dollars, the income from which partly contributed to his support while he prosecuted the study of law.

Upon this young man, whose name was Wheeler, Turnham fixed as the scapegoat who was to bear the evil of his false step. For a month or two, he managed, whenever he met him, to turn the conversation to the subject of newspapers and periodicals, and the fortunes that were every day made by publishers. His own fortune he considered as made; for the paper of which he was part owner, was increasing in patronage almost beyond precedent. He affirmed that ten thousand dollars would not tempt him to sell his interest.

In this way, he kept the young man's thoughts in one channel, and filled him with a desire to exchange the slowly rewarded profession he had adopted, for one that promised such golden harvests. At length, he vaguely hinted that, if he was not in so good business, he would be tempted to join a friend in opening an office as an exchange broker. An allusion to this was more distinctly made soon afterwards—so distinctly, that the friend could not help remarking thereon.

Finally, by gradual approaches on the subject, and by a system of false representations, ingeniously made, Turnham created an eager desire in the mind of Wheeler to buy out his half interest in the paper, and actually to make a proposition to that effect. This proposition was met by certain well timed remarks, going to show his reluctance at giving up so certain a means of fortune. At last, he agreed to take five thousand dollars for his part of the paper, which was paid to him in cash.

"A lucky escape!" he said to himself, when the bargain was complete; and so full was he of self-congratulation at this fortunate turn of affairs, that he had not a thought or feeling of sympathy for the friend he had deceived, and who lost every dollar invested, and became involved in debt, by the breaking down of the newspaper, in little over a year.

Wheeler saw, after he had been in the establishment about a month, that he had not been fairly dealt by; and he also saw that, unless the subscription list of the paper could be greatly increased, ruin was inevitable. He struggled hard to overcome the difficulties of his position, but he struggled in vain. The subscription increased but slowly, and the paper was published at a loss from the day he bought into it until it stopped for want of means to carry it on.

But the young man, deeply as he felt the wrong he had sustained at the hands of Turnham, never uttered a word on the subject to that individual, although his manner towards him became reserved, and their intimate intercourse was not continued. He set him down in his heart as a dishonest man, and determined to mark him as such. After retiring from editorial life, Wheeler, who had been admitted to the bar, entered upon the practice of his profession, determined to rest there all his hopes of future success.

In the mean time, Turnham had opened an exchange office, and commenced operating among a class of men quite as sharp witted and far more experienced than himself. His success, during the first year or two, was by no means equal to his expectations. But, after that, he understood the operation of things better, and knew how to take advantage of the almost hourly fluctuations created in the money market by the eager spirit of gain.

At the age of twenty-five, Turnham began paying his addresses to a young lady, who was known as an heiress. Her parents were dead; but she lived with an aunt, for whom she had a most tender regard; and in whose judgment she reposed great confidence. It happened that Wheeler made the acquaintance of this aunt shortly after Turnham commenced visiting the niece; and it also happened that, from some allusion made to the young man, the aunt was led to ask Wheeler if he knew him.

"Yes, and to my sorrow," was the unhesitating answer.

"Why do you say that?" asked the lady.

"I was his friend, and confided in his honour, and he deceived me," replied Wheeler.

Nothing more particular was alleged against Turnham; but this was enough. The lady took the pains to ascertain that Wheeler was a man of truth and integrity, and therefore believed what he said.

When Turnham called, next time, upon the young heiress, with the intention of making known his sentiments, he was told by her aunt that she did not wish to receive his visits; and so all his present hopes of obtaining a fortune by marriage were scattered to the winds. But he never dreamed that this was merely a reaction upon his own conduct. Nothing could have been farther from his mind.

In entering into the exchange business, Turnham had not contemplated a partnership with a friend, as he stated to Wheeler. He had only said so in order to make up a good story. He commenced business alone, upon the five thousand dollars he had received for his paper; and continued it, with more or less success, for ten years; during which time he had married a lady, older than himself by many years, who was reputed to be worth fifty thousand dollars. The fortune turned out to be only five thousand dollars; and this the wise lady had taken good care to have so secured that he could not touch it.

At the end of ten years, by a sudden change in the stock market, and the explosion of two or three fancy stock concerns, Turnham lost thirty thousand dollars, more than all he had made. The extent of this loss he concealed, and soon after began to look around him for a partner with capital. It was not long before he found a young man, whose father was a wealthy merchant, and inclined to furnish him with twenty thousand dollars, if he would make a good connection with a well established exchange broker.

This was just the thing for Turnham; and he so represented his business, and gave such good references as to standing and capacity, that he succeeded in his wishes. A co-partnership was agreed upon. The terms of the connection being settled, they were placed in the hands of a conveyancer, who was directed to prepare therefrom articles of agreement. Before these were signed, the father, who was a prudent man, submitted them to his lawyer, who happened to be Mr. Wheeler, now in a good practice, and standing high at the bar as a man of talents and great probity.

"Mr. Turnham, did you say it was?" remarked the lawyer, with an expression of surprise, when the business was stated to him, and before he had looked at the papers.

"Yes, sir," returned the merchant, who was struck by the peculiar tone and manner of Wheeler. "Do you know anything against him?"

"I should hardly like to see a friend of mine connected with him in business."

"Why?"

"Because, to speak freely, as I deem it my duty to do in the present instance, I do not think him an honest man."

"Not an honest man? You astonish me, Mr. Wheeler. What evidence have you of this?"

"I will plainly state to you the fact upon which my conclusion is based, and leave you to make up your own mind upon the subject. I have no wish to injure Mr. Turnham, but I feel it to be my duty to warn the innocent when I see them about to run into danger."

Wheeler then gave the merchant a plain history of his newspaper speculation; and concluded by saying—

"I have stated the circumstance as it occurred; you must make up your own mind in regard to it."

On the day that the merchant waited upon his lawyer with the articles of agreement between Turnham and his son, the broker found himself exceedingly hard pressed. A number of heavy drafts for funds on his hands belonging to his correspondents in New York, Boston, and New Orleans, were presented, and had to be cashed; also, several notes given for stocks, that were not now worth ten cents on the dollar. By the most earnest efforts, he succeeded in getting through; but he was fully convinced that it would be impossible for another day without important aid. From nowhere could this come except through his new partner, whose appearance, with the articles of agreement having his signature attached, he had been looking for hourly. But up to four o'clock, he had looked in vain. Fearing that he might not come in before morning, and dreading the consequences of even an hours delay, he deemed it best to call around at the store of the young man's father, and thus give matters a chance of coming to a close. If a good opportunity for doing so occurred, he meant to ask to have a few thousand dollars advanced on the next day. In fact, the hope of getting hold of the money was the only reason he had for venturing to press matters to an earlier issue than they would come if left to themselves.

Turnham found the merchant in his counting room alone. His reception he thought formal, and even cold.

"Is your son in?" he asked.

"No sir," was replied; and then there was silence.

"Will he be in this afternoon?"

"I think not."

Turnham felt oppressed. There was something in the manner of the merchant that he could not understand: a marked change that was unaccountable. After sitting for a short time, Turnham arose and retired. The merchant bowed to him low and formally as he did so.

"Something is wrong," he muttered to himself, as he walked hurriedly back to his office.

The evening mail brought notice of drafts amounting to fifteen thousand dollars, all, or nearly all of which would, probably, be presented the next day. This made ruin certain, unless very important aid could be obtained.

The time until evening was spent in efforts to obtain money. He talked largely to those upon whom he called, about the co-partnership he had formed, and the great command of capital it would soon give him. All this was credited; but the parties hadn't the money to spare from their own operations.

"When is this connection to be formed?" asked one of the persons to whom he had applied.

"Immediately," was answered. "The articles of agreement are drawn up, and nothing now remains but to sign them. This would have been done to-day, only Mr. H—wished to submit them to his lawyer."

"Who is his legal adviser?"

"Do you know?"

"I do not."

"Let me see—I did know. Yes, now I remember. It is Wheeler. He's a sound lawyer."

"Wheeler! Are you sure?"

"O yes. I recollect now very well. Wheeler is the man."

Turnham went back to his office, thinking more seriously about his conduct towards Wheeler than he had ever thought before, and feeling anxious and alarmed lest the lawyer should have retaliated upon him by informing Mr. H—of what he had done. The effect, he saw, would be to ruin him.

Turnham slept but a few hours that night. In the morning he arose in a feverish state of mind, but resolved upon one thing, and that was to see Mr. H— and his son before nine o'clock, and know whether the articles of agreement were to be signed or not. Accordingly, he called upon the merchant early. Mr. H—received him even more coldly than before, and the son looked embarrassed and unhappy.

"Have you had those papers examined?" the broker coming at once to the point.

"We have," replied Mr. H—

"Are they properly drawn?"

asked Turnham.

"Yes; but since I saw you yesterday, circumstances have led me to change my views in regard to my son. Of this I should have informed you during the day. I trust it will be no matter of serious disappointment. A connection, fully as advantageous as the one about being formed with my son, you can, without doubt, easily make."

"The reason of your extraordinary conduct," said Turnham, who had become quite pale, "you will certainly explain."

"I can make no explanations, sir," returned the merchant, coldly. "My reasons for what I do are sufficient for my own justification. My conduct may appear extraordinary in your eyes; but I am satisfied that, in reality, you have no right to complain of it."

This was all the satisfaction Turnham received. On that day his acceptances were dishonoured; and drafts to a large amount, drawn against deposits and collections that ought to have been in his hands, went back unpaid.

Ready as the broker would have been to secure something for himself in the disaster that befel him, it came upon him so suddenly as to leave this out of his power. Everything was swept from his hands, and he was compelled to begin again with less than a hundred dollars in his pocket.

For once, he saw as well as felt the reaction of his own conduct, and was forced to acknowledge that in extricating himself from an early difficulty by improper means, he had laid the foundation for future ruin in after life. Could he have seen deeper into the relation existing between causes and effects, he would have understood more fully the great error he had committed, and trembled in fear of even more reactive consequences. Doubtless they came.

In illustration of the law stated at first, we have chosen a very plain and familiar example. Hundreds of others might be given, taken from every grade, and involving all social relations. The consequences of every one's conduct must be felt in some form or other, earlier or later in life. This is inevitable, for against all action must come reaction; and they will bear relation in quantity and force to each other—a truth that we cannot lay too deeply to heart.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1851.

Our readers will please excuse us in the delay of the present number. We have been disappointed in obtaining paper as we expected, which caused the delay. We shall endeavour to be more punctual hereafter.

THE WEATHER.

The weather for the past two or three weeks, with the exception of three or four days past, has been very cold and stormy. And we learn that similar weather has prevailed throughout the United States.

The Brig Lucy A. Blossom, Capt. Traverse, came in here on the 27th ult, with her mainmast carried away, having been driven about the lake for some time past by various gales of wind, without being able to make port. The Capt. informs us that for the last twenty years experience on the lakes he has never known such stormy cold weather as the past two weeks, at this season of the year. He repaired her mainmast here, and left for Buffalo on the 28th, with a cargo of over ten thousand bushels of corn on board from Chicago.

STEAMER BURNED.

We learn from some of our exchanges that the steamer Webster, with about one hundred passengers on board, took fire on the 2d ult, ten miles above Vicksburg, on the Mississippi, and was burned to the waters edge. At the first alarm the scene was beyond description. Many rushed into the flames, and others crowded to the sides of the boat, clinging convulsively to it till driven away by the fire, and threw themselves into the current. Boats from the shore saved several persons who were clinging to the boat and snags. The number of passengers and crew was over one hundred, of whom only sixty can be found. The Capt. and wife are among the missing.

CHOLERA.

We are informed that this epidemic is raging to some extent along the banks of the Mississippi river. Several cases have occurred at St. Louis, and also at

New Orleans and several other places. And no doubt as, warm weather approaches will rage still more.

STRANGE.—Our lakes are getting so narrow that boats cannot pass in fine weather without coming in contact. We understand that two or three collisions of Propellers have occurred already.

FROST.—We learn that frosts in the month of May have prevailed generally throughout the United States, doing much damage to grain crops and fruit, but to what extent we have not learned.

The St. Louis Republican says, "there are now in England and Wales 80,000 to 100,000 persons of the Mormon faith patiently biding their time and chance for a voyage to the Mormon home in Salt Lake Valley."

We don't believe it.

A considerable portion of the business part of the town of Montrose, Pa., was destroyed by fire on the 6th ult. The total loss is estimated at from $30,000 to $40,000, but a small part of which was covered by insurance.

HORRID MURDER.

A Columbus correspondent of the Cleveland True Democrat, of the 15th ult, says:—A horrid butchery took place to-day some two or three miles below the city. A man by the name of Slocum, living on a farm, and a quarrel with his wife, in which he killed her and cut off her head, and then finished the awful tragedy by cutting his own throat. Jealousy is said to be the cause of this terrible affair.

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON.

EXPLOSION OF ICE.—The Burlington Free Press gives an account of a remarkable occurrence in the ice of Lake Champlain, near Alburgh, Vt. The ice, for an area of about five or six rods, in an irregular form, was found, on the morning of the 16th of February, broken up into fragments of various sizes, and two large cakes had been lifted from the opening, and flung to the distance, one of seven, and the other of ten rods. The ice was 17 inches in thickness, and the largest piece measured one way 25 ft. 6 inches, and the other 33 ft. 6 inches. It contained at least 50,000 cubic feet of solid ice, and weighed more than twenty tons. The wind blew very hard the evening previous. The depth of water at the spot was 17 feet. No satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon has yet been given.

The following extracts, from the Detroit Free Press show in what light the tales of "treason, &c.," are held by the honorable men in society. The Marshal, accompanied by U. S. District Attorney Bates, paid this place a visit, and expressed themselves quite astonished at the frank and generous manner they were received, after the most positive assurances of resistance to all law. The interference of the official authorities of the U. S. was hailed by the people here with joy, as being the sure means of their seeing an end of the lawlessness continually heaped upon this people, and for no other cause principles of life and salvation according to their faith.

We here give the extracts, hoping to hear officially of the matter soon.

THE MORMON ARRESTS.—The reported arrest of James J. Strang and other Mormon Leaders seems to have been in fact no arrest at all.
They all went voluntarily on board the U. S.
Steamer, and were only taken into the custody of the Marshal at their own request. They expressed themselves not only willing, but anxious for an investigation by the proper authorities—and have asserted from the beginning that no violation of the laws has taken place on their part, or on the part of the Mormons on Beaver Island. They are here voluntarily, and intend to remain here until the authorities are satisfied of their innocence.

We were certain from the beginning that the hue and cry against the Mormons was all moonshine. Violations of the law may have taken place among them, and it would be strange, indeed, if they did not now and then commit a crime numbering some seven hundred souls. But every instance of the kind has doubtless been greatly exaggerated, until finally it was thought proper to send a large force to make arrests. The "Levying War Counterfeiting, Obstructing the Mails," and other crimes so freely in circulation with reference to Strang and his associates, will, we believe, turn out upon investigation to be mere invention.

Strang is at large here, having never been placed in confinement since his arrival. Upon a charge so serious, was there any evidence to render a conviction at all probable, he would assuredly be placed in confinement or held to bail in some such sum as would insure his presence at the trial. As a demonstration upon the nobility of our proverbially benevolent Uncle Samuel, the trip to Beaver Island by the U. S. steamer Michigan, and the government officers here, was all very well, and unob-jectively successful. But that it with result in the conviction of His Majesty, King James, upon charge of the serious charges made against him, we have not the slightest idea.

Strang is a middle-aged, hardy looking man, and would be taken at first sight for one of those genuine American Sovereigns, who till our soil and tell our fortunes, rather than the reigning King of a community in open rebellion against a government so powerful as the United States. He is apparently about forty-five years of age, and would pass, readily, for an unassuming, intelligent, well-informed farmer."—Detroit Free Press, 28th ult.

JUSTICE.

TURKISH AND AMERICAN JUSTICE CONTRASTED.

The following paragraph is clipped from the Michigan State Journal—

"THE JUSTICE OF A SULTAN.—In the city of Aleppo, where the Christians are weak in numbers, a Turkish mob (unknown to the government) produced the death of five, the wounding of six more, and the pillaging of one hundred houses and five churches. The Sultan shot six hundred of the mob, condemned three hundred to the galleys, and put one hundred and fifty more on their trial. He has restored all the property he could recover, to the Christians to whom it belonged, and recompensed the dear sufferers out of his own purse."

Here is a sample of Turkish justice, that ought to make every American blush. In despotic Turkey the mobocrats receive their just deserts, and the sufferers have their wrongs redressed; but in Republican America they are permitted to go unpunished; and the plea of the sufferers are seldom, if ever, heard—never if they happen to be saints.

In the city of Far West, and the adjoining country, where the saints were weak in numbers, a Missouri mob (known to the government) produced the death of over twenty, and the wounding of many more; plundered ten thousand persons, men, women and children of their possessions; exiled them from their homes, and drove them in destitution, hunger and want, in mid winter, to a distant land, passing much of the way in the midst of hostile foes, who not only refused them shelter and food, but kept them in continual danger.

Among the killed were eighteen persons, unarmed, and engaged in the worship of God, who were murdered unresisting, and in cold blood; "one of them, a mere child, who died mixing together the words of his prayer to God, and his supplication for mercy to his murderers; another, an old man, bowed down with suffering and sorrow, scarred with the wounds he had received fifty-seven years before in defence of American liberty and American independence; all yielding up their lives for the name of Jesus, and the witness of the gospel."

For all these sufferings the President was appealed to for redress, but the consoling reply was, "I have no power to redress your wrong," thus leaving murderers and plunderers to possess the inheritances of the saints, chuck-ling over their success.

The saints, after their expulsion, settled in the State of Illinois, and built up, by their untiring industry, several flourishing villages, and the city of Nauvoo, known to be at one time the most populous city in the State. Their prosperity soon excited the envy of their enemies, who resorted to mob violence, that they might waste and destroy them. In justification of their hellish deeds, they accused the saints of atrocious crimes, which they could not even substantiate before the courts of those that sought their destruction.

But notwithstanding the manifest innocence of the saints, these cruel christian land pirates and murderers gave themselves no rest till they murdered the prophets Joseph and Hyrum in cold blood, in Carthage jail, when the honour of the State was pledged for their protection; burned hundreds of the houses of the saints before their eyes, and banished 25,000 from the State.

For all these wrongs this Republic offers us no redress. President and people alike turn a deaf ear to our appeals. The murderers of the prophets "were indicted, arraigned and acquitted at the instance of their own friends, without any attempt to introduce the necessary evidence against them;" and the robbers and plunderers of the saints are suffered to enjoy unmolested the possessions of those whom they so wickedly exiled.

As a final resort, the saints have recently fled for refuge to the Islands in Lake Michigan, which had before been passed by as utterly unfit for agricultural purposes, hoping that they might there be permitted to live in peace, but their hopes have not been realized. The prophet and other leading men among the saints have recently been hunted like beasts of the forest by the Sheriff.
All this is done under the garb of law, but every one blessed with an ordinary share of intelligence knows that it is in open violation of every principle of law or justice.

Had we a Sultan for a President, such things would undoubtedly be righted. As it is, we have to submit to them, waiting patiently till the judgments of the Lord shall cut off the unjust rulers, and blot out from under heaven the nation that has suffered such wickedness to pass unpunished. "He that taketh the sword, shall perish by the sword; this is the patience and faith of the saints." G. W.

FOR PRESIDENT.

Sheriff GRANGER, of Mackinac.

Whereas, Sheriff Granger, of Mackinac Co., has of late distinguished himself as an able statesman, by the able manner in which he has done honour to the high and responsible office to which he has been called by the voice of his fellow citizens; also the deeds of bold daring which he has performed, in entering right into the midst of the city of the "King of the Mormon Isles," with a life guard of less than one hundred men, surrounded by, or at least in sight of, twelve or fifteen of those desperately ferocious beings called Mormons, and their fellow citizens; immortalized his name by executing the law in serving a search warrant upon the house of the Mormon King, in which it is reported that he found a case knife, two chemises, three sheets, one pillow case,
a piece of a striped shirt, and a few other articles of like nature, all of which he returned to the prosecutor, and then made good his escape into his own dominions, without the loss of a single man.

Wherefore, Resolved, That he is our first choice for President of this great and growing Republic, and that we will give him our cordial and united support for that high and important station.

By the "Hocus Pocus" Committee, or,
"Devil's Advocate."

ANOTHER GANG OF COUNTER- FEITERS BROKEN UP.

About the 5th ult., at Lanesboro', in Susquehanna Co., Penn., several officers made a successful attempt at detecting and arresting a gang of counterfeiters. The N. Y. Tribune says of the proceedings:—

"A little after midnight, all things being prepared, the house of Aylsworth, (a hotel keeper in Lanesboro') was entirely surrounded by the sheriff's posse, who had been rallied from the village of Susquehanna. Some six or eight entered the house and immediately commenced a search of the whole premises, warrants having been issued for that purpose. The Sheriff, Attorney Richards and others examined the bedroom of Aylsworth, whilst District Atty Dimick, accompanied by Messrs. Henry Doty, Robert B. Cooley and others, examined the gar-ret, where light were usually burning. Here they found vials of "chemicals, &c." and under the bed was found a large bench, which was recognized by all as the very thing constructed for the use of the press, &c. Then followed a thorough search of the whole upper loft, and in the middle of a straw bed, Mr.
Cooley discovered a heavy package carefully folded in a newspaper. This on examination proved to be the very identical plates, eight in number, used for altering and making bank bills. The room of Y. H. Brown was then examined, but no counterfeit money found, but he was seen to throw a roll of something into the stove. I understand that the Sheriff says he recognized the smell of burning papers the moment he entered the bedroom of Aylsworth.
The premises of James McDaniel, Sen., were next examined, and a complete press, ink, and fixtures for making and altering bank bills were found in a box in the loft of his dwelling —also a ten dollar counterfeit bill on the Commercial Bank at Whitehall in the same box.—
The premises of James McDaniel, Jr., another of the gang, were also examined, but I have not heard yet what, if anything, was discovered. Aylsworth, Brown, both the McDaniels, and another named Silas Winters, are under arrest, and I learn are to have a hearing today.

"Undoubtedly this is a branch of the Michigan gang of counterfeiters. They are known to have confederates in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and other States."

NEW POSTAGE STAMPS.

The Philadelphia Sun referring to the new Stamp to be made use of under the New Postage Law, says that they are being made in that city. The new twelve cent stamp is similar to that of the present ten cent stamp, with the full face of Washington. The three cent stamp represents a profile of Washington, after the style of a medallion, and the one cent stamp, a finely executed head of Franklin.—
The one cent stamps will be found convenient for pre-paying postage on newspapers, and making odd change. It is presumed that forty or fifty millions of these stamps will be required during the year, to meet the public demand.

NEW AND TRUE—Think of it, ye who eat meat.—It is indeed a fact worthy of remark, and one that seems to never have been noticed, that through the whole animal creation, in every country and clime of the earth, the most useful animals cost nature the least waste to sustain them with food. For instance, all animals that work, live on vegetable food, and no animal that eats flesh, works. The all-powerful elephant, and the patient untiring camel in the torrid zone; the horse, the ox, the donkey, in the temperate; and the reindeer, in the frigid zone, obtain all their muscular power for enduring labour from nature's simplest productions, the vegetable kingdom. But all the flesh-eating animals keep the rest of the animal creation in constant dread of them.—

They seldom eat food until some other animal has eaten it first, and made it into flesh. Their only use seems to be to destroy life—their own flesh is unfit for other animals to eat, having been itself made out of flesh and is most foul and offensive. Great strength, fleetness of foot, usefulness, cleanliness and docility, are then always characteristic of vegetable eating animals; while all the world dread flesh-eaters.—

A CURIOSITY.

While Governor Brown was in Key West, says the Tallahassee (Florida) Sentinel, he was presented by Hon. A. Patterson with a miniature bust of General Washington, found, ten years ago, in the neighbourhood of Mr.
Patterson's premises, imbedded in the lime stone which forms the island. The bust is of marble, and is evidently the work of a master.
The expression is said to be identical with that of the famous statue of Washington at Richmond, allowed to be the best likeness in existence. The little bust is in a state of perfect preservation; all the delicate chiselings in the plates of ruffled shirt remaining as sharp and well defined as ever, and the marble without discolouration. Across the shoulder is inscribed the word "Washington"—a spelling which seems to indicate an Italian origin. In the same spot two English guineas were found, the dates and inscription of which we did not learn. All were probably deposited by some free booter of the olden time.

THE INSURRECTION IN CHINA.—The Overland Friend of China, for January last, has the following with reference to the long-standing insurrection in the Province of Kwangsi.

"The disturbances are not at an end, but, on the contrary, are raging, and have continued to rage with aggravated fierceness. At a distance, as the crowd would fly, barely sixty miles from Canton, the insurgents are now assembled in great force—their avowed object the upsetting of the present dynasty. This information we have on the very best authority. To such extremes have they carried their determination, that they have returned to the old Chinese practice of dispensing with the queue—this, in reality, is equivalent to drawing the sword and throwing away the scabbard."

"The Commissioner appointed to the task of inquiring into the state of the disturbed provinces, instead of sending the Governor of Kwangsi in chains to Peking, as was expected, has, on hearing the evidence for and against him, forwarded a memorial to the Emperor, in which the whole blame is thrown upon Sue for his tardiness in rendering the required support, whereby the rebellion has now attained such a head that his Imperial Majesty's continued possession of the throne is a matter of uncertainty. The Governor has now been four months absent from Canton, and doubtless it is through the system of espionage and demonstration which he has set on foot, that the real situation of affairs has been hitherto successfully withheld from studious inquirers."

WOMAN'S POWER.

Oh! tell me not that woman's weak,
Inconstant, or unkind;
Though flippant writers often speak
As though dame nature's master freak
Was molding woman's mind.
Around the sufferer's lowly bed,
When palls the heart of men;
When science fails and hope is fled,
And helpless lies the dying head,
Oh! who is constant then?
Who watches, with a tireless eye,
The faintly heaving breath?
Who hovers round, for ever nigh,
To catch the last expiring sigh,
And soothe the pangs of death?
When disappointments sink the soul,
And round us troubles throng;
When grief exerts its wild control,
And sorrow's stormy billows roll,
Then, then, Oh! who is strong?
Man sinks beneath misfortune's blow,
And hope forsakes his breast;
His boasted powers are all laid low,
His strength is swallowed up in woe,
When not by woman blest.
But she can cheer his drooping heart,
And rouse his soul again;
Can bid his cankering cares depart,
And, by her smiling, artless art,
Can soothe his keenest pain.
Is woman weak? Go ask the sword,
The weapon of the brave,—
Whose look, whose tone, whose lightest word,
Though e'en but in a whisper heard,
Commands it as her slave.
Go ask man's wild and restless heart,
Who can its passions quell;
Who can withdraw hate's venom dart,
Bid malice and revenge depart,
And virtue in it dwell.
If woman's weak, then what is strong?
For all things bow to her:
To her men's powers all belong;
For her the bard attunes his song,
Her truest worshipper.
Woman, a fearful power is thine:
The mission to thee given
Requires a strength almost divine,
A bosom that is virtue's shrine,
A soul allied to heaven.

NEHEMIAH FLUFKINS' VISIT TO THE CITY OF NOTIONS.

Nehemiah Flufkins was one of those unfortunate specimens of the genus homo, that seem by some accident to have barely escaped shooting out of ground in the form of a cabbage, and to have been born with all the outward semblance of humanity. Spite of his awful greenness, Flufkins was an observant chap, anxious to look about the world, and to use his own words, be "some pumpkins." He came to Boston, one day to see the elephant, and innocently suffered all manner of tricks to be played upon him, such as paying twenty-five cents to go inside the Common, a charge made by a cunning boy, who discovered that Flufkins had "just come down." Another of the "b'hoys," who had received his cue from the lad who charged the entrance to the public Common, stopped Nehemiah as he came out and passed down Trenton street, and politely tapping him on the arm, he said:—

"Fifty cents fine, sir," at the same time holding out his hand for the money.

"Fifty cents? Creation, what fur?"

"The Mayor's house, sir."

"Wot of that?" asked Flufkins, looking at the house designated by the other.

"You have passed it just now, without taking off your hat?"

"How yer talk. S'posin I did?"

"Why, that's fifty cents fine in Boston."

"No!"

"Certainly; and unless you pay it, I shall be obliged to take you to the police office."

"W-h-e-w! Well here's a half. Let's see which house it is," said Nehemiah, taking off his hat.

"That's it, sir, the next but one to where we stand."

"Wall, I won't get caught agin, anyhow," said the innocent Fluf-kins, as he walked back and forth before the house of a green grocer, and fixed the spot in his mind.

Scarcely had Nehemiah Flufkins turned another corner, before he was stopped by a third person who had got the hint from the other two operators.

"What's the matter now?" asked Nehemiah, "I haven't passed another mayor's house, have I?"

"No, but you forgot your landing fee."

"Landin' fee—what's that?"

"Why, head money."

"Head money! Do yer have tu pay for keepin' yer head on?" asked Nehemiah, innocently.

"No—you don't understand me friend. I perceive you must be a stranger in the city."

"Wall, I guess I am."

"You see the law is, that any person arriving in town for the first time, shall pay seventy-five cents head money."

"Du tell."

"Yes. What route did you come by?"

"Fitchburg railroad."

"That's it!" exclaimed his persecutor, as though he had made a discovery.

"What's it?" asked Nehemiah.

"Why, you are the fellow the police are after."

"After me, what fur?"

"For slipping away without paying your head money."

"Wall, look a' here, nabor, it's pretty expensive business, pears to me; but there's three quarters, will that fix it?"

"Yes, that is all right—you are free now to look about the town," said the other, walking away with a suppressed chuckle.

"Thank ye," said Flufkins; "only to think of the perlece after me! Well, that was an escape."

If there was one thing above another for which Nehemiah had a weakness, it was smoking. At home, his pipe was in his mouth half the time, and seeing some cigars in the window, he felt the desire come over him and so he walked in, purchased a "long nine," lit it, and walked out into the street smoking as he went along, looking into the shop windows in Washington street. The fact was, Nehemiah was now really breaking a city ordinance, and laying himself liable to a fine.

It was not long before a policeman, with his badge of office on his hat, accosted him.

"Sir, you must put out that cigar and walk with me," said the officer, with an air of decision that staggered Nehemiah.

"What fur?" stammered Flufkins.

"Smoking in the street."

"Is there a fine for that tew?"

"Yes sir."

"How much?"

"Five dollars."

"Creation! Five dollars. I haven't got but six left."

"Can't help it, you must go with me."

"Look a here—hold on!" said Nehemiah; "I dont want to go no whar."

"You must," said the officer, at the same time looking about him slyly, and seeing no one very near, he added: "it you choose to pay me, why it will save your being locked up."

"Locked-up! Cre-ation! here, there's five dollars," said Nehemiah, handing the officer the money, who pocketed the change and walked away—leaving Mr. Flufkins standing alone seemingly afraid to move backwards or forwards, for fear he should incur another fine.

And this was the case; Flufkins was afraid to move lest he should break some other unknown law of the city. He thought the matter over as well as he could in his confused state of mind, and remembering that he had just one dollar left, enough to carry him home in the cars, he looked all about him for a moment, to see that no one was by to stop him, and then "scratched gravel" like a new one, back towards the depot. As he approached the grocer's house, that had been pointed out to him, as the mayor's, he pulled off his hat and only ran the faster, until he was out of sight of it.

At the head of Hanover street, he was partially stopped by some one who wished to ask the way to some other part of the city, being, like himself, a stranger—but Nehemiah had ears and eyes only for one thing, and misunderstanding the question halloed out:

"Can't help it if 'tis a fine to run; I haven't got no money," and he dashed on like mad to the railroad station.

Nehemiah didn't let out much about his visit to Boston, but merely said he didn't stay long, it was so pesky expensive.—Flag of our Union.

FRIGHTENED INTO SOBRIETY.

A man was picked up in the street, in New York, by the watchmen one morning, to all appearance lifeless, and it being taken almost as a matter of course that he had died from an attack of the prevailing epidemic, cholera, they conveyed him to the hospital, and he was thrown into the dead room. He had not been there long, before two honest sons of Erin, whose business it was to box up and bury the dead, supposing that he had passed through "a regular course of medicine," and came from under the M. D.'s hands, proceeded to put him in a pine coffin, which the city fathers very generously supplied at the public expense, to those whose friends could not supply them.—By this time, the effects of the liquor had been pretty much slept off, and being very roughly handled—which was of course all right—the dead man began to bestir himself, and was not a little surprised, on opening his eyes, to find himself snugly stowed away in a box six feet, three by two, with two men standing over him, making active preparations for putting the lid on.

"What are you about, here?" he exclaimed, raising up in the coffin and staring with no affected amazement at Patrick and Phelim.

"And what are we doing, is it ye ask?" replied Pat. "And sure we're about to bury ye."

"About to bury me! Why, don't you see I ain't dead, you fools!"

"Ain't dead! and isn't that a pretty story for ye to tell. Didn't we find ye in the dead room?"

"And what if you did find me there—can't you see that I am alive? Take me out of this."

"No, indead! What faith can we put in the doctor's word, if ye ain't dead? 'Twould be a label on the institution to suppose ye are alive. So, Phelim, do ye just hold the babbling ghost down, while I nail the lid on; it isn't every man can get a decent burial in these times."

Suiting the action to the word, he seized his hammer to make the lid as fast as nails could make it, while Phelim advanced to "hold him down." Seeing that things were getting quite desperate, and that it was a matter of life or death with him, the toper made an herculean effort, and sprang from the straightened circumstances in which he had been placed by his new acquaintances, and is said to have been a firm teetotaler ever since.

ed; Taunton branch, one killed; Western, eleven killed, or injured. The total is forty-three killed, and thirty-four severely injured. Of the killed, two were engineers, (one by the explosion of a boiler,) two merchandise conductors, one road agent, eleven brakemen, (mostly by striking bridges,) and two baggage masters; eleven men were killed while on or crossing the track; five in consequence of being intoxicated, two passengers were killed by accidentally falling from the platform of the cars. Only three passengers were killed while actually occupying their proper places in the cars, and this was in consequence of the breaking of an axle of a car on the Western Road at Hinsdale.—Boston Traveler.

INDUSTRY APPRECIATED.

An intelligent gentleman of fortune, visited a country village in Maine, not very far from Bangor, and was hospitably entertained and lodged by a gentleman having three daughters—two of whom, in rich dresses, entertained the distinguished stranger in the parlour, while one kept herself in the kitchen, assisting her mother in preparing the food and setting the table for tea, and after supper, doing the work till it was fully completed; when she also joined her sisters in the parlour for the remainder of the evening. The next morning the same daughter was again early in the kitchen, while the other two were in the parlour. The gentleman, like Franklin, possessed a discriminating mind—was a close observer of the habits of the young ladies—watched an opportunity and whispered something in the ear of the industrious one, and then left for a time, but revisited the same family, in about one year, the young lady of the kitchen, was conveyed to Boston the wife of the same gentleman visitor, where she now presides at an elegant mansion. The gentleman whose fortune she shares, she won by a judicious deportment and well directed industry.

So much for an industrious young lady.—Bangor Mercury.

SCRAPS.

Sir W. Temple says, that the first ingredient in conversation is truth; the next, good sense; the third, good humour; and the fourth, wit.

Plato, speaking of passionate persons, says, They are like men who stand on their heads, they see all things the wrong way.

To think is the proper use of the mind, and it is astonishing to find how little this trite truth is recognised.

Winter, which strips the leaves from around us, makes us see the distant regions they formerly concealed; so does old age rob us of our enjoyments, only to enlarge the prospect of the eternity before us.

He who commands himself, commands the world too; and the more authority you have over others, the more command you must have over yourself.

The influence which woman exerts is silent and still, felt rather than seen, not changing the hands, but restraining our actions by gliding into the heart.

Enjoyment is more durable than pain. The one is the immortal firmament, the other the transient clouds which darken it for a time.

How much more might people accomplish, if they would but make it a point to carry out whatever they undertake.

A kind word will often tell more than the severest reproof, and a sigh of sorrow makes a far deeper impression than an open censure.

Open your heart to sympathy, but close it to despondency. The flower which opens to receive the dew, shuts against rain.

If we are not content with such things as we have, we shall never be satisfied with such things as we desire.

An editor of a southern paper, by the name of Long, asked Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, if he ever intended to speak the truth.—Prentice, in reply, says, that he shall probably learn to tell the truth before long!

Those who start for human glory, like the mottled hounds of Acteon, must pursue the game not only where there is a path, but where there is none.

DEGENERACY OF "THE MEN."

Mrs. Partington says, that when she was a gal, she used to go to parties, and always had a beau to extort her home. But now, she says, the gals undergo all such declivities; the task to extort them revolves on their own selves.—The old lady drew down her specks and thanked the stars that she had lived in other days, when men were more palpable in discriminating the worth of the female sex.

To discover how many idle men there are in a place, all that is necessary is to set two dogs a fighting.

A HIT.

In "ye olden tymes" the meeting houses were fitted with two galleries, one for each sex. A minister at Newbury was interrupted one Sunday in his sermon by a talking. He stopped short in his discourse, and remarked that he wished that talking would cease in the gallery, directing his eye at the same time to the women's side—whereupon a venerable spinster arose and said it was not in their gallery, but on the men's side.—"I am glad of it then," replied the parson; "for then it will be likely to stop the sooner."

THEY ASKED NO ODDS.

An Irish Knight was once disputing with a French courtier as to the age and standing of their families, when the latter, as a finisher to the argument, said that his ancestors were in the ark with Noah.

"That is nothing," said the Iberian, "for at the delay of his forefathers were cruising about in a boat of their own!"

A PUZZLE TO BE ANSWERED.

Last Sunday, a little bright-eyed girl of five years of age, was asked by a teacher in one of our Sabbath schools, how many Gods there were. The child hesitated a little, and on being told that there was but one God, she assumed a very doubtful expression, and inquired with great earnestness and simplicity, "How could one God make so many different kinds of religion?" The teacher waived the question, and with a smile turned quickly away from the thoughtful child.—Orange Palladium.

A black snake which had discovered a nest of a woodpecker, climbed up the tree, and putting his head into the hole, swallowed the woodpecker. Alas! when he would have withdrawn, he found his throat so much distended by his supper that he could not get back; and so he died with his length exposed, dangling from the woodpecker's hole, an admonition to all who passed by, not to get into a scrape until they had contrived how to get out of it.

It is said that a young man engaged in battle, saw a drummer at his side killed by a cannon ball, which scattered his brains in every direction. His eyes were at once fixed on the ghastly object, and seemed to engross his thoughts. A superior officer observing him, addressed him in a manner to cheer his spirits. "Oh," said the young man, "I am not frightened; I am only puzzled to make out how any man with such a quantity of brains ever came out here."

A PARENTAL HINT.

When an accident occurs, learn whether it was through misfortune, carelessness or willfulness, before you pass sentence. Accidents are frequently of great service, and children often learn more caution and real information from their occurrences than from fifty lessons.

AN EXCELLENT SUBSTITUTE.

An old clergyman was in the habit, as soon as he got into the pulpit of placing his sermon in a crevice under the cushion, where he left it during the singing of the accustomed psalm.—One Sunday he pushed the sermon too far back into the crevice and lost it. When the psalm was concluded, he called to the clerk to bring him a Bible. The clerk somewhat astonished at this unusual request, brought him a Bible as he was directed. The clergyman opened it, and thus addressed his congregation:—

"My brethren, I have lost my sermon; but I will read you a chapter in Job worth ten of it."

"How do you feel with such a shocking looking coat on?" said a young clerk of more pretensions than brains, one morning to old Roger.

"I feel," said old Roger looking at him steadily with one eye half closed, as if taking aim at the victim, "I feel, young man, as if I had a coat on which has been paid for; a luxury of feeling which I think you will never experience."

"Pray, Miss C.," said a gentleman the other evening, "why are ladies so fond of officers?" "How stupid," replied Miss C. "it is not perfectly natural and proper that a lady should like a good offer sir?"

These six—the peevish, the niggard, the dissatisfied, the passionate, the suspicious, and those who live upon others' means—are forever unhappy.

In Arkansas they head marriage notices thus: "Another bachelor gone." It is deemed a peculiarly appropriate heading, as there are no widowers in that State.

THE FOUNTAIN OF KNOWLEDGE

BY P. P. PRATT.

Modern men have been traditionated to believe that a sacred book was the fountain of Divine knowledge; that the heights and depths, and lengths and breadths of heavenly intelligence is contained therein, and that the human mind must be limited and circumscribed thereby, so as never to receive one particle of knowledge except the small amount contained within its pages.

This cannot be correct, as we shall now proceed to demonstrate: however sacred and true may be the principles contained in a book, yet these principles were true before they were written; and each truth was revealed before it was written, consequently known before it was written; therefore it follows that all revealed knowledge was obtained without books and independent of them; while on the other hand no sacred book would come into existence without the pre-existence of all the principles of revealed knowledge contained therein. It is therefore a self-evident fact, that sacred books are the productions of revealed knowledge, and revealed knowledge is not originally produced from books. Hence a book cannot be the fountain of knowledge; but is at best a stream from the fountain.

Again all books written on perishable materials are liable to destruction; but the fountain of knowledge cannot be destroyed. And should all books be destroyed, all the knowledge contained in them would still exist, and man might derive the very same knowledge from whence it emanated previous to its being written.

Again, all mankind have not had the use of letters; they have not been qualified to read books. Very many of them have lived in ages and in countries where a copy of the Bible could not be procured. The art of printing is a modern discovery; previous to this improvement every copy must needs be written in manuscript at a vast expense of time and labour, which placed them beyond the reach of the greater portion of community—not to mention the fact that even among the most enlightened portions of the earth the scriptures were prohibited by law from being possessed and read by the common people. Where then was the source of divine knowledge to which these millions could come, and drink and live, if not to the God of heaven who revealeth secrets? If the sacred books were the source of divine knowledge, then salvation must have been very limited indeed. Again, a sacred book could never be made to contain a millionth part of the knowledge which an intelligent being is capable of receiving and comprehending. Let us contemplate for a moment the mind's capacity, small at first, but capable of infinite expansion, while a boundless field is extended on all sides, inviting inquiry and meditation.

O man! burst the chains of mortality which bind thee fast; unlock the prison of thy clay tenement which confines thee to this groveling, earthly sphere of action; and robed in immortality, wrapped in the visions of eternity, with organs of sight and thought and speech which cannot be impaired or weakened by time or use; soar with me amid the unnumbered worlds which roll in majesty on high. Ascend the heights; descend the depths; explore the lengths and breadths of organized existence. Learn the present facts, the past history and future destiny of things and beings; of God and his works; of the organizations of angels, of spirits, of men and animals; of worlds and their fulness; of thrones and dominions, principalities and powers. Learn what man was before this life and what he will be in worlds to come. Or seated on a throne celestial, surrounded with the chaotic mass of unorganized existence; search out the origin of matter and of mind. Trace them through all the windings of their order, till purified and exalted all nature seeks a grand sublime repose and enters into rest, to change no more. Enter the sacred archives of the third heavens; hear with John the seven thunders speak, while forked lightnings flash around thy head; and trumps and voices loud proclaim the mysteries which are not lawful for man to utter. And thus with knowledge stored, return to earth, and attempt to write all thou hast seen or known of heaven and earth, of time and eternity, in a book. You will then realize the truth of the language of the poet.

Could we with ink the ocean fill,
Was the whole earth of parchment made,
And every single stick a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade,
To write the love of God above,
Would drain that ocean dry,
Nor could the whole upon a scroll
Be spread from sky to sky."

It is not then to a book, however true or sacred or useful it may be that we would point as the fountain of knowledge; but rather to the great fountain of light and truth enthroned in the midst of the heavens; the revealer of secrets and the author of all the truths in existence, whether written or not.

Knowledge from this source can only be derived by means of direct revelation.

It is communicated unto man by means of the voice of Jehovah; by the ministry of angels; or by visions; and by dreams, as well as by the spirit of prophecy and revelation.

By these means the ancients received all their knowledge of things past, present, and to come, as well as their knowledge of principles, and doctrines and commandments by which they pleased God, and obtained promises and a hope of immortality and eternal life. By this means an Enoch was translated, a Noah saved from the flood, an Abraham honoured and feared among the nations; a Jacob delivered; a Joseph exalted to a throne. By this means a Moses burst the chains of a tyrant, and made a nation free. By this means a Joshua conquered; and a David excelled all the wise men of the east. By this means Jesus Christ conquered death and hell, and ascended to the throne of his father. By this means his apostles spread his gospel among the nations with such unparalleled success.

And in short, by this means a Joseph in modern times has restored the fulness of the gospel; raised the church out of the wilderness; restored to them the faith once delivered to the saints; and caused them to escape the edge of the sword; to break off the fetters of iron; to burst the gloomy vaults of Missouri's dungeons; to put to flight the armies of the aliens, and to confound all the deep laid plots of wicked priests and rulers which have been laid for their destruction.

By this means the Latter Day Saints have risen from obscurity, and after wading through seas of oppression, have won the admiration of millions of intelligent men, both at home and abroad.

The gift of revelation is the key of knowledge. Without it we know comparatively nothing, and with it we may know all things, even the deep things of God.

From the foregoing observations some persons may be disposed to take advantage of the prejudice of the present age, by asserting that we are opposed to the scriptures, or that we wish to throw them out of use, and to turn the minds of men from them, or at least from a just estimation of their value. But such is not the case.

The scriptures are sacred and true, and useful in their place. Although they are not the fountain of knowledge, nor do they contain all knowledge, yet they point to the fountain, and are every way calculated to encourage men to come to the fountain and seek to obtain the knowledge and gifts of God. For instance, who can read of the ancient patriarchs, prophets and apostles, and of their acts, without feeling a desire in his bosom to partake of the same blessings, and to hold intercourse with the same powers?

But me thinks I hear the sighs and groans, and behold the tears of a broken hearted sinner, whose bosom heaves with emotions of alternate hope and fear, of doubt and desire, while faith on the one hand invites him onward, and the strong bands of deep rooted tradition on the other holds him back, and the precepts of men whisper in his ears that revelation has ceased forever, that visions, angels, dreams and the gift of prophecy are not for us; that we must be contented with the history of what others have enjoyed, without expecting to enjoy the same ourselves. To such I would say, be not deceived, God is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. His arm is not shortened, that it cannot save; his ears are not heavy, that he cannot hear; neither is he dumb, that he cannot speak. His angels are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, and his spirit is the same spirit of prophecy and revelation that it was in days of old.

The scriptures command you to covet earnestly the best gifts; but more especially the spirit of prophecy. Paul prays that you may be enriched with the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of God. James says, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." Again, Jesus Christ declares, that no man knows either him or his father, except it be revealed to him. He also declares, that, "to know God and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent, is life eternal." Consequently all who enjoy eternal life must know God by revelation to themselves.

"Come ye weary and heavy laden," ye humble seekers after truth, take courage from all these glorious examples and precious promises; lay hold of the blessings which are calculated to exalt the mind, to enlarge the heart, and to enlighten the understanding, and thus prepare and qualify poor worms of the dust to shine with the wise as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever and ever.

The scriptures are given for the very purpose of inviting and encouraging men to come unto the great fountain of light and truth, where they may enjoy all the blessings which are recorded in them, as having been enjoyed by the ancients. And those who are contented to enjoy the history of blessings, instead of the blessings themselves, may be compared to a man on a desolate island, who has nothing to eat or drink. But while he is famishing and ready to perish with hunger and thirst, he pulls a book from his pocket which contains the history of a feast of things once enjoyed by his forefathers.

He reads with rapture of the light of the delicious meats, the rich viands, the sweet fruits and sparkling wines which were spread upon the plentiful board, and of the joys of those who feasted freely there. But these recollections only serve to whet his appetite, and to increase his cravings after food. In the anguish of hopeless despair, he exclaims, O that I were at my father's house. O that I too might partake of the feast. At this moment a messenger appears before him, in the attitude of an instructor, and kindly offers to relieve him. With a sudden ray of hope springing in his bosom, and with an imploring look of confidence, he inquires, what must I do to be saved from hunger and thirst, and to feast as did my fathers? O friend, save, or I perish.

But judge his feelings of disappointment and anguish when he is gravely told by his instructor that he does not need food as his fathers did; that it was only given to them because they had no sacred record, no history of the past to feast their souls upon, but now the canon of feasting is complete, the record is full, he need not eat as they did, nor drink as they did; but to read the history of their feasting and to believe it, and rejoice in it, would answer the same purpose, and that it was wicked and even presumptuous to desire or ask any food other than that which the reading of their record afforded him. In short, that they had the feast and he had the history of it, which amounted to the same thing, and he must therefore be content.

With these instructions he strives to restrain his appetite, he condemns himself a hundred times for feeling hungry and a thirst; the keener his desires for food and drink, the closer he pursues his study of the history of the feasting. He reads it over and over again, he commits it to memory, he presses it with fervour to his heart, he kisses it with reverence, he lays it for a pillow when he sleeps, and wakes but to read anew. But still he finds no relief; in spite of himself his soul hungers and thirsts for food, such as his parents enjoyed, and he pines out a wretched existence.

But reading still the history of the past, he discovers at last that he had overlooked an important sentence—a sentence which informs him that he must partake of the food for himself as they did for themselves, or starve to death; and at the same time a messenger arrives with food and wine in plenty, and kindly invites him to eat and drink; nay, says he, my instructor told me that this history was all the food I need; that it was enough for me to read and believe that my fathers eat, that it was all the same as to eat myself. But, says the kind instructor, that man was a deceiver, he has imposed upon you. Does not common sense teach you, does not the history itself teach you, that you must feast as well as they, or perish forever?

The poor starving man is at last brought to his senses, and is prevailed on to eat and drink and live. His spirits are then renewed, his soul is satisfied, and he looks with astonishment and wonder upon his former absurdity and that of his teacher, and is surprised to think that such foolish ideas should ever have entered the human mind. So is the man who, led by the vain traditions and precepts of men, is made to believe that the gifts of revelation, vision, the ministry of angels, and prophecy, and all the keys of knowledge which the ancients did enjoy, are not now needed, or to be enjoyed; but that the Bible, which contains the history of them, is all that is necessary. O ye hungry, famishing souls, who have thus been deceived, rouse from your slumbers, break off the shackles of your minds, burst through the thick darkness and gloom of ages, which you are surrounded, and emerge forth into the light and liberty of the gospel, that you may enjoy those great and glorious privileges which have been hid from ages and generations, but which are again made manifest in these last days, for the restoration of all things spoken by the prophets.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,
THURSDAY, JULY 24, 1851.

Our patrons must again excuse us for a long delay in the issue of the Islander. In this place a printer cannot be had to supply the place of any workman who may be called away. And in the midst of such persecutions as we have passed through, it would hardly be possible to keep the publication going on regular, even if workmen could be had.

For nearly a month three-fourths of the men residing on the Island have been away, either as defendants or witnesses. The labour of the fields, even, has fallen upon the women. But it has not been neglected. The crops are well cared for, and in an excellent condition. Indeed, if arrests and prosecutions founded on false witnesses continue, we shall hand over the printing office also to them, and thus keep work moving.

The workmen of the office were absent at Detroit three weeks as witnesses, and previous to that time they were called from the office so much that they could not attend to the publication of a paper for more than a fortnight. We think we shall now be left at rest for a time. If we are not, it is harder on us than our subscribers.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE PROPHET, AND MANY OF THE SAINTS.

On the 24th day of May last the U. S. war steamer Michigan, with a large number of civilians and a full complement of men and arms, came into this place charged with the duty of arresting the prophet and some thirty of the saints, who were accused of every crime known to the laws of the Union, from treason to building a camp fire on a naked beach, with sticks of dry wood which grew on Congress land.

Disappointed at meeting with no resistance, and finding no hostility, they finally determined on taking nobody but James J. Strang, Joseph Ketchum, Finley Page and William Townsend. Mr. Strang became bail for four others, and all the rest were discharged.

At Detroit, where the prisoners were taken, fourteen bills of indictment were found against Mr. Strang, and thirty persons in all were indicted. The proceedings were kept up incessantly until the 8th of July, when a verdict was rendered in favour of thirteen defendants, and they were discharged. This decision also discharged ten others, who had not been taken into custody, and in effect overthrows the whole prosecution.

Pending these proceedings sixteen others were arrested and taken to Mackinac, charged with murder, whose only fault was assisting an officer in the execution of process in a case of violent and dangerous resistance, and under the imperative direction of the law officer of the State. Fourteen of these are yet (July 23d) in custody, but it is thought they will soon be discharged.

Several other arrests have been made on various pretences, but in every case the parties have been set free. During these proceedings the policy has been openly avowed, by our enemies, of continuing the arrests, until they took off all the men, and then to drive off and destroy their families. But this attempt has signally failed. We are rapidly returning, while others of our brethren are gathering up, and the legal redress which we shall seek for these wrongs will tend to scatter our enemies, or gather them to their appropriate resting place at Jackson.

In the whole course of this persecution, with perjury and falsehood without stint against us, no one has been found guilty of an offence, even on the showing of the prosecution. Generally the defendants have introduced no witnesses, and in no case was it necessary in order to their acquittal.

These prosecutions have been carried on with the purpose (in many cases avowed) of destroying the settlement here, but we shall outlive them all, and live to remember the authors of them. The Lord reward them according to their works.

The government has expended more money in this attempt to crush this infant settlement than the whole of Beaver Island would sell for. In some countries governments are instituted for the protection of the weak. We have even heard old people say that such purposes were once entertained in the United States, but we do not ourselves recollect the fact. We are inclined, however, to credit it; for we found in Detroit a righteous Judge, but he was appointed to office so long ago that we cannot remember his patron.

THE POST OFFICE AT BEAVER ISLAND.

We are at a loss to understand the action and purposes of the Post Office Department in regard to the Office here. Last April a petition was sent to the Department, asking the removal of the present Post Master, and the appointment of another, and giving as reasons,

1st. That the P. M. does not reside here, but twelve miles off.
2d. The Office is kept at an out of the way place, exceedingly inconvenient to the inhabitants.

3d. That it is kept in a filthy drinking shop, of the very lowest order; where gambling, brawling and fighting are constantly going on.

4th. That citizens calling at the P. O. on business had been frequently beaten, and in some instances robbed of their letters before leaving the Office.

5th. That letters, and especially money, were not safe in the hands of the person allowed to handle them in the P. O.

This petition was sent by the inhabitants of the township of Peaine, in their corporate capacity, after having been adopted at the regular annual town meeting, by a unanimous vote; and was certified by the members of the Township Board, and the authenticity of the vote and signatures proved by the seal of the Circuit Court. And yet no attention has been paid to it.

Why no attention is paid to it, is more than we can divine. That the Department might have no political objection to appointing a competent and trustworthy P. M., we requested the appointment of a well known Whig.

By the rule of the Department, long since established and well known, non est alone is sufficient ground of removal. Indeed, if Mr. Wright, the P. M. appointed by the late Democratic administration, kept the P. O. himself, we presume we should not object to him. We do not believe he would read, retain or plunder his neighbour's letters, whatever his subordinates may do.

As it is, an indefinite number of persons, without character, who have not taken the oath of office, have access to all mailable matter, without any restraint whatever; mails are sent in a common bag, without a lock, and frequently in no bag at all, by persons not sworn as carriers, and utterly destitute of moral character or personal responsibility. The Department is fully informed of these facts, on the oaths of some of the most respectable citizens and public officers of the county, and yet they pay no attention whatever to it.

Is it their intention to make the laws universally despised, by placing the administration of them in the hands of the most despicable; those who do not know enough to keep them, if they had the disposition, and have not the slightest wish to do so? or what is the explanation of this singular conduct?

LIBERALITY OF THE WHIG ADMINISTRATION.

Many of the papers, including not a few leading Whig papers, are out upon Mr. Fillmore's administration for its disregard of the common rights of the African race. However just this complaint may be in other places, it could not be made here.

Mr. Praiseworthy Bower, a quadron of the first water, possessing all the peculiarities, moral and physical, of that race, holds the office of U. S. Deputy Marshal, and this appointment can only have been made on the sole ground of unblessed merit; for Mr. Praiseworthy has not even the recommendation of being a Whig. He is a Loco Foco, dyed in the wool.

LOST OVERBOARD.

Joseph B. Tyler, a young man aged twenty-one or two years, fell overboard from the brig Constitution about the 30th ult., off this Island, on her last trip up, and was drowned. He was engaged in shanking reefs out of the main sail, and it was not known by the crew that he had fallen over until they heard his cries from the water. The boat was lowered and the vessel heaved to, but before his comrades could reach him he sank beneath the waves. Young Tyler was an old schoolmate and acquaintance of ours, and was respected by all who knew him. He was a favourite with the officers and crew of the Constitution, by whom his loss is greatly deplored. He was a resident of Saybrook, Ashabua Co., Ohio.

Any person discovering the body of said deceased on the shores of the Islands in this vicinity, will confer a great favour on his relatives and friends by having the information of its whereabouts at this office.

Locally P. Kim is appointed County Judge of Mackinac county until the first day of January next, in place of Samuel Abbott, deceased.

Also, Hiram S. May to be Circuit Court Commissioner for the county of Mackinac.

We learn from our exchanges that the cholera is spreading to considerable extent in the southern States. We have also heard of a few cases in the eastern and northern States. But we hear of no sickness here.

We have received the August number of Godey's Lady's Book, containing his usual beautiful variety of plates and reading matter. We have also received two or three back numbers, for which we sent some time since.

The weather for a few days past has been very warm and pleasant, and the prospect for an abundant crop of potatoes and grain is good.

Our thanks to Captain Douglas, of the Propeller Troy, for late eastern papers in advance of the mail.

TO MY PRIVATE CORRESPONDENTS.

You will please hereafter address me at the Post Office at Mackinac, instead of this place. I am unable to obtain letters through the office at this place, and prefer to send fifty miles rather than have my correspondence entirely cut off.

JAMES J. STRANG.
July 20, 1851.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All persons writing by mail to this office are requested to direct their communications to Mackinac, instead of Beaver Island. We do not deem anything, even the most ordinary and unimportant letter safe in the hands of some men in the P. O. here, and we can get them from an office fifty miles off with less trouble and delay.

MORMON PERSECUTION.

We are gratified in being enabled to announce a verdict of acquittal in the United States District Court, of all the defendants. We had feared that such would not be the result, notwithstanding our entire confidence in their innocence. The laboured efforts made by the Advertiser clique, in Detroit, to convict the defendants in advance of the trial, we had feared would have been felt in the jury box.

The jury, we learn, was composed of ten Whigs and two Democrats, from which we infer the result to be anything but gratifying to those who have attempted to enlist the elements of political warfare for the purpose of convicting men innocent of the crime allged against them.

The Free Press of the 10th inst. reads the Advertiser's a beautiful homily upon the impropriety of leading itself to such base uses as manufacturing through its columns public opinion, to be felt in the jury box. We perfectly agree with the Free Press in the most manly and noble course, and our forbear entering our solemn protest against the employment of branded and convicted felons, with promises of reward to hunt out and report the moral delinquencies of our fellow citizens, and by their own hands bring down their victims to be led with themselves.—St. Albans Chronicle.

The trial of King Strang and other Mormons, in the U. S. Court, in Detroit, for obstructing the mail, &c., has been concluded—verdict of the Jury, not guilty.

While we have no doubt this verdict, by an honest jury, is justified by the evidence in the case, and in strict keeping with every principle of right and justice, it could not have been otherwise than positively mortifying to the Detroit Advertiser. That paper with a great flourish of trumpets, heralded the departure of District Attorney Bates and Marshal Knox, with the U. S. war steamer to Beaver Island, to arrest Strang and his party—gave its own one-sided and bitterly prejudiced version of the affair, and to complete the matter, as fully prejudged the case and condemned the parties unheard—a step grossly abusing the license of the press, and for which no excuse can be offered. Nor did the Advertiser stop here. Thwarted in its designs to wreak vengeance on the Mormons by the verdict of an intelligent jury, it barely attacks the District Judge by insinuating that this verdict was rendered because of instructions by the court. Verily, this is a poor subterfuge to escape the indignation every man must feel for the unprecedented and unjustifiable course of the Advertiser. It is a hard lesson—may it not be in vain.—Arch. St. Journal.

EDITOR'S ISLANDER.—I have just returned from the region about Grand Rapids, Mich., and take pleasure in informing your readers that the prospects of those engaged in the gospel ministry there are good. We had an interesting Conference ten miles north of the Rapids, which was well attended. Calls and invitations to preach came in to us from various quarters. We found some excellent friends ready to sustain and assist us, and the late persecutions, instead of stopping the progress of the gospel, seemed to give it a new impetus. Going without purse or scrip, we wanted for nothing. The lies about us in the newspapers were too ridiculous to be credited by sensible men, and a spirit of inquiry for the truth was found in many places. Bro. Preston is there, dispensing the words and sacraments of the gospel. Truly

Henry county, Alabama. A delegation was sent from Milton, Santa Rosa Co., Florida, to get him from the authorities in Alabama and bring him to Milton, which was done. Yesterday he was executed in Milton by the people without a trial. The negro who assisted him belonging to Joseph Forsyth, was also hanged at the same time yesterday, Friday, May 30, at half past twelve o'clock.

He confessed the crime, and said he richly deserved death, for he had been a villain all his life. He had twenty wives living, and had killed sixteen men, and all he was sorry for, was that he was not permitted to live to kill four more. He and the negro Jack were both hung to one tree and buried in one grave. Repentance and remorse were strangers to him. He said his father and brother were both hung. He refused to make any further confession, as he would implicate many heads of families who passed as respectable, and would thereby

THE RIVER.

Thou swift gliding river,
On thy murmuring stream,
How calmly at evening
Sleep moonlight's pale beams:
By thy smooth shining waters
I've stood many times,
While thy voice was sweet,
As the last vesper chime.
Thy pure bosom mirrored
The sky on its breast,
Where it slept in the sunlight,
Like an infant at rest;
And thy bank of reeds
By the green drooping willow,
As they leaned o'er thy wave,
Like hope o'er death's pillow.
By thy clear silver stream,
Loved river of light,
How oft have I wandered
When all things were bright;
The fields clothed in beauty,
Were spread far away,
While the dew-drops like pearls
On the bending grass lay.
O, home of my childhood,
Lov'd scenes of my youth,
Ye come back to memory,
With beauty and truth;
The old woods of pine,
The hills green as ever,
But dearest of all
Is that sweet gliding river.

Correspondence of the Old Colony Memorial.
Mackinac, Mich., Dec. 1st, 1850.

Mr. Editor:—All the world has seen, heard, written and read of Mackinac. But I doubt if a few words of familiar description would fall on the ear of many as an old told tale. The Island of Mackinac is a mountain in the western extremity of Lake Huron, about two miles by three in extent, and 650 feet high, lying in the jaws of the Straits of Mackinac, as you pass into the Straits, from Lake Huron. North and west of it the Straits are 4 miles wide, separating it from the upper peninsula of Michigan. South, a Strait of a mile separates it from Round Island, about a half mile in extent, and immediately beyond that is Bois Blanc Island stretching 10 miles S. E., and separated from the southern peninsula by a channel four miles wide.

Mackinac Island as I said, is a mountain in the Lake. Upon its extreme summit, and nearly central in the Island, is an old dilapidated fort, long since abandoned. At the top of a bold bluff on the south side of the Island is the present Fort Mackinac, a rocky affair, kept by a garrison of 28 men, and perfectly commanded by the heights where the old fort has gone to decay.

At the bottom of this bluff, is the town of Mackinac. It consists of only two streets, one of them extending a mile around the open and indifferent harbour, immediately under the bluff, and built up on only one side. The other street lays back of this and parallel to it at the west end of the town, and terminating against the bluff immediately under the fort. There are a few decent looking plain buildings in the village, but most of it consists of old rickety, outlandish looking buildings; not a few of them consisting of cedar poles set up in the ground, and in some instances, weather-boarded and roofed with cedar bark. Others again are indifferent framed work, the panels filled with short bits of poles, laying horizontal from stud to stud, and pointed, outside and in, with lime, and sand. Even the yard and garden fences are generally palisades of cedar posts set up in the ground, post against post.

The harbour is an open road, with no barrier between it and the tempests of Lake Huron. It is only exposed however to storms from the east. Nearly all the steamboats running on Lake Michigan stop, going and returning, making the average stoppages equal to two first class steamers daily. About a dozen sailing vessels are engaged constantly from Mackinac, to all the fishing grounds and settlements in the region. They give to the place activity and commercial importance. The freight gathered up by them keeps up the inducement to all the large boats to call at Mackinac rather than at other places in the region, and secures to it its present importance.

But the Island is destitute of timber, and nearly destitute of soil. There are but three farms on it, and they are of the most indifferent quality. It has no manufacturers, but the making of fish barrels, and that could be done in other places to better advantage, but that the shops are already established at this place. Even fuel for the inhabitants cannot be obtained on the Island; and there are fifty places in the region possessing more advantages for places of trade than Mackinac.

The present town of Mackinac was commenced some seventy or eighty years since; after the destruction by the Indians of the settlement at old Fort Michilimackinac, which was situated at the narrowest part of the straits and at the extreme northern point of the peninsula. The country was then filled with hostile Indians, and the Island of Mackinac was selected as the most defensible position. The British kept a garrison here till the country was given up under Jay's treaty—I believe in 1795. The United States immediately garrisoned it and retained it till 1812, when it was taken by the British. At the close of the war it was again given up to the United States, and they have kept a garrison there ever since.

The white inhabitants have not been free from fear of Indian hostilities till within the last 16 years. Every trader sought to get his business under the guns of the fort. Hence all the trading establishments were built up at Mackinac for the protection that the fort gave them, rather than as the best location for business.—The vast establishment of the American Fur Company, whose goods have sold to the amount of half a million dollars yearly, is here. The Indian Department of the U. S. has its situation here for all the upper region. For the same reason Mackinac became the county seat of a county which now includes a quarter of the State. Since the danger of Indian hostilities has passed by, the large amount of capital which has been invested at Mackinac serves to keep business there. The traders of the place are wealthy, and conscious that on the establishment and building up of other towns, this will lose its consequence, and are securing at Mackinac its present pre-eminence by every means that wealth, talent and influence can bring to bear.

Against them is the fact, that the steamboats to the upper Lakes can run the south channel, seven miles nearer, and in better navigation.—The harbour at L'Anvers on the southern peninsula at the mouth of Cheboygan river, is better than Mackinac. The river affords good water power where pine lumber is extensively made, and wood can be furnished to steamboats which at Mackinac cannot. L'Anvers being on main land is accessible by the inhabitants of the surrounding regions at all times—and is therefore more convenient as a market town.—Some enterprising Scotchmen have begun a settlement there and must soon make it a rival to Mackinac. The shortening of the distance and the supply of wood will draw the steamboats there, and with emigration and the settlement of a fine region of back country, this town will soon raise to importance.

Forty-two miles west of Mackinac is the town of St. James, the chief town of the Mormons, on Big Beaver Island. St. James is just west of the usual channel of the boats from Buffalo to Chicago, Green Bay and all the towns on Lake Michigan. It has the best harbour between Chicago and Buffalo, it being a bay one mile across either way, perfectly land-locked, with from 25 to 30 feet water, and good anchorage; not a rock in it, and in places the shore is so bold that passengers can be landed from the gangway plank on shore without a dock. This harbour is in the very centre of the fishing region, and the place to which naturally all the fish should be sent to be shipped to distant markets, and where the fishermen could most easily get their supplies. The Island is sufficiently extensive for 1000 good farms, and is being rapidly brought into cultivation, which will fill the markets of the town with the supplies necessary for trade, all of which Mackinac is destitute of. It is well timbered, and is furnishing enormous quantities of wood to the steamboats, by which means transportation and passage can be obtained from there as readily as at Mackinac. The inhabitants are obtaining small sailing vessels and making efforts to draw the fishing trade there also, in which they must succeed as soon as they can enlist a little more capital, as the fishermen can send to St. James for supplies and store their fish at less than half the expense they can at Mackinac. It is to the fishing region what Boston is to New England, geographically, but Mackinac is the same as Halifax. Two years ago the fish caught in the harbour were sent to this place to be shipped. This year I learn that 15,000 barrels were shipped for Cleveland, Buffalo and Rochester by various persons at St. James.

I will not attempt to speak of St. James at the present except as a rival of Mackinac, because I expect to visit it before leaving this region. Three years ago last May, Mr. Strang, the Mormon Prophet, passed through this place accompanied by four of his followers, on his way to Beaver to begin the Mormon Settlement there. They sold their blankets for their passage over, remained four weeks on the Island, exploring, and supporting themselves principally by hunting, and leaving two to begin the settlement, he with the two others returned in a fish boat which happened to call there. Not a single man of capital has joined them, and yet they now have a flourishing village of 700 inhabitants, and a commerce of $100,000 a year, exports, and a still greater amount of imports.

As a fortress commanding the entrance to Lake Michigan, Mackinac is likely to maintain its consequence, long after it loses it as a place of commerce. Its position at the very opening of the straits, its height above all the surrounding lands and its bold rocky cliffs, make it naturally a strong and valuable situation. Yet even in this respect should we prevail on this line for a long period it might lose its consequence. Vessels can pass either side of it beyond the reach of its guns.—But eight miles to the west of it where the straits is not above 3 1/2 miles wide there is a flat in the middle of the strait with but 4 feet water on it. On that flat a castle could be built at a moderate cost which would entirely command the passage, and would itself be impregnable.

Among the curiosities of Mackinac are Lover's leap to the west, and folly rock to the east of the town, each 250 or 300 feet high, overhanging, and the scenes of several interesting Indian legends. Arch rock on the east side of the Island, where the path up the mountain passes under two enormous natural arches. We approached the rock, an enormous cliff almost perpendicular above the narrow beach, and turning into a gorge with the rock overhanging on the right after climbing up a steep path fifty feet, came to an opening 20 feet high and 40 wide extending quite through the rock to the right. As we got through that looking up the hill to my left what was my astonishment, at seeing the steep ascent spanned by another arch 150 feet high and spanning 150 feet from side to side. The body of rock which forms this arch is perhaps 20 feet deep and 6 feet thick, but at the very top presents a surface not more than a foot wide. The more bold visitors usually try the feat of walking over it. I reserved my courage for a more pressing occasion.

Near the centre of the Island, but to the north of the old fort and not at its highest part is the pyramid rock, a natural obelisk standing on a small hill of rock and of a block of cavernous limestone, perhaps 60 feet in diameter and 130 feet high. In the north side is an entrance and a cavern large enough to secure a dozen men. The entrance of the cavern is about 20 feet above the surface. Upon the very apex of the Island and on the wall of the old fort is an observatory, from which in clear weather you can get a view of the country for 70 miles in every direction, and including some of the grandest scenery ever looked upon by the eye of man. In the east the eye barely reaches the 30,000 Islands of Lake Huron; to the west it includes the Mormon Islands; to the north on the hills and rocks, the narrow valleys and the steep ridges of the upper peninsula and the mountains beyond the Sault; to the south on the extensive prairies and the variegated forests of the lower peninsula. In all directions are lakes, bays, rivers and islands, rich in the exuberance of nature's beauties, and here and there cursed by the hand of man. Several times a day the majestic steamboats of 600 to 1100 tons burthen come puffing by, and in strange contrast ever and anon the frail bark canoe of the Indian shoots out from some lone bay, proving itself quite as much the spirit of the wave as the best workmanship of the white man.

Speaking of bark canoes I must tell you a tale. Several years ago the Propeller Republic stepped at Mackinac on her last trip up, very late in the season. Four gentlemen passengers went out to look over the Island and when they returned the Propeller had left and was five miles out. It was the last boat of the season, and after attempting in vain to call the attention of the Capt. by signals, they gave up in despair, to remain on the island till spring. An old Indian offered to put them aboard the Propeller for $5 apiece. The offer was not to be refused, and getting a good Indian boat crew aboard, he stowed his passengers for ballast, and seating every Indian in the bottom put out. The Propeller was now 5 or 6 miles out, and the wind blowing a tempest, but before they passed the lightship, 23 miles west of Mackinac, he was alongside. As the canoe approached the Capt. got up steam as high as he dared, to show that he could go faster than the canoe, but the Indian, not to be beat in that way, made an extra effort with all hands, and actually paddled his canoe around the Propeller. The black bark canoe sits the lightest on the water of any craft ever built, and for heavy and light weather is doubtless the fastest sailer. Truly and sincerely, S.

WEAVING IN IRON.

The new cloth just coming into use.—What an improvement.—Strange as the idea may seem, it is no less strange than true; that iron of a thickness that would make it appear impossible that could be worked by any other agency than the forge, the anvil, and the hammer, is now, by the aid of new and powerful machinery, woven into the most beautiful patterns, and the designs varied with almost the same facility as in the weaving of a carpet, or a table cover. The specimens that we have seen, excel in beauty and finish any iron railing that we have ever seen, and do not cost more than half the ordinary cost of even cast iron railing. Many of the first class counting houses and offices in New York, are now fitted up with this railing in preference to any other heretofore or at present in use.

The uses of the invention, however, are not confined to railings, as the most tasteful verandas, window gratings, garden fences, &c., are made by it. The coal miners of Pennsylvania prefer it above all other modes, for their screens. Charleston and New Orleans each have parks enclosed with it, and many of the rich southerners have their flower conservatories enclosed in the same manner. In fact, wherever it has been introduced, it has come into almost unlimited favour. The peculiar advantage it possesses over all other kinds of railing, is, that in its manufacture, the rod or wire is so cramped that in the weaving process they are crossed in a manner that one binds the other, thus giving a mutual support to the whole, that renders it more durable than work twenty times its weight made in the old way.

John Wickersham, of N. Y., the ingenious inventor, also manufactures a superior article of iron wire farm fences, that cost but little, will last a man his life time, and are easily constructed. In thinly wooded countries they will come into rapid demand, as they already are in many parts of Europe. Add to these, one more article. Mr. Wickersham manufactures a bedstead of iron so constructed that it can be shut up during the day time, and will require but a few inches of room from the wall out, is bug proof, and easily managed. We think his store is worthy a visit to those who visit the city of New York.—Albany Register.

MATRIMONY AMONG THE INDIANS.

An aged Indian, who, for many years, had spent much time among the white people, both in Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, one day observed that the Indians had not only a much easier way of getting a wife than the whites, but also a more certain way of getting a good one.

"For," said he, in broken English, "white man court—court—may be one year—may be two years before he marry. Well—may be then he get good wife, but may be not—may be very cross! Scold so soon as get awake in the morning! Scold all day! Scold until sleep! all one—he must keep her. White man have law forbidding throw away wife, she be ever so cross—must keep him always.—Well, how does Indian do? Indian, when he see industrious squaw, he go to him, place his two fore fingers close aside each other, make two like one; then look squaw in the face—see him smile—this is all one—he say yes! So he take him home—no danger he be cross! No, no—squaw know too well what Indian do if he be cross! throw him away and take another! Squaw do everything to please husband, he do everything to please squaw—live happy."—Ledger.

LABOUR AND GOOD TEMPER.

The doom of labour is a blessing, not a curse, and it is a sound maxim, in time of enlightened philanthropy, to assume that poverty is the result of want of occupation, for it is idleness that begets seven-eighths of the vice, profligacy and crime, that twine with poverty.

Let young people remember, that industry and good temper will gain them more esteem and happiness, than the genius and talents of all the bad men that ever existed.

Keep at work if you would be happy—there is more true enjoyment in sweating an hour than in yawning a century, and in one victory over yourself, than in a thousand paroxysms of anger, or gratifications of revengeful feelings.

THE LADIES.

A Female Society down east, passed the following resolutions:

That we will receive the attentions of no "so styled" young gentleman, who has not learned some business, or engaged in some steady employment for a livelihood. For it is to be apprehended that after the bird is caught it may starve in the cage.

That we will promise marriage to no young man who is in the habit of tippling, for we are assured that his wife will come to want, and his children go barefoot.

That we will marry no young man who is not a patron of his neighbourhood paper, for we have not only strong evidence of his want of intelligence, but that he will prove too stingy to provide for his family, educate his children, or encourage institutions of learning in his vicinity.

SINGULAR CASE.

A woman in the First Municipality of New Orleans, about four weeks ago, presented her husband with three fine boys at a look. On the morning of the 10th ult., the woman was again taken ill, and soon afterwards gave birth to a fourth boy. This is one of the most singular cases on record, says the physicians.

DOUBTFUL.

It is said that an enthusiastic amateur in Havana, while watching Jenny Lind in one of her walks, saw her gently stumble over a brick. As soon as she had passed on, he rushed to the spot, and in order to testify his admiration captured the brick and carried it in his hat ever since.

A Rhode Island lad, under examination by a Connecticut schoolmaster, being asked: "How many gods are there?" The boy, after scratching his head some time, replied: "I won't know how many you've got in Connecticut; but we have none in Rhode Island!"

A certain divine about to change his congregation, mentioned that subject from the pulpit. After service was over, an old negro man, who was one of his admirers, went up to him, and desired to know the motives of his leaving his first flock. The parson answered, "I have a call."

"Av, massa," returned the negro, "who called you?"
"The Lord," answered the parson.
"Ay, massa, he called ye?"
"Yes, Jack, he called me."
"Massa, what do you get here?"
"I get six hundred dollars."
"And what you get to der place?"
"I am to get one thousand dollars."
"Ay, massa, the Lord call you till he be blind from one thousand dollars to six hundred—you no go!"

UNGUARDED SPEECH.

Henry Cary, a cousin to Queen Elizabeth, after having enjoyed her majesty's favour for several years, lost it in the following manner: As he was walking in the garden palace under the Queen's window, she asked him in a jocular manner:

"What does a man think of when he is thinking of nothing?"
"Upon a woman's promise," he replied.
"Well done, cousin," replied Elizabeth. Some time after he solicited the honour of a peerage, and reminded the Queen that she had promised it to him.
"True," said she, "but that was a woman's promise."

A WANT AS IS A WANT.

An editor somewhere advertises for a dog, after this fashion. We hope he got him: Wanted at this office, a bulldog, of any color, except pumpkin and milk; of respectable size, snub nose, cropped ears, abbreviated continuation, and bad disposition, who can come when called with a raw beefsteak, and will bite the man who spits tobacco juice on the stove, and steals the exchanges.

"My son," said Mr. Smith to his boy who was devouring an egg—it was Mr. Smith's desire to instruct his boy—"my son, do you know that chickens come out of eggs?"
"Ah, do they, father?" said young hopeful, "I thought that eggs came out of chickens."
The elder Smith drew back from the table sadly, and gazed upon his son, then put on his hat and went to his work.

CONUNDRUMS.

"Mr. Snow, I want to ask you one question."
"Propel it, den."
"Why am a grog shop like a counterfeit dollar?"
"Well, Ginger, I gibs dat right up."
"Does you gib it up?"—Kase you can't pass it.
"Oh, de Lord, what a nigger!" "Why am your head like a bag of dollars?"
"Go away from me—why am it?"
"Well, you always will hab de last word."
"Kase dere's no sense (cents) in it."

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT OF THE CHINESE.

A most cruel sentence.—A Chinese merchant accused and convicted of having killed his wife, was sentenced to die by the total deprivation of sleep. The execution took place at Amoy, in the month of June last. The condemned was placed in a position under the surveillance of three guardians, who relieved each other at every alternate hour, and who prevented him from taking sleep night or day. He lived thus for nineteen days, without having slept for a single minute. At the commencement of the eighth day, his sufferings were so great, that he begged as a great favour, that they would kill him.

TWELVE PERSONS BURNED TO DEATH.

A dear jug of Whiskey.—JOHN HANNEGAN, of Harrison county, Indiana, last week moved into a new house, and in the evening concluded to celebrate the event with a jollification, to aid him in which he obtained a gallon of whiskey. At 11 o'clock the neighbours discovered the house in flames, nearly consumed, and in it were HANNEGAN, his wife, seven children and mother-in-law, a man named Patrick Shane and another man, name is unknown—in all, twelve persons! One of the children was found near the door, where it is supposed to have fallen in trying to make its escape. A dear gallon of whiskey!—Cin. Eng.

A celebrated coloured preacher in speaking of the "division of the sheep and goats," said—"Bredon, you can see which side the culled pussons will be on, for dey hab de wool."

A Yankee has just invented a suspender that so contracts on your approach to water, that the moment you come to a puddle it lifts you over, and drops you on the opposite side.

Napoleon used to say: "A handsome woman pleases the eye, but a good woman pleases the heart. The one is a jewel, the other a treasure."

The best power to advance the marriage of a young lady, is, when she has in her countenance mildness, in her speech wisdom, in her behaviour modesty, in her life virtue.

Why should marriage be spoken of as a tender tie, when it is so confoundedly tough that nothing but death can cut it?

LOTTERY FOR LIFE.

AN INCIDENT IN THE WAR OF MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE.

The following thrilling narrative is from a recent translation in Sharpe's Magazine. A Captain in the Mexican insurgent army is giving an account of a meditated night attack upon a hacienda, situated in the Cordillera, and occupied by a large force of Spanish soldiers. After a variety of details, he continues:—

Having arrived at the hacienda unperceived, thanks to the obscure of a moonless night, we came to a halt under some large trees, at some distance from the building, and I rode forward from my troop in order to reconnoitre the place. The hacienda, so far as I could see in gliding across, formed a huge parallelogram, strengthened by enormous buttresses of hewn stone. Along this chasm, the walls of the hacienda almost formed the continuation of another perpendicular one, chiselled by nature herself in the rocks, to the bottom of which the eye could not penetrate, for the mists which incessantly boiled up from below did not allow it to measure their awful depth. This place was known in the country by "the Voladero."

I had explored all sides of the building except this, when I know what scruple of military honour incited me to continue my ride along the ravine which protected the rear of the hacienda. Between the walls and the precipice, there was a narrow pathway about six feet wide; by day, the passage would not have been dangerous, but by night it was a perilous enterprise.

The walls of the farm took an extensive sweep, the path crept around their entire basement, and to follow it to the end in darkness, only two paces from the edge of a perpendicular chasm, was no very easy task, even for a practised horseman as myself.
Nevertheless, I did not hesitate, but boldly urged my horse between the walls of the farm and the abyss of the Voladero. I had got over half the distance without accident, when all of a sudden my horse neighed aloud. The neigh made me shudder. I had reached a pass where the ground was just wide enough for the forelegs of a horse, and it was impossible to retrace my steps.

"Hallo!" I exclaimed aloud, at the risk of betraying myself—which was less dangerous than encountering a horseman in front of me on such a road. "There is a christian passing along the ravine! Keep back."

It was too late. At that moment, a man on horseback passed round one of the buttresses, which here and there obstructed this accursed pathway. He advanced towards me. I trembled in my saddle; my forehead bathed in a cold sweat.

"For the love of God, can you not return?" I exclaimed, terrified at the fearful situation in which we both were placed.

"Impossible!" replied the horseman in a hollow voice.

I recommended my soul to God.
To turn our horses round for want of room, to back them along the path which we had traversed, or even to dismount from them,
those were three impossibilities which placed us both in presence of a fearful doom. Between two horsemen, so placed upon this fearful path, had they been father and son, one of them must inevitably have become the prey of the abyss. But a few seconds had passed; and we were already face to face—the unknown and myself. Our horses were head to head, and their nostrils dilated with terror, mingled together their fiery breathing. Both of us halted in a dead silence.— Above was the smooth and lofty wall of the hacienda; on the other side, but three feet distance from the wall, opened the horrible gulf. Was it an enemy I had before my eyes? The love of my country, which boiled at that period in my young bosom, led me to hope that it was.

"Are you for Mexico and the Insurgents?" I exclaimed in a moment of excitement, ready to spring upon the unknown horseman if he should answer me in the negative.

"Mexico e Insurgente—that is my password," replied the cavalier. "I am the Colonel Garduno."

"And I am the Captain Castonas!"

Our acquaintance was of long standing, and, but for mutual agitation, we should have had no need to exchange our names.—
The Colonel had left us two days before at the head of the detachment, which we supposed to be either prisoners or cut off, for he had not been seen to return to the camp.

"Well, Colonel," I exclaimed,
"I am sorry you are not a Spaniard—for you perceive one of us must yield the pathway to the other."

Our horses had the bridle on their necks, and I put my hands to the holsters of my saddle to draw out my pistols.

"I see it so plainly," replied the Colonel, with alarming coolness, "that I should already have blown out the brains of your horse, but for the fear lest mine, in a moment of terror, should precipitate me with yourself to the bottom of the abyss."

I remarked in fact, that the Colonel already held his pistols in his hand. We both maintained almost profound silence. Our horses felt the danger like ourselves, and remained as immovable as if their feet were nailed to the ground. My excitement had entirely subsided. "What are we going to do?" I demanded of the Colonel.

"Draw lots which of the two shall leap into the ravine."

It was in truth the sole means of resolving the difficulty. "There are, nevertheless, some precautions to take," said the Colonel.
"He who shall be condemned by the lot shall retire backwards.—
It will be but a feeble chance of escape for him, I admit; but in short, it is a chance, and especially one in favour of the winner."

"You cling not to life, then?"
I cried out, terrified at the sangfroid with which this proposition was put to me.

"I cling to life more than yourself," sharply replied the Colonel,
"for I have a mortal outrage to avenge. But the time is slipping away. Are you ready to draw the last lottery at which one of us will ever assist?"

How were we to proceed to drawing by lot? By means of the wet finger like infants, or by head and tail, like school boys?
Both ways were impracticable.—
Our hands imprudently stretched out over the heads of our frightened horses, might cause them to give a fatal start. Should we toss up a piece of coin, the night was too dark to enable us to distinguish which side fell upwards.
The Colonel bethought him of an expedient, of which I never should have dreamed.

"Listen to me, Captain," said
the Colonel, to whom I had communicated my perplexities; "I have another way. The terror which our horses feel makes them draw every moment a burning breath. The first of us two whose horse shall neigh—

"Wins?" I hastily exclaimed.

"Not so—shall be the loser.—
I know that you are a countryman, and such as you can do whatever you please with your horse. As to myself, who but last year wore the gown of a theological student, I fear your equestrian prowess. You may be able to make your horse neigh —to hinder him from doing so is a very different matter."

We waited in deep and anxious silence until the voice of one of our horses should break forth.
This silence lasted for a minute—for an age! It was my horse which neighed first. The Colonel gave no external manifestations of his joy, but no doubt he thanked God to the very bottom of his soul.

"You will allow me a minute to make my peace with heaven?"
I said to the Colonel, with a failing voice.

"Will five minutes be sufficient?"

"It will," I replied. The Colonel pulled out his watch. I addressed towards the heavens, brilliant with stars, which I thought

I was looking up to for the last time, an intense and a burning prayer.

"It is time," said the Colonel.
I answered nothing, and with a firm hand gathered up the bridle of my horse, and drew it within my fingers, which were agitated with a nervous tremour.

"Yet one moment more," I said to the Colonel; "for I have need of all my coolness to carry into execution the fearful manœu-vre which I am about to commence."

"Granted," replied Garduno.

My education, as I have told you, had been in the country.—
My childhood, and part of my earliest youth, had almost been passed on horseback. I may say without flattering myself, that if there was any one in the world capable of performing this equestrian feat, it was myself. I rallied myself with an almost supernatural effort, and succeeded in recovering my entire self-possession in the very face of death.—
Take it at the worst, I had already braved it too often to be any longer alarmed at it. From that instant, I dared to hope afresh.

As soon as my horse felt for the first time since my rencounter with the Colonel the bit compressing his mouth, I perceived that he trembled beneath me.—
I strengthened myself firmly on my stirrups, to make the terrified animal understand that his master no longer trembled. I held him up with the bridle and the hams, as every good horseman does in a dangerous passage, and,
with the bridle, the body, and the spur together, succeeded in backing him a few paces. His head was already a greater distance from that of the horse of the Colonel, who encouraged me all he could with his voice.

This done, I let the poor trembling brute, who obeyed me in spite of his terror, repose for a few moments—and then recommenced the same manœuvre.—
All on a sudden I felt his hind legs give way under me. A horrid shudder ran through my whole frame. I closed my eyes as if about to roll to the bottom of the abyss, and I gave to my body a violent impulse on the side, next the hacienda, the surface of which offered not a single projection, not a single tuft of weeds to check my descent. This sudden movement, joined to the desperate struggle of my horse, was the salvation of my life. He had sprung up again on his legs, which seemed ready to fall from under him, so desperately did I feel them tremble.

I had succeeded in reaching,
between the brink of the precipice and the wall of the building, a spot some few inches broader. A few more would have enabled me to turn him round, but to attempt it here would have been fatal, and I dared not venture. I sought to resume my backward progress step by step.

Twice the horse threw himself on his hind legs, and fell down upon the same spot. It was in vain to urge him anew, either with voice, bridle, or spur; the animal obstinately refused to take a single step in the rear.

Nevertheless, I did not feel my courage yet exhausted, for I had no desire to die. One last solitary chance for safety suddenly appeared to me like a flash of light, and I resolved to employ it.
Through the fastening of my boot, and in reach of my hand, was passed a sharp and keen knife, which I drew forth from its sheath.
With my left hand I began caressing the mane of my horse, all the while letting him hear my voice.

The poor animal replied to my caresses by a plaintive neighing;
then, not to alarm him abruptly, my hand followed by little and little the curve of his nervous neck, and finally rested upon the spot where the last of the vertebrae unites itself with the cranium.—
The horse trembled, but I calmed him with my voice. When I felt his very life, so to speak, palpitate in his brain beneath my fingers, I leaned over towards the wall, my feet gently sliding from the stirrups, and with one vigourous blow I buried the pointed blade of my knife in the seat of the vital principle. The animal fell as if thunderstruck, without a single motion; and for myself, with my knees about as high as my chin, I found myself on horseback across a corpse. I was saved.

I uttered a triumphant cry, which was responded to by the Colonel, and which the abyss re-echoed with a hollow sound, as if it felt that its prey had escaped from it. I quitted the saddle, sat myself down between the wall and the body of my horse, and vigourously pushed with my feet against the carcass of the wretched animal, which rolled down into the abyss. I then arose and cleared at a few bounds, the distance which separated the place where I was from the plain; and under the irresistible reaction of the terror which I had so long repressed, I sunk in a swoon upon the ground. When I reopened my eyes, the Colonel was by my side.

Never be cast down by trifles. If a spider breaks his thread twenty times, twenty times will he mend it again.—
Make up your mind to do a thing, and you will do it. Fear not if a trouble comes upon you; keep your spirits, tho' the day be a dark one.

An idle fellow the other day, complained bitterly of his hard lot, said that he was born on the last day of the year, the last day of the month, and the last day of the week, and he had always thought it would have been a hundred dollars in his pocket if he had not been born at all.

TRESPASSES UPON UNITED STATES LANDS.

As much has been said and done in this region of late about trespasses on government lands, we take this occasion to say,

1st. That every settlement made on government lands, for the purpose of permanent occupancy and improvement, is a lawful settlement, under the act of Congress granting pre-emption rights to actual settlers.

2d. That no subsequent neglect, on the part of the settler, to file in the Register's office the proper evidence of settlement, for the purpose of securing his pre-emption, can render the settlement tortuous & invalid. The entry being lawful, the party in possession has all the rights and immunities of a tenant de jure, until evicted by authority of law.

3d. That any person entering upon United States land, in pursuance of the pre-emption law, is in legal possession of the entire quarter section on which he resides, and has a lawful right to cut timber and make improvements on any part of it, and the timber so cut belongs to him as truly as though he had purchased and paid for the lands.

4th. That an action of trespass quære clausum fregit will not lie against any person, in actual possession of lands, for any act done in virtue of that possession, even though the original entry may have been tortuous. The gist of the trespass is the entry with force and arms, and a man cannot be said to so enter that which he already possesses.

5th. That the federal courts have not jurisdiction of trespass committed in the body of any county in any State in the union, though upon public lands.

This last proposition we are aware is contrary to the more common opinion, and the recent practice in many parts of the union. But the point has never been adjudicated, and a mere practice, without adjudication, has not the force of precedent.

The federal courts have jurisdiction of treason, because it is against the sovereignty of the union—of crimes against the post office laws, and the coinage, &c., by special grant in the constitution, without regard to the place where the crime is committed, so it is within the United States.

But of felonies and misdemeanors in general the federal courts have no jurisdiction, except they are committed in a fort, arsenal, light house reserve, &c., not in the body of a county in any State in the union.

And though an act of Congress should in express words give jurisdiction to the federal courts in actions for trespass on public lands, that part of the act would be inoperative, because unconstitutional and void. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited by the constitution, and cannot be extended by act of Congress.

The object of the pre-emption laws is to legalize SETTLEMENTS and IMPROVEMENTS on public lands prior to purchase, and with a view to future purchase; and the law, by its terms, requires the pre-emptor to both settle upon and improve the land; to do which it is a common necessity to cut timber and make lumber of it. But if he has the right to cut the timber and make it into lumber, the United States have not the right to seize the lumber when made.

If these views are sound, a pre-emptor has a perfect right to cut on any quarter section of public land which he shall lawfully pre-empt any timber which is necessary for buildings, fences, &c., on the land. He has also the right to cut and destroy any timber which it is necessary to remove in clearing and improving the land. And as he has a right to burn up and destroy the timber for the purpose of clearing and improving the land, so he has a right to make into cord wood, staves or lumber any timber which it becomes necessary to remove in clearing the land; and the United States cannot lawfully seize it. The Marshal who should make a seizure would be liable to the owner in an action of trespass.

Beyond doubt the man who merely plunders the public domain, instead of settling and improving it, is liable, in the State courts, as a trespasser; and equally certain it is that the lumber made of timber so plundered is liable to seizure; but this principle will not bear against legal settlers under the pre-emption law, whether the evidence of their settlement are filed in the Register's office or not.

THE GATHERING.

We wish at the present time to impress upon the scattered saints the importance of gathering up to this place, without delay. It is the constant fault of many of the brethren that they are willing to answer the calls of God only after the time has gone by, and the expected blessing is lost. Had the saints responded to the call to gather up to this place, when it was first made, there would have been none of the trouble which we have had here. If those that remain behind will come up now, it will be well with them and us.

Why stay back? Many are waiting for an advance in the price of property where they are, with the view of making a better sale of their possessions. But property is likely to rise in value faster here than where they are. Others don't like beginning in a new country. But when it becomes an old country they are likely to find some insuperable difficulty in obtaining a possession in it.

There is another class who are afraid the chosen ministers of God will mould wrong institutions here, and are staying away on that account. Of all such we say, either come now, and make us acquainted with your more exalted wisdom, or stay away altogether.

If you have bought a farm and must needs stay and plough it, stay forever. If the gift of God is not worth receiving now, don't come and take it from us, after we have added our labour to it. We came up here to receive an eternal inheritance, and don't like the idea that some of our brethren are stopping back, to come by and by and covet our possessions. The man who makes a farm here, makes it not to sell to a more rich neighbour, and crowd back again, but that he and his children and his children's children may possess it.

If you have married a wife, and cannot come, say it at once, that we may blot your name out of the book of remembrance. If you prefer her whims to the kingdom of God and its righteousness, you are not worthy of it, and had better give it up at once. Some women govern their husbands by smiles and tears; some by scolding and caressing; some by teasing and obstinacy; some by sickness and vigour; and some by quiet and hysterics. But the man of God rules his house, not in oppression, but in righteousness, and is respected and beloved by a wife more worthy than they all. He that will not do it, however unfortunate, deserves what he suffers.

THE LAND PIRATES' PRIZES.

We have heard of land pirates in various places, and of various characters, but never of any that matched in villainy the two, dressed up in a little brief authority, who represent on Beaver Island the dignity of the present administration of the U. S. government, or of Marshal Knox. McKinley and Bower have been round the neighbourhood setting their MARK on their prizes. And, gentle reader, what do you think they have seized? "Some square timber." Yes. "Anything else?" Well, they have.

"I should like to know what that can be. I can't find boards enough at the mill to make a cabin door of." Ah, you are not sharp enough for a land pirate. They have seized three pieces of loose plank on Johnson and McCulloch's spring pier, and some fifteen or twenty on Aldrich's, as many as one hundred sawlogs belonging to twenty different individuals, the timber for one framed house, and the logs for eight or ten log houses. They have put their mark on a stick of timber that was left in building the printing office, and a score of logs hauled out for a house of worship. Wherever you go through the woods and find a dozen staves remaining of a culled pile, look close and you will find "U. S." marked on the top one.

Go to any log cabin in the neighbourhood, so it belongs to a Mormon, and find a stock of boards or even a single board laid on the fence to season for fitting up the cabin for winter, and you will be sure to find the magic "U. S." inscribed on it.

But what can be the object of the United States in this? The stuff will not sell for enough to pay the expense of the seizures.

Oh, no, but three dollars a day from Uncle Samuel's money box at Washington, will pay the pirates for making the seizures, and if the stuff sells for more, they can employ agents to bid it off and make a second speculation out of it. And if a few suits should grow out of it, then it would be a pretty job for them and a half dozen of their friends who don't earn a shilling a day to go down to Detroit as witnesses at $57 a piece.

In addition to all this, some poor Mormon may be frightened out of his propriety, so that he will not dare roll up his house body, after the U. S. Marshal has seized the logs, and then as winter comes on there will be a better prospect of driving off the Mormons.

Reader, strange as it may sound in your ears, it is a simple truth, that the United States Marshal for the State of Michigan has sent two of his Deputies here to run around upon land pre-empted, settled upon, and improved, according to the laws of the United States, and seize logs, timber, shingles, &c., cut and provided for improvement of the land. And the Marshals have carried the matter to the extent of forbidding regular pre-emptors to cut tree or bush in making improvements. They have gone further, and have seized stuff cut on entered land, but provided for use on pre-empted land.

GOVERNMENT SEIZURES.

Prohibition of official power for the purpose of private plunder and personal revenge.

When Marshal Knox appointed his two pets, McKinley and Bower, to go around from house to house and pick up every board or stage that could be found seasoning for a cupboard shelf or a dye-tub, some wondered that the cord wood was not also seized. Not we. McKinley owned too much cord wood to go at that, lest the example being set his should be seized also.

But when a Constable had levied on a quantity of wood in collecting a debt due Johnson and McCulloch, Bower could not rest till he had seized that wood as the property of the United States.

With these men no act is too mean to stoop to, so they can injure and plunder any of the Mormons. Their power, as Marshals, is used, and intended to be used, only for that purpose. The U. S. have no duties for two Marshals to perform on this desolate island, with its population of six or seven hundred inhabitants.

FISHING.

The fishing business in this region has been very poor so far the present season. Indeed, the appearance for a few years has been that the fisheries are running out. Our opinion, however, is, that the fish are driven off by the throwing of the offal from packhouses into the water, and that by a more cleanly mode of conducting the business it would be fully restored. As it is, very few fishermen are making anything, and many are removing.

INFORMATION WANTED.

Whether PETER McKINLEY, Esquire, is United States Deputy Cooper, as well as United States Deputy Marshal? Or is he a kind of adopted heir to the plunder that the republic takes from her children? We don't know as this is any business of ours, but our Yankee curiosity is awakened when a United States Marshal goes to all the cooper shops in his neighbourhood and seizes their stuff, and stops their work, and then gets all the hands he can employ, and sets them to work up the stuff in his own shop.

Wonder if the gallant Secretary of the Navy could not be induced to send the War Steamer Michigan up here to gather staves and hoop poles for Mr. Deputy McKinley's cooper shop.

The Mormons on Beaver Island give public notice that they have hoed their corn and potatoes, and sown their turnips, and are subject to the call of any who are ambitious to imprison them for the witness of Jesus and the word of God. There are a few names yet who have not been imprisoned for the gospel's sake. They are patiently waiting their turn.

ACCIDENT.

A fish boat belonging to Mr. Martin, with some 40 nets aboard, and $300 or $400 worth of tackle and fishing supplies, upset near little Fox Island, the 19th inst., and the property was all lost. There were three men on board, and they held on to the boat till Mr. Peter Tigert went out from Fox and took them off. Much credit is due to Mr. Tigert and the men with him for the courage with which they carried themselves, in this difficult and perilous undertaking.

A RICH SCENE.

A few days since we were down on the new Spring Pier, and as we were passing a neighbour called out to a cooper, who came up with a boat just at that moment, "See here, Mr. —, I've got a few staves here—about a hundred—don't you want them?"

"I don't know. Are they seasoned?"

"Yes. I wish you'd take them, for I've got to get them off the wharf."

"Well, reach them down.—I want some seasoned stuff.—What shall I give you for them?"

"Well, I reckon the lot ought to be worth 50 cents. There is about a hundred of them, but you see they're not first rate. But they will do to work immediately, and seasoned stuff is scarce."

And so they commenced passing the staves into the boat, when a third making his winding way towards them, cries out,

"Arrah, be jabers, (hic,) what are ye doin' (hic) with the staves? (hic) ye thaven rascals? (hic.)"

"Putting them in the boat.—Have you any objection to that, Mr. McKinley?"

"An' is this the way (hic) that you set the authority of the United States at defiance, (hic,) ye thaven rebels? (hic) In the name of the United States (hic) I seize these staves. (hic) An' ye meddle with them, (hic,) ye'll get yourself into a scrape, (hic.)"

"Why do you seize these staves, Mr. McKinley? They are private property."

"What's that to me? (hic.)—I have my orders to take all I find, (hic,) and I shall take these, (hic.)"

So the cooper unloaded the handful of staves he had in his boat, and left the representative of the sovereignty of the United States in possession of his prize, consisting of 100 staves, worth 50 cents.

INQUEST.

An inquest was held yesterday upon the body of a man, found upon the beach of this Island, upon the fishing ground above Big Sand Bay, which proved to be that of J. B. Tyler, lost overboard from the Brig Constellation, about a month since. The following is the inquisition:—

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
Michigan County, ss.

An inquisition taken at the township of Peaine, in said county, the 30th day of July, 1851, before James J. Strang, Esquire, one of the Justices of the Peace in and for said county, upon the view of the dead body of Joseph B. Tyler, there lying dead, by the oaths of the Jurors whose names are hereto subscribed, who, being sworn to inquire in behalf of the people of this State, when, in what manner, and by what means the said Joseph B. Tyler came to his death, upon their oaths do say that the said Joseph B. Tyler came to his death by falling overboard from the rigging of the Brig Constellation, on the 30th day of June last, off the coast of Big Beaver Island, opposite the high bluffs immediately south of Big Sand Bay, in said county, and drowning.

In testimony whereof the said Justice of the Peace, and the Jurors of this inquest, have hereunto set their hands, the year aforesaid.

JAMES J. STRANG, Justice of the Peace.

JAMES SMITH,
FRANCIS COOPER,
EDWARD CHIDESTER,
JOHN PRINCE,
MARTIN G. SPACE,
MARVIN M. ALDRICH,

The body had been lying on the beach about three days, and the fishermen living in that region, both neglected to inter it, and to give notice of the fact to the civil officers residing here. Within a half hour of the time that the rumour reached here, Mr. Strang, with a Jury, started up prepared to make the necessary investigation, and to bury the dead.

The pockets of the deceased had been examined, and probably rifled of a few valuables, which a sailor of sober steady habits is seldom without. But beyond that, no attention had been paid to him by the men who occupy that part of the Island. The body was left by them partly in the water, washed by every wave. Mr. Tyler was an amiable young man, and leaves many friends at Saybrook, Ash-tabula Co., Ohio.

No notice has yet appeared in this paper of the death of Thomas Bennett, of which so much has been said in other places. The editor was absent at the time of the occurrence, and the publication having been suspended from that time till last week, it was thus unintentionally quite passed by until now. We shall give a particular account of it in our next issue.

We intend to give our readers some account of the recent Mormon trials, but at present the proper documents are not at hand, and therefore we have postponed it.

The writer of Eben Harris has been too much in prison of late to prepare that tale for the press, from week to week. We hope to receive the balance in a short time.

Don't live in hope with your arms folded. Future smiles on those who roll up their sleeves and put shoulder to the wheel that propels them on to wealth and happiness. Cut this out, and carry it about in your vest pocket, ye who idle in the bar-rooms or at the corners of the streets.

The following letter was written in answer to one from Mr. Briggs, of Wisconsin. His letter is too scurrilous to appear in print, therefore we publish only the reply of Mr. Bacon:—

Beaver Island, July 18th, 1851.

Mr. Briggs—Sir:—Some time since I received a letter from you, in which you claimed to take the liberty to write to me, on the ground that our acquaintance had been such as to forbid personal enmities; and therefore you would carry out the precept, "do unto others as you would have others do unto you;" and that I was less orthodox in the pretences of Strang, &c., than some others.

All this looks very pretty on paper; but whatever our feelings have been heretofore, the remainder of your letter was written for no other purpose than for an insult to me; containing no argument whatever in favour of anything, and only one against the claims of Mr. Strang, and that built on assumption.

The rest of your letter is filled up with bombastic innuendo and inference, such as the most bitter and loathsome of our enemies and persecutors have thrown in the faces of the saints ever since Joseph Smith, the prophet of God, beheld the golden record. And this you call "doing unto others as you would have them do unto you."

I will now notice the argument, powerful as it may be, which you assert you have found upon examination, touching the letter of appointment. But what examination can this be in which you have found out that you spoke that which was not true? when you declared in public congregations, and at your own fire side, and at the fireside of your neighbours, that Joseph Smith wrote with his own hand the "letter of appointment," (for you saw him in a vision,) and your surprise and faith in the "knocking spirits" of New York, from the fact that they asserted the same?

But for the argument. You assert that all that is said about Joseph "appointing," is found in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 14, which says: "For if it (the gift of receiving revelations and commandments) be taken from him, (which he must apostatize to have,) he shall not have power except to appoint another in his stead." You then inquire, "now did Joseph (who was to wear a crown of martyr and king) forfeit that gift? Did he cease to abide in Christ? Did he apostatize?" You then assert that I will answer, "No!"

But the different questions require different answers. And I am capable to answer for myself, and that without being driven to the extreme necessity of saying no to each of the questions. When you ask, "did Joseph apostatize?" I answer, no; for that would be to wholly depart from God's law, and to deny the truth of the dispensation, and the revelations given to him. But when you ask, "Did Joseph forfeit that gift? (of receiving revelations and commandments.) Did he cease to abide in Christ?" I will let sec. 4, par. 11 answer, in which it is declared that the keys of the mysteries of those things that have been sealed, and the things that should come until the time of Christ's coming, were given unto Joseph; that he should possess them, if he did abide in Christ until the time of his coming; if not, another I will plant in his stead. If Joseph still holds the keys of that gift, why does William profess to have them, and stand in his (Joseph's) stead?

But you asserted that Joseph must apostatize in order to lose or forfeit that gift. Consequently, as you believe Joseph did not apostatize, you believe also that William does not stand in Joseph's stead, and that he is merely an impostor; that Joseph still holds those keys of receiving revelations, and therefore the church and the world are left without a prophet, seer and revelator in the flesh; that the mysteries of God are forever sealed to us, until the coming of Christ, or the resurrection of Joseph, unless Brigham Young or some one else perchance dreams the will of the prophet.

The next thing you touch upon is the "curse pronounced by Strang in '46." But what do you know about the curse to which you have reference? You never saw it, and only know what some one wrote about it, undertaking to give something near what it was, not having the original, but wrote simply from memory. You next refer me to the pamphlet you sent me, and declare your faith in William Smith. But before I notice that I will notice the beginning of your postscript, in which you state that you understand that his Majesty leaves the throne and runs at the approach of the Sheriff. But I have heard of something more noted than that. I have a book which contains the tradition of my fathers in part, which states there was once one of the tribe of Judah who declared he was the one the prophets had spoken of, that the government should be upon his shoulders; and his own people actually took him and killed him for making himself a king, and that too in the most disgraceful and cruel manner.

But what of the pamphlet? It is entitled, "Epistle of the Twelve," but written by J. Wood, not one of the Twelve. I suppose, however, that Wood is spokesman for the Twelve also. If so, it is a good thing for some of them, being dead, are not able to speak for themselves. And others, who are living, never speak for William, only by declaring they have no connection with him. And the company which, "perhaps," consists of from 500 to 1,000 families, simply consists of about 150 persons; and they are preparing to move to Jackson county, Missouri; and, further, that the man and woman whom William sent there came nigh breaking up their settlement, and they did not fellowship them.

But Wood, yes, even Jo. Wood, who is counsellor for the said Wm. Smith, and also prophet, seer and revelator, holding the keys of the ministry equal and jointly with the said Wm. Smith, (only Jo. acts without counsellors and William with,) even Joseph Wood, who is the President of the Twelve and of the whole ministry, (and of course presides over William, if he has any part of the ministry,) even he asserts, on the 7th page of his Epistle, that he believes that William Smith inherited from his father that which his father never pretended to have, viz., the office of First President over the whole church. He only claimed the office of Patriarch. And this priesthood he received from under the hands of his son Joseph, who was President over the whole church, and like unto Moses, having all the gifts which God bestows on the head of the church.

Does any one believe Moses was not a patriarch? If so, let them read the blessings and cursings pronounced upon the heads of the tribes of Israel by him. So too when father Smith was dead, Hyrum Smith was called to take the office of patriarch, which he inherited by right. But how was he to take it? From under the hands of his brother Joseph, who, being the President of the church, had the patriarchal priesthood as well as the prophetic, notwithstanding he was younger than Hyrum.

If the priesthood, in all its functions, goes by lineal descent, what right has William Smith to the office of President of the church? or even to be patriarch over the whole church? For young Joseph would inherit both from his father, and even then would not possess them until he was legally ordained. But the prophetic priesthood has not gone by lineal descent in ages past. It has not merely passed from one family to another, but from tribe to tribe, until it has passed through nearly all of the tribes of Israel.

But who does Jo. Wood, who is the President of the whole ministry, inherit his priesthood from? From his father, I suppose. But just before his (Wood's) death, when he has sent to several of the different States of the Union, not even forgetting to send to the two Canadas, and gathers all his children around his dying bed, will he not have an almighty great blessing to confer on his eldest son?

I suppose the apostleship goes by lineage, also, like all other parts of the priesthood, and that you and L. J. P. must be the children of the ancient apostles. And then I can hardly get it through my noddle. I am so thick headed, how you should possess that office, while your father is living. I should suppose it would rightly belong to him. I think that Jo., even Joseph Wood, who is counsellor to William and holds the keys equal and jointly with him, who is also President of the whole ministry, who is not only spokesman for William, but likewise for the Twelve, should speak out on this subject, and not let the world remain longer in ignorance concerning it. If he should, I should expect another pamphlet would be forthcoming. Truly and sincerely,

S. P. BACON.

A FATHER'S ADVICE TO HIS SON.

The time draws nigh, dear John, that I must go the way from which none return. I cannot take thee with me, and I leave thee in a world where good counsel is not superabundant. No one is born wise. Time and experience teach us to separate the grain from the chaff. I have seen more of the world, than thou; it is not all gold, dear son, that glitters. I have seen many a star from Heaven fall, and many a staff on which men have leaned, break; therefore I give this advice, the result of my experience: Attach not thy heart to any transitory thing. The truth comes not to us, dear son; we must search for it. That which you see scrutinize carefully; and with regard to things unseen and eternal, rely on the word of God.

Search no one so closely as thyself. Within us dwells the judge who never deceives, and whose voice is more to us than the applause of the world, and more than all the wisdom of the Egyptians and Greeks. Resolve, my son, to do nothing to which this voice is opposed. When you think and project strike on your forehead and ask for his counsel. He speaks at first low, and lisps as an innocent child; but if you honour his innocence, he gradually loses his tongue and speaks more distinctly.

Despise not any religion; it is easy to despise, but it is much better to understand. Uphold truth when thou canst, and be willing for her sake to be hated; but know that thy individual cause is the cause of truth, and beware that they are not confounded. Do good for thy own satisfaction; and care not what follows. Cause no gray hairs to any one; nevertheless, for the right even gray hairs are not to be regarded.

Help and give willingly when thou hast, and think no more of thyself for it, and if thou hast nothing let thy hands be ready with a drink of cold water, and esteem thyself for that no less, not always say what thou knowest, but know always what thou sayest. Not the apparent devout, but the truly devout man respect, and go in his ways. A man who has the fears of God in his heart is like the sun that shines and warms, though it does not speak. Do that which is worthy of recompense, and ask none. Reflect daily upon death, and seek the life which is beyond with cheerful courage; and further, go not out of the world without having testified by some good deed, thy love and respect for the Author of all Truth.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

We find in an English paper the following extract from an unpublished lecture on the progress of the arts and sciences, and the antiquity of Freemasonry: "Freemasonry, we are informed, was reduced to rules at the building of Solomon's Temple, and there is every reason to believe that some bond of union was necessary in such a congregated mass of workmen.

"The number of persons employed in building the temple was one hundred and thirteen thousand six hundred, besides the men of burden, not freemasons, who amounted to seventy thousand more.

"The footstone of this mighty fabric was levelled in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, the third after the death of David, and the 480th year after the passage of the Hebrews through the Red Sea. The building commenced in Mount Moriah on Monday, the second day of the month Zif, which answers to the 21st of our April, and it was finished in all parts in a little more than seven years, on the 8th day of the month Bul, which answers to our 23d day of October, being the second month of the sacred year, and the eleventh of Solomon's reign. Every piece of the edifice, whether timber, stone or metal, was ready cut, framed or polished at Jerusalem, so that no other tool was wanting, no other sound was heard, than what was necessary to join the several parts together.

All the noise of the axe, hammer and saw, was confined to the forests of Lebanon, and the quarries and plains of Zeredadeth, that nothing might be heard among the masons of Zion but harmony and peace."

EDUCATE YOUR DAUGHTERS.

A writer says: When I lived among the Choctaw Indians I held a consultation with one of their chiefs respecting the successive stages of their progress in the arts of civilized life; and among other things he informed me at their first start they fell into a great mistake—they only sent their boys to school.

They became intelligent men, but they married uneducated and uncivilized wives; and the uniform result was, that the children were all like their mother, and soon the father lost his interest in both wife and children. "And now," says he, "if we could educate one class of our children, we would choose the girl; for when they become mothers, they would educate their sons." No nation can become fully and permanently civilized and enlightened when the mothers are not, to a good degree, qualified to discharge the duties of home education.

The man that first introduced a fanning mill into Scotland, was denounced as an atheist. In the opinion of the old fogies of that generation, it was flying into the face of the Laird—and getting up gales of wind when Providence willed a calm.

THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER.
She may not in the mazy dance,
With jeweled maidens vie;
She may not smile on courtly swains
With soft bewitching eye:
She cannot boast a form and mien
That lavish wealth has bought her;
But, ah! she has much fairer charms—
The farmer's peerless daughter!
The rose and lily on her cheek
Together love to dwell:
Her laughing blue eyes wreath around
The heart's a witching spell:
Her smile is bright as morning glow
Upon the dewy plain;
And list'ning to her voice we dream
That spring has come again.
The timid fawn is not more wild,
Nor yet more gay and free.
The lily's cup is not more pure,
In all its purity.
Of all the wild flowers in the woods,
Or by the crystal water,
There's none more pure or fair than she,
The farmer's peerless daughter.
The haughty belle whom all adore,
On downy pillow lies—
While forth upon the dewy lawn
The merry maiden hies,
And with the lark's uprising song,
Her own clear voice is heard—
Yet may not tell which sweetest sings,
The maiden or the bird.
Then tell me not of jeweled fair—
The brightest jewel yet
Is the true heart where virtue dwells
And innocence is set.
The glow of health upon her cheek—
The grace no rule hath taught her—
The fairest wreath that beauty twines
Is for the farmer's daughter.

TRAVELLING SKETCHES.

(Correspondence of the Memorial.)

Mackinac, Mich., June 1, 1851.
MR. EDITOR:—In my last I spoke particularly of this place. I propose now to say a few words of the policy of the United States towards the Indians; not because it has anything to do with this locality in particular, but because I have become acquainted with its workings.

It is doubtless known to nearly all that the United States are constantly engaged in purchasing lands of the Indian tribes. In some instances the purchases are made at prices merely nominal. In others, at prices so high that after paying the expenses of holding treaties and of surveyors, the lands are found to cost more than they will sell for.

In many cases lands are purchased having valuable improvements at very low prices, and in other instances the highest prices have been paid for lands having no improvements whatever, and to which the Indians could present no claim of right, beyond the fact that they had occasionally hunted upon them.

This, though it may appear strange, is part of a fixed and permanent policy of the government, having for its end the extinction of the entire Indian race. I do not speak of this as the policy of the present or any particular administration, but as the national policy, adopted and put in use, so long ago, that it is now carried out as a mere matter of course, without much thought.

The prices paid the Indians are measured not by the value of the lands, but by the amount necessary to destroy the several tribes. It has been found cheaper to destroy their power with annuities, than with arms. Consequently when the settlements begin to press upon any tribe, they are pressed to sell their lands to the United States at some price agreed upon payable in annual installments for 10, 15, or 20 years. Traders establish among them who furnish them with liquors, beads, and cheap ornaments, guns, ammunition, and a few other articles of general use, and in return get back all their money and all their peltry.

At the same time the traders learn all the habits of the Indians, and advantages of their remaining country, and introduce among them the vices of the most debased among civilized men, gradually prostituting the women with disease, and the men with intoxication. Intoxicating drinks could scarcely be used among the Indians but for the annuities and the traders established about the several agencies, and supported by the annuities.

And the articles sold at these establishments are of the worst sort of adulterated stuff; a barrel of whiskey, for instance, being made of two gallons of genuine whiskey, and the extract of red pepper and tobacco in such quantities as to give it great strength. These articles enter into general use among the Indians, and they will not do without them, and the men who furnish them gain an entire ascendancy over the Indians, so that they are able to dictate to them in all things.—They have more power than the chiefs.

The Indian traders are generally hated by the Indians, yet they are so dependent upon them for a variety of articles which use has made necessary to them, that they are anxious to keep the traders with them; they regard them as a necessary evil. These traders are the instruments of the government in negotiating treaties, and managing Indian affairs.

Besides traders kept up among the Indians by such means, the nation generally provides by treaty for appointing a number of farmers, blacksmiths, &c., to reside among the various tribes and teach them agriculture and the arts. These are provided with farms, shops, utensils, &c., and a good salary at the expense of the public treasury, and carry on business for their own benefit, doing just enough for the Indians, in connection with the various missions, to bring about that transition state between savage and civilized life in which an Indian tribe is usually lost.

School funds are also provided by many of the treaties with the Indians, the administration of which usually falls into the hands of the Home Mission Societies, and it is no uncommon thing to so arrange that a farmer, blacksmith and teacher are all paid and supported by the national government, and in the control of a missionary sent out by some missionary society.

In these instances there is not unfrequently a really sincere effort made to civilize and preserve the Indians; an effort, however, which has not succeeded, to say the best of it, in any one North Western tribe. The trader is always along to corrupt with intoxicating drinks, and the worst character of borderer, to introduce the lowest vices and the foulest diseases known to civilized men.

The Indian women, though generally very chaste, are intoxicated and prostituted until a large portion of them become barren, and of the children of those who have Indian husbands, most of them are half-breeds. The best and most talented become concubines to traders, trappers, fishermen and the entire race of borderers, who are engaged in corrupting the Indians, and the Indians only obtain the women of inferior rank, or talent, or such as have been corrupted.

By these means, by the time a tribe has received its annuities, its social order is broken up, and all the elements of sound national or tribal character destroyed. In the establishment of the traders at particular locations, the Indians accordingly become measurably separated from the rest of the tribe, until in the end the power of the head chief is abolished and each village becomes a separate band, independent of the tribe. The mixed race growing up by the concubinage of the Indian women are not in all cases recognized as the members of the tribes; neither are they received as members of civilized society; and by these means the lines of tribal existence are lost: and the few men of strong personal character who survive all these mutations of national existence, finally settle down with the whites, and their children become the dregs of society in the next generation, or migrate and join another tribe to realize again the same process of destruction.

By these means more Indians have been destroyed than have been moved across the Mississippi; and the same means are in so active operation there, that the Indians are not increasing by the migration. So vigorously is this policy pushed there, that traders accompany the wandering tribes, in all their travels, whether in pursuit of game or in war.

The republic of Texas, assuming that the Indians have no title to unimproved lands, have selected the hunting grounds of the Camanches, granting them no annuities in return, and the consequence is that they are the least corrupted of any Indian nation in proximity to the whites. They are increasing in numbers and power, and drunkenness, prostitution, and loathsome disease are scarcely known among them.

But on the other hand, they are inevitably hostile to the whites. Their war parties go down 100 miles and sometimes to the very sea coast for plunder. At one time a large party entered the ancient and wealthy city of San Antonio, and loaded 1000 pack horses with the spoils and returned without the loss of a man.—Annuities sufficient to quiet and destroy the tribe would be less expensive than two years of defence and loss upon the Texan system. It is not improbable that since the cession of part of Texas to the United States as public dominion, they will obtain annuities, and with them the usual vices and misfortunes.

The sight of the broken fragments of once powerful tribes, who receive their annuities at Mackinac has induced these thoughts. I was at this place between 2 and 3 weeks, while they were waiting here for their payments. They came in from every direction, in fish boats and bark canoes, in most cases the entire families coming with all their effects, according to the Indian custom. Some of them were waiting here 2 months, their payments which should have been made early in Sept., having been delayed till the middle of Nov.—Their boats were turned up along the shore in front of the town for miles. Not unfrequently the family had their camp fire near by and slept under their boat. Others brought with them birch or cedar bark, wherewith they put up wigwams. A few had tents of cotton cloth.

Their scanty supply of provisions were soon consumed. Every article they had for sale was soon converted into whiskey and drank up. Many of them got credit at the traders to the amount of their annuities, which they also drank up. With the accustomed generosity of the race, all who had anything divided with the destitute, till by the 20th of Oct. Mackinac contained 500 Indians entirely destitute of food. It happened at this time that there was a call for 200 men to pump out the wreck of the steamer Patchin, wrecked on the Isle le Galet.—Seventy-five Indians turned out and raised a scanty supply of provisions, but by the 25th the Indians looked gaunt and emaciated.

So long a delay was unexpected, and grew out of the incompetency of the agent. Many of the Indians returned home, while others subsisted on a scanty supply of provisions, raised by a subscription among the inhabitants of the town. Finally about the middle of November the Indians received their annuities, and the provisions which should have been furnished them while attending the payment: paid out the money on the debts they had contracted, and for liquors: a majority sold their late furnished provisions, for less than a third of what they had been paying for the like. Night was hideous with their drunken carnival: towards morning the weather being fair they all left, most of them destitute.

NEWSPAPER COLLECTING.

Written for a South Carolina paper, but suited to most meridians.

MY DEAR SIR:—I have just returned from a tour through this State, and proceed to furnish you with an account of my labours and their success. I have been gone for three months, and assure you, in all sincerity, that I am fully satisfied. You furnished me a list of one hundred and seventeen owing subscribers, as you will recollect. I have called upon one hundred and four of them, and have the honour of paying over to your order three dollars and twelve and one-half cents, being the amount to which you are entitled. I return you the list numbered 1 to 117, and now give you the reply of each.

No. 1.—Is a minister. He says, in the first place, he never got one-half of the numbers, (a lie according to the account of the post master,) and in the next place, your paper's column was too scurrilous. He can't think of aiding to sustain a paper that advertises horse races and gander pullings. Besides, he knows from the tone of your editorials that you drink, and paying you would only be the means of your ending your days in the kennel. He wonders at your impudence in sending him his bill, after publishing the account of the great prize fight between Left Handed Snake and Battering Bill. He wants nothing to do with you—never wants to hear from you again.

No. 2.—Is in jail for debt. He has not seen a half dollar for a year. Says he would pay with the utmost cheerfulness, if he only had the money, but had to borrow a shirt to put on last Sunday. Admires your paper wonderfully, and hopes you will continue sending it to him. He wishes you to take a bold stand in favour of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, as he thinks it would be a very popular move with gentlemen in his situation. If you send him any more papers he hopes you will see that the postage is paid, as otherwise he will be unable to enjoy your lucubrations.—Sends his best respects.

No. 3.—Is a young doctor. Says your paper is beneath the notice of a gentleman. Wouldn't give a — for a cart load. Says you inserted an article reflecting on the profession. Only wishes he could catch you here—would make you smell —. Is going to persuade everybody that takes your paper to stop it.—Cons'd your bill, and says you may collect it in the best way you can.

No. 4.—Is an old maid. Says you are always taking a fling at single ladies of an uncertain age. Wouldn't pay you if she was rolling in wealth, and you hadn't cash enough to buy a crust of bread. Sent all the papers she had back a month ago, and says now that she sent them back she don't owe you anything. Says she is even with you, and intends to keep so till the day of judgment. Asked me not to forget to tell you that you are no gentleman, or you wouldn't undertake to slander a large and respectable class of the female population of the country.

No. 5.—Is a gambler—a sporting gentleman. Says he got completely cleaned out last week at the races. Couldn't accommodate his grandmother with a half dime if she was starving. Likes your paper tolerably—would like it better if you published more races, and would occasionally give an account of a cock fight.—Liked the description of the prize fight amazingly—it redeemed a multitude of your faults. Hopes you won't think hard of him for not paying you now—but has got a prospect of soon having some loose change, as he is after a rich young green horn who arrived here last week. Will pay your bill out of the pluckings.

No. 6.—Is an old drunkard. Hasn't got anything, and never expects to have. Gathered up all the papers that he had and sold them for a half pint of rum to the doggerly keeper to wrap groceries in. Wished you would send him a pile, as they cost him no postage, his brother-in-law being post master, and permitting him to take out his papers for nothing. Winked at me when I presented your bill, and inquired if I wasn't a distant relation of the man that butted the bull off the bridge.

No. 7.—Is a magistrate. Swore he never owed you a cent, and told me I was a low rascal for trying to swindle him in such a brazen manner. Advised me to make tracks in a little less than no time, or he would get out a warrant against me as a common cheat, and have me sent to prison. Took his advice. Is, by all odds, the meanest man I have seen yet. Will never go near him again.

No. 8.—Is a politician. Says although you profess to publish a neutral paper, it is not so. Thinks he has seen a considerable squinting towards the side to which he is opposed.—Meant to have told you a year ago to stop his paper, but forgot it. Tells you to do so now, and thinks you are getting off very cheaply in not losing any more by him. Believes you to be a rascal, and is too honourable to have anything to do with you, as it might compromise him and injure his prospects.

No. 9.—Paid up like a man. The only one. Likes your paper first rate, and means to take it and pay for it as long as you publish it, or he lives. Asked me to dinner, and treated me like a king. An oasis in the desert! A man fit for heaven!

No. 10.—Is a merchant. Expects to break shortly, must save all his small change. Offered me a pair of breeches and a cotton handkerchief for the debt. Refused him with scorn. Had a long jaw. Threatened to break my head. Dared him to do it. Threw a hatchet at me. I dodged it and put out.

No. 11 to 117.—Mean as rot. Had no money—wouldn't pay—didn't owe. I swore I'd sue. Said I might sue and be hanged. Never got the first red cent from any one of them.

The foregoing is a true extract from my note book. I have not succeeded a whit better with the patrons of the other publications for which I am agent, as it is impossible to collect from those who are determined not to pay. I have said I have been away three months. I have expended in that period two hundred and ten dollars, traveling, and my entire commission amounted to eighty-two dollars and forty-five cents. I am very willing to do my share towards the propagation of news, but more than that no reasonable man could ask. This business don't exactly suit me—I can't stand it.

Please accept my resignation, and strike my name from your list of agents. I admire your paper very much myself, but it would be a queer looking sort of a concern that would come fully up to the requirements of everybody. One wants independence in an editor—another don't want any. One wants all slang—another wouldn't touch a journal that contained an irreverent line with a ten foot pole. One sentimental, lackadaisical Miss in pantalons wanted nothing but love poetry, another never read anything but the marriages.

All kinds of abuse I have to bear, too. I wouldn't mind it so much if they only cursed you and your paper, but they curse me too! Swindler, rascal, villain, blood-sucker. These are some of the names they think proper to bestow upon me. I tried fighting for awhile, and thrashed several of your patrons like blazes, but occasionally I got licked like thunder myself. Once I was put in jail for assault and battery, and only escaped by breaking out.

Send me a receipt for the three dollars twelve and a half cents, and believe me, yours in despair.

ADVENTURES OF LEWIS WETZEL.

Among the heroes of border warfare, Lewis Wetzel holds no inferior station. Inured to hardships while yet in boyhood, and familiar with all the varieties of forest adventure, from that of hunting the beaver and bear, to that of the wily Indian, he became one of the most celebrated marksmen of the day. His form was erect, and of that height best adapted to activity—being very muscular, and possessed of great bodily strength.

From constant exercise, he could, without fatigue, bear prolonged and violent exertion, especially that of running and walking; and he had, by practice, acquired the art of loading his rifle when running at full speed through the forest, and wheeling on the instant, he could discharge it with unerring aim, at the distance of eighty or one hundred yards, into a mark not larger than a dollar. This art he has been known to practice more than once upon his savage foes, with fatal success.

A marksman of superiour skill was in those days estimated by the other borderers much in the same way that a knight templar, or a knight of the cross, who excelled in the tournament or the charge, was valued by his competitors in the days of chivalry.

Challenges of skill often took place, and marksmen who lived at the distance of fifty miles or more from each other, frequently met by appointment to try the accuracy of their aim on bets of considerable amount. Wetzel's name had spread far and wide, as the most expert and unerring shot of the day. It chanced that a young man, a few years younger than himself, who lived on Dankard's Creek, a tributary of the Monongahela river, which waters one of the earliest settlements of that region, heard of his fame, and as he was also an expert woodsman, and a first rate shot, the best in his settlement, he became very desirous of an opportunity for a trial of skill. So great was his desire, that he one day shouldered his rifle, and whistling his faithful dog to his side, started for the neighbourhood of Wetzel, who at the time lived on Wheeling creek.

When about half way on his journey, a fine buck sprang up just before him. He leveled his gun with his usual precision, but the deer, though badly wounded, did not fall dead in his tracks.—His faithful dog soon seized him, and brought him to the ground, but while in the act of doing this, another dog sprang from the forest upon the same deer, and his master making his appearance at the same time from behind a tree, with a loud voice claimed the property, because he had been wounded by his shot, and seized by his dog. It so happened that they both fired at once at this deer—a thing which may very easily happen where two active men are hunting upon the same ground, although one may fire at the distance of fifty yards, and the other at one hundred.

The dogs felt the same spirit of rivalry, and quitting the deer, which was already dead, fell to worrying and tearing each other. In separating the dogs, the strange hunter happened to strike that of the young man. The old adage, "strike my dog, strike me," arose in full force, and without further ceremony, except a few hearty curses, he fell upon the hunter and hurled him to the ground.—This was no sooner done than he found himself turned, and under his stronger and more powerful antagonist.

Discovering that he was no match at this play, the young man appealed to trial by rifles, saying it was too much like dogs for men and hunters to fight in this way. The stranger assented to the trial, but told his antagonist that before he put it fairly to the test, he had better witness what he was able to do with the rifle—saying he was as much his superiour, he thought, with that weapon, as he was in bodily strength. He bade him place a mark the size of a shilling on the side of a huge poplar that stood beside them, from which he would start with his rifle unloaded, and running a hundred yards at full speed, he would load it as he ran, and wheeling would discharge it instantly into the centre of the mark.

The feat was no sooner proposed than performed; the ball entered the centre of the diminutive target. Astonished at this activity and skill, his antagonist instantly inquired his name.—"Lewis Wetzel, at your service," answered the stranger. The young man seized him by the hand, with all the ardour of youthful admiration, and at once acknowledged his own inferiority. So charmed was he with Wetzel's frankness, skill and fine personal appearance, that he insisted upon his returning with him to the settlement on Dankard's Creek, that he might exhibit his talents to his own family, and to the hardy backwoodsmen, his neighbours.

Nothing loath to such an exhibition, and pleased with the energy of his new acquaintance, Wetzel consented to accompany him, shortening the way with their mutual tales of hunting excursions, and hazardous contests with the common enemies of their country. Among other things, Wetzel stated his manner of distinguishing the footsteps of a white man from those of an Indian, although covered with mocassins, and intermixed with the tracks of savages. He had acquired this tact from closely examining the manner of placing the feet; the Indian stepping with his feet in parallel lines, and first bringing the toe to the ground, while the white man almost invariably places his feet at an angle with the line of march.

An opportunity they little expected soon gave room to put his skill to the trial. On reaching the young man's home, which they did that day, they found the dwelling a smoking ruin, and all the family lying murdered and scalped, except a young woman who had been brought up in the family, and to whom the young man was ardently attached. She had been taken away alive, as was ascertained by examining the trail of the savages. Wetzel discovered that the party consisted of three Indians and a renegade white man, a fact not uncommon in those early days, when for crime or the love of revenge, the white outlaw fled to the savages, and was adopted, on trial, into their tribe.

As it was past the middle of the day, the nearest assistance still at some considerable distance, and as there were only four to contend with, they decided on instant pursuit. As the deed had very recently been done, they hoped to overtake them in their camp that night, and perhaps before they could cross the Ohio river, to which the Indians always retreated after a successful incursion, considering themselves in a manner safe when they had crossed its right bank, at that time occupied wholly by the Indian tribes.

Ardent and unwearied was the pursuit by the youthful huntsmen; the one excited to recover his lost mistress, the other to assist his new friend, and to take revenge for the slaughter of his countrymen—slaughter and revenge being the daily business of the borderer at this portentous period. Wetzel followed the trail with the unerring sagacity of the bloodhound; and just at dusk traced the fugitives to a noted war path, a few rods opposite the mouth of the Captina Creek, emptying into the Ohio, which, much to their disparagement, they found the Indians had crossed by forming a raft of logs and brush, their usual manner when at a distance from their villages.

By examining carefully the appearance of the opposite shore, they soon discovered the fire of an Indian camp in a hollow way, a few rods from the river. Lest the noise of constructing a raft should alarm the Indians, and give notice of the pursuit, the two hardy adventurers determined to swim the stream a few rods below. This they easily accomplished, being both of them excellent swimmers; fastening their clothes and ammunition in a bundle on the top of their heads, with their rifles resting on their left hip, they reached the opposite shore in safety.

After carefully examining their arms, and putting every article of attack or defence in its proper place, they crawled to a position which gave them a fair view of their enemies, who, thinking themselves safe from pursuit, were carelessly reposing around the fire, thoughtless of the fate that awaited them. They instantly discovered the young woman, apparently unhurt, but making much moaning and lamentation, while the white man was trying to pacify and console her with the promise of kind usage, and an adoption with the tribe. The young man, hardly able to restrain his rage, was for firing and rushing instantly upon them. Wetzel, more cautious, told him to wait till daylight, when they could make the attack with a better chance of success, and of also killing the whole party; but if they attacked in the dark, a part would certainly escape.

As soon as daylight dawned, the Indians arose and prepared to depart. The young man selecting the white renegade, and Wetzel an Indian, they both fired at the same time, each killing his man. The young man rushed forward, knife in hand, to relieve the young woman, while Wetzel reloaded his gun and pushed in pursuit of the two surviving Indians, who had taken to the wood, until they could ascertain the number of their enemies.

Wetzel, as soon as he saw that he was discovered, discharged his rifle at random, in order to draw them from their covert. Hearing the report, and finding themselves unhurt, the Indians rushed upon him before he could again reload. This was as he wished. Taking to his heels, Wetzel loaded as he ran, and suddenly wheeling about, discharged his rifle through the body of his nearest, but unsuspecting enemy.

The remaining Indian, seeing the fate of his companion, and that his enemy's rifle was unloaded, pushed forward with all his energy, the prospect of prompt revenge being fairly before him. Wetzel led him on, dodging from tree to tree, until his rifle was again ready, when suddenly turning, he shot his remaining enemy, who fell dead at his feet. After taking their scalps, Wetzel and his friend, with their rescued captive, returned in safety to the settlement.

Like honest Joshua Fleeheart, after the peace of 1795, Wetzel pushed for the frontiers of the Mississippi, where he could trap the beaver, hunt the buffalo and the deer, and occasionally shoot an Indian, the object of his mortal hatred. He finally died, as he had lived, a free man of the forest.

IMPUDENT QUESTIONS.

To ask an unmarried lady how old she is. To ask a lawyer if he ever told a lie. To ask a doctor how many persons he has killed. To ask a minister whether he ever did anything wrong. To ask a merchant whether he ever cheated a customer. To ask a young lady whether she would like a beau. To ask an editor if he has got more than one shirt. To ask a subscriber if he has paid the printer.

To make cowards courageous, all that is necessary is to play sneak yourself. The Apache Indians were as timid as women till they commenced fighting with the Mexicans. They are now the worst customers we have to deal with. Pluck springs from success, as naturally as music from cat-gut. Had Scott lost his first battle, his whole army would have been knocked into a cocked hat before it reached the Castle of Perote.

Jim was employed to cut wood by the day. The boss came along and found Jim lifting the axe as leisurely as flat boats go up the Mississippi, and accompanying every blow with a grunt.

"Slow work, Jim, slow work." "Boss, the Bible says we must use moderation in all things."

The boss was non-plussed. At dinner, Jim plied his knife and fork with remarkable industry. The boss reminded him of his morning text, but Jim was ready.

"I've been reading in the Scriptures since, boss, that whatever the hands find able to do, that do with all thy might."

Boss told Jim he was entirely too learned to chop wood, and therefore very politely requested him to take up his bed and walk.

Why should a teetotaler refrain from marrying?

Because, if he got a wife, his principles would not allow him to sup porter!

SCRAPS.

It is the ordinary way of the world to keep folly at the helm, and wit under hatches.

The rich are more envied by those who have a little, than by those who have nothing.

Where true fortitude dwells, loyalty, bounty, friendship and fidelity may be found.

Nature never says one thing, and Wisdom another.

Man is partly a creature, and partly a creator of circumstances.

The vows we make in storms, are forgotten oft in calms.

Pride that dines on vanity, sups as surely on contempt.

Rashness is the faithful but unhappy parent of misfortune.

You may imitate a good man, but never counterfeit him.

It is a base and narrow mind to which suspicion is natural.

Wine and passion are racks oft used to extort words from us.

In order to deserve a true friend, we must learn first to be one.

Will is the root; knowledge the stem and leaves; feeling the flower.

THE GATHERING.

Fellow-servants in the gospel, whatever obstacle keeps you away from here, break through it now, or give up the expectation of gathering with us forever.—Do not longer flatter us on false hopes, nor yourselves on blinding delusions. Whoever is intending to help us in maintaining the kingdom, let them help now.—Otherwise, if we do the labour, we cannot yield to them the reward.

Fearfulness is on many. But if you fear now, when will your fear cease? A few weeks ago every body, except a few of the faithful, believed we should be obliged to leave this place immediately. Now the blindest can see that we have an entire victory; in a word, that the day of mobbing the Mormons here has gone by.

Three months since sixty armed men were hunting the prophet, with the openly avowed intention of shooting him wherever they could find him, at first sight. Now he sits quietly in his own house, without keeping one of his trusted friends by to assist him, and dispenses the law to these same men as a Justice of the Peace; and when business requires, goes alone and unarmed in the midst of them, without molestation or danger.

Never was there a time since the first Mormon set his foot on Beaver Island that they were as secure from danger as now. The example that has been set has produced this state of things, and it is not difficult to preserve it.—A strong hand, never departing from the right, will secure respect anywhere. But vacillation makes us despised.

As for making a livelihood, it can be done here as well as anywhere else. The people have taken warning this year, and raised crops. The land here will produce as well as in any other place, and it is not difficult to subdue it. Chopping steamboat wood is well enough for a present resort, but it is sound policy to clear land by burning the timber on the ground. Now, this year, is the time of all times to come up.

RUNAWAY WIVES—ADVICE.

The marriage tie, like all the strong bonds of social society, is losing its sanctity. Marriage is by many regarded merely as a civil contract, and therefore to be abandoned by consent of the parties at pleasure, and violated by each without crime. Since marriage ceased to be regarded as a religious sacrament, and came to be solemnized by magistrates, as well as ministers of religion, it has year by year been held less and less sacred, until partings of husband and wife cease to be heard of with surprise.

There is one fact, however, connected with these matters, which, more than all others, shows the folly of the new ideas, the modern improvements in the social order. That is, the impossibility of keeping them separate. The marriage tie, spite of all men, is a tie for life, and more than for life. It is hardly possible that a man should treat his wife so ill that she will permanently leave him. Thousands run away, but all, all return. Whoever assists one against her husband, however deserving, however much an object of sympathy, is sure to meet with curses, rather than thanks, even from her.

We are led to make these remarks from an unfortunate instance, recently thrust upon our observation.—A woman with four children came here, calling herself Mrs. Bebee, from Pine Run, Mich., saying that her husband was an habitual drunkard, and in the constant habit of beating her, and that she had taken advantage of his absence from home, and with as much of his substance as she could bring away, she had left him.

She had all the appearance of a mild, kind hearted and excellent woman. A universal feeling of sympathy was inspired for her. She was provided with a house and provisions, and whatever was necessary for her comfort provided with alacrity. She represented that her husband was a man of violence, and would be sure to follow her, to get away the children and what substance she had brought along.

No difficulty was made in providing her a house favourably situated for protecting her and her family from lawless violence, and in furnishing her with the means of house keeping; but when the proposition was made to take and keep the property she had brought, no man of substance was willing to have anything to do with it. With difficulty she got some persons who were about leaving for a long time to secure it for her, and that against the better counsel of more prudent men.

This was no more than well done, and the actors gone, when Mr. Bebee arrived, and paid his respects to the runaway—and, as might have been expected, was received by her with joy. They retired early from the busy work day life, to enjoy anew that conjugal felicity which a fortnights separation had given a peculiar zest to.

The woman, as every good woman should, maintained the integrity of her husband with great pertinacity. Her greatest happiness was to return with him to her old home. She very promptly denied having spoken ill of him, and said she had never said he was a drunkard, or that he maltreated her. He was a good husband, and a worthy man.

But this did not cure the whole difficulty. The woman had got her stuff hid in the woods, and nobody here knew where it was. Search was made, and for a portion of it in vain. Poor woman. After spending $100 of her husband's property, and what she had to spare of her own character, had to return with her husband to her old home, leaving behind her probably fifty dollars' worth of stuff that she had got so well hid that she could not find it. And she has shown her gratitude to those who sympathized with her in her distress, not only by saying many very ill things of them, but by carrying off with her several trifles that were loaned to her while here.

We do not mention this as a fault in the woman of a very heinous nature. It was the necessity of her situation. Having determined to return to her husband, she must do something to reconcile him to her. What could she do as acceptable as any act which would cast blame on those he looked on as her abettors? Especially as that would take a portion of it from herself? And a little peculation, such as carrying off a few rare and valuable books, is the small revenge which a little soul might demand, and compel his repenting wife to be the instrument of.

We hope this will be the last transaction of the kind in this quarter. It is matter of serious regret that any woman should be maltreated by her husband. But we wish to see no more fugitive wives here. If this woman had brought thousands here, and had bestowed it all on us, it would not compensate for the injury she has done us. Such is the appetite of the publick maw for some tale of Mormon rascality, that beyond question a most interesting cock and bull story will be manufactured out of the transaction, giving a world wide fame to a transaction which anywhere else would not have been mentioned out of its own neighbourhood.

Another annoyance we have had in this matter. A distinguished lawyer in Detroit, a high publick functionary, addressed a letter to Mr. Strang, much in the style of Mexican diplomacy, requiring him to take Mr. Bebee's property and children, and return them to him, and threatening in the alternate to come up here himself and try his hand at it.

Pray, what business has Mr. S. with Bebee's children and property? If Bebee cannot govern his wife, or make her take care of his children and substance to his liking, why ask a stranger to help him? Mr. Strang is quite likely to have business enough of his own, without helping heepecked husbands manage unruly women.

And a lawyer and officer of the government must have strange ideas of civil rights to think that Mr. Strang could do anything with the family or property of Bebee, which he could not do himself. Mr. Strang knows his duty, both as a citizen, a civil magistrate, and a minister of the gospel, and is quite as likely to do it faithfully, and to do no more, as any man. And as to the threat of a lawyer coming here, we are not children, and cannot understand such things.

DEATH OF THOMAS BENNETT.

The death of this individual has been published in nearly all the periodical papers of the country, and by a large portion of them spoken of as a cold blooded and unprovoked murder.

It is in reference to this mistaken view of the matter that we now speak of it. We shall give a brief history of the transactions preceding the attempt to arrest Bennett, which are necessary to a proper understanding of the matter.

Some time near the last of May Mr. Samuel Graham went to Whiskey Point to have an interview with Sheriff Granger. A few moments after arriving there, and while approaching a house where Granger was, Richard O'Donnell and James Hoy passed him, and as he passed by one of them struck him with a heavy cane. Graham received the blow on his arm, and it broke the bone.

He then seized the ruffian with the other hand, but the other antagonist took the cane and struck Graham over the head, and brought him down. They then alternately beat him with the cane, each crying, "kill him, damn him," as the other struck. Before they were taken off, his skull was fractured, and his head dreadfully mutilated. It has been stated in various papers that there had been a previous quarrel between Graham and O'Donnell and Hoy, and that on this occasion Graham commenced the violence. Both statements are untrue. There had been no previous quarrel, and on this occasion Graham had not so much as spoken to them.

For this offence warrants were issued successively, first by James M. Greig, County Judge, and subsequently by M. M. Aldrich, Justice of the Peace, and put into the hands of Sheriff Granger, and he refused to execute them.—And this refusal was not on the ground of any informality of the warrants, nor on the last was it pretended. He refused to execute the first, giving as a reason that it had not the county seal.

But such warrants never have it. But in regard to the warrant issued by Mr. Aldrich, and which was carefully drawn up by an able lawyer, he declared that he would execute no warrant issued by a magistrate who was a Mormon, or issued upon complaint of a Mormon. Thus the Mormons were denied legal protection by the officers of the law.

They then petitioned the Prosecuting Attorney to prosecute the offenders at Mackinac; wishing to have nothing to do with either arresting or judging the offenders. But he, with his usual fearlessness and faithfulness to duty, determined to vindicate the integrity of the law on the spot.—He came to this place and directed the proceedings, that all might be done with exact legal precision. A warrant issued by M. M. Aldrich, Justice of the Peace, was put into the hands of Wm. Chambers, Constable, for the arrest of O'Donnell and Hoy, and he went up on to the fishing ground to arrest them, accompanied by three men, all unarmed.

As they approached Bennett's place, which they had to pass in going for O'Donnell and Hoy, the Bennetts stopped them, and with guns in their hands drove them back; telling them that all the fishermen on those grounds, represented to be sixty in number, would rally at the signal of three guns, and they had bound themselves together that no one should be taken by an officer, and they would not give up while one remained alive.

The Constable returned to the Justice and stated these facts on oath, and he issued his warrant for the arrest of Thomas and Samuel Bennett, for resisting an officer in the discharge of his official duties. The constable, with this and the warrant against O'Donnell and Hoy, summoned a posse; but the men would not go. He went to the Prosecuting Attorney for advice, and he told him to summon a sufficient posse, and put down the name of every man who refused to aid him, and he would prosecute them.

Mr. Chambers went around a second time to call the power of the county to his aid, and succeeded in raising a force of between thirty and forty men, and with them went up to the fishing ground to arrest the two Bennetts, O'Donnell and Hoy. On approaching Bennett's constable, leaving most of his party behind, went forward, and as he approached the house they shut the door.—He spoke to them through the window, explained his business, told them the instructions he had received from the Prosecuting Attorney, and urged them to desist from any act of violence, and to go peaceably with him. They refused with oaths, imprecations and threats.

As he drew back to call on his posse, they shot at him. Three guns were fired, and one of them brought down the constable, and upon that the fire was returned, and when resistance ceased Thomas Bennett was found dead, and Samuel wounded.

Not an act was done by the constable or his posse but what was necessary to the enforcement of the law. Had the officer done less, he would have been charged as recreant to his duty, and faithless to his oath of office.

Upon this Hoy took to the woods, and made his escape. O'Donnell took a boat and put out on the lake, and a part of the posse pursued. As they approached him, he took deliberate aim at one of them with his rifle, and threatened to shoot if they advanced. Three rifles were instantly brought to bear upon him, and the boat went on, till the man in the bow seized O'Donnell's rifle by the muzzle. From this resistance ceased, and we may add that but for the avidity with which newspapers at a distance seized upon and repeated false tales concerning the transaction, it would have put an end to all further attempts at lawlessness here.

As it is, a constable can go alone to the fishing grounds, and arrest any person charged with crime. The magistrates are treated with as much respect as any in the State; and in the progress of law and order, since Mr. Strang has come into office as a Justice of the Peace, even the fishermen come to him to right their wrongs.

All that has been said about brutality in the post mortem examination, is utterly without foundation. Nor was there any malice shown or felt on the part of those engaged in the transaction. It was a mere act of vindication of the lawful authority of the State of Michigan throughout Mackinac Co. Such every legal investigation will show it.

CRIME AND DETECTION.

During the absence of most of the brethren from here in June and July, divers persons remaining here, who flattering themselves that the saints would be imprisoned and driven off the Island commenced a wholesale plunder of the property of the absentees. In this operation Johnson & McCulloch were plundered of one hundred cords of steamboat wood. Various other persons were plundered of small quantities. And the various farms occupied by the Mormons, many of whom have only pre-empted their land, were regularly apportioned among a few speculating rascals, who waited only for the conviction of the Mormon prisoners to seize upon them.

The work of plunder went on swimmingly until the prisoners began to return. Upon that event the plunderers prepared to leave, but believing the Mormons were worn out and spirit broken, they did not seem to think there was any danger of being called to account for their peculations.

In this they were mistaken.—Dr. McCulloch commenced a prosecution against one of the active instruments of these peculations, in the conducting of which the transactions were laid bare. The consequence has been that large quantities of cord wood, stolen in the absence of the owners, has been paid for, and many other peculations are being now the subject of adjustment. As often as any one has stood out to be prosecuted, he has been subjected to exemplary damages, moderate to be sure, but yet sufficient to make the speculators generally willing to pay the value for their plunderings, in peace.

POLICE AND PERJURY.

On the examination of a criminal charge connected with the recent wood stealing operations in this place, William Chapman was introduced as a witness for the prisoner, and undertook 'to swear him through.' Now it is our opinion that no task can be more difficult than that same. For a man to simply say he "don't remember," when he does remember, and knows the fact to be important, may not be difficult to one who is corrupt enough. But, to tell a tale of deliberate falsehood, with its essential circumstances, and on a rigid cross examination escape detection and exposure, is a task that few men are equal to the accomplishment of. We would not fear to trust our life upon its utter impossibility.

But Mr. Chapman undertook this task. He stated that the quantity of wood stolen from a certain place was but five cords and a half. He knew, because he measured the wood himself. When? About five weeks ago. He was certain that he had remembered the amount correctly, for his sister put it down in the account book at the time. He saw her put it down, and he had seen it again the same day he testified.

Mr. Strang, the sitting magistrate, directed him to bring in the book. After a short absence, he came in with part of a leaf of an account book, and went on to testify that that was the account; that he had just torn it from the book, and that there was nothing whatever on the rest of the leaf. Mr. Strang suggested a doubt whether that was not a mere memorandum, copied from the account book, instead of the book itself, but he reasserted with positiveness and minutely circumstantial particularity that he had just torn that identical piece of paper from the original account book, and that the entry of five cords and a half of wood thereon was the original entry made by his sister about five, and certainly more than three weeks previous.

The quick eye of the magistrate detected at the first glance that the ink on the paper was fresh; that it was written wrong end up of the book leaf, and that the piece was from the inner and not the outer edge of the leaf—two strong circumstances and one positive fact against the witness' testimony. He immediately directed the witness to go and bring in the book itself, from which he had torn this. And as soon as the witness was gone, he directed an officer to follow, and the moment he had returned with the book, to take his sister who had made the entries into custody, and bring her into court, without allowing any one to communicate with her.

William Chapman returned in due time with the account book, made of a different kind of paper from the piece he had before brought in, and no leaf torn out, but an entry of an account of nine and three-fourth cords of wood, made under date of that day, and the ink yet fresh, and then explained that that was the original account, and the paper he had before brought in was a copy that his sister had made, when he was up after it; and asserted in the most positive manner that the entry in the book was made by his sister some five weeks previously, and was positive that he had seen and read it there more than three weeks previous.

The sister was immediately called in, and testified that she had made both the entries at the direction of her brother that day, which was further confirmed by the fact that it followed after entries of articles sold under various dates, almost every day, down till that very morning.

Chapman was ordered into custody, and after a regular examination, duly committed for trial; but escaped from the officer by the aid of Mr. McKinley, U. S. Deputy Marshal, and a crew of drunken men he keeps gathered around him to depredate on honest citizens, and override the legal authorities.

THE LATE GOVERNMENT SEIZURES.

We mentioned recently the seizures of timber, &c., here by Dept. Marshals Bower and McKinley, and some singular transactions connected with it. Since then the property seized has been advertised for sale; and subsequently a very little sold, but most of it released. McKinley and Bower, unwilling that their patrons should know to what extent they had prostituted their official power to private malice, failed to report many seizures made by them. The little transactions, such as seizing a few house logs, a single stock of boards, or a half dozen sticks of timber for some unfinished house, are left out of the catalogue in the official report of seizures. Several very gross transactions are covered up by means still more reprehensible.

The result of this matter is, that with every favoritism that could be carried on, the seizure has fallen heavier on those who invoked it for the destruction of the Mormons than on them.—Like every attempt against us, it has fallen on the heads of its authors. The Mormons here are settlers, intending to make the place a permanent home. They are engaged in clearing land to cultivate. It is others who strip land of its timber, and leave it on the hands of the government.—But very little lumber business was ever done here by anybody. There are no facilities for it, and the Mormons have always been anxious to preserve the timber for the use of future settlers.

Such a thing as seizing timber here would never have been thought of, but as a pretence upon which to injure the Mormons. We are fully warranted in saying that in the conducting of the business here, the instructions of the Solicitor of the Treasury have been constantly and shamelessly violated. There was never property enough here liable to seizure under his instructions to pay the expense of seizing and selling. And the Mormons have never cut any, except upon lands which they settled upon for permanent improvement.

The same men who have made the government an expense of some hundred dollars in seizing timber not liable, are now making their boasts that it will yet be sold. Let them try it again. Again it will fall on their heads.

Mr. E. J. Moore was one of the persons who procured the general seizure of timber, &c., here. It so happened, however, that Moore had got out more timber from government land than any other person. True, it had all been sold on an execution against him, but he don't know that a legal title against him is sufficient to divest him.

Well, as we were saying, Moore had timber here which must be seized if any seizures were made. But he has his own way of getting out of the muss—and, reader, that is, perjury. He made his solemn oath that his timber was cut on land purchased by him.—And at the very moment he made that oath the timber was lying on Congress land, where it fell, one end of every stick lying at the stump, and the other at the top of the tree where it was cut. It lays there now, and any gentleman who wishes can make a personal inspection of it in a half hours walk from here.

We take pleasure in recommending to the travelling public, and especially to emigrants coming to these Islands, the Propeller Lady of the Lake, Capt. A. W. Rosman. A courteous frankness is extended to passengers on this boat that is denied to Mormons, at least, on several other boats.

We are pleased to see the pile driver again putting down big stakes for the spring pier of M. M. Aldrich & Co., at the south jaw of this harbour. There is every prospect that they will have

ACQUITTED.

A great ado has been made over the arrest of STRANG, the Mormon King at Beaver Island, alledging that he had been guilty of almost everything. He has had an examination at Detroit, and been honourably acquitted.—In this case we are of the opinion that STRANG and his followers have been wronged.—Comme-ant Reporter.

FEMALE BEAUTY.

The following curious facts respecting female beauty in the various countries of the world are interesting. They show how the standard of beauty varies in different countries, and how beauty itself, though depending upon general laws, as those which govern the universe is, without any adventitious aid, appreciated only in proportion as civilization advances, and taste improves with intellectual cultivation:—

The ladies of Arabia stain their fingers and toes red, their eye brows black, and their lips blue. In Persia, they paint a black streak around the eyes, and ornament their faces with various figures. The Japanese women gild their teeth, and those of India paint them red. The pearl of the teeth must be dyed black to be beautiful in Guzarat. The Holent women paint the entire body in compartments of red and black. In Greenland the women cover their faces with blue and yellow, and they frequently tattoo their bodies by saturated thread in soot, inserting them beneath the skin and then drawing them through.—Hindoo women, when they wish to appear particularly lovely, smear themselves with a mixture of saffron, tumeric and grease. In nearly all the islands of the Pacific and Indian Oceans, the women, as well as men, tattoo a great variety of figures on the face, the lips, tongue, and the whole body. In New Holland, they cut themselves with shells, and by keeping the wounds open a long time, form deep scars in the flesh, which they deem highly ornamental. And another singular addition is made to their beauty by taking off, in infancy, the little finger of the left hand, at the second joint. In ancient Persia, an aquiline nose was tho't worthy of the crown; but the Sumatran mother carefully flattened the nose of her daughter. Among the savage tribes of Oregon, and also in Sumatra and Arracan, continual pressure is applied to the skull in order to flatten it, and thus give it a new beauty. The modern Persians have a strong aversion to red hair; the Turks, on the contrary, are warm admirers of it. In China small round eyes are liked; and the girls are continually plucking their eye brows that they may be thin and long. But the great beauty of a Chinese lady is in her feet, which, in childhood, are so compressed by bandages as effectually to prevent any further increase of size. The four smaller toes are turned under the foot, to the sole of which they firmly adhere; and the poor girl not only endures much pain, but becomes a cripple for life. Another mark of beauty consists in finger nails so long that casings of bamboo are necessary to preserve them from injury. An African beauty must have small eyes, thick lips, a large flat nose, and a skin beautifully black. In New Guinea, the nose is perforated, and a large piece of wood or bone inserted.—On the northwest coast of America, an incision more than two inches in length is made in the lower lip, and then filled with a wooden plug. In Guiana, the lips are pierced with thorns, the heads being inside the mouth, and the point resting on the chin. The Tunisian woman of moderate pretensions to beauty, needs a slave under each arm, to support her when she walks, and a perfect belle carries flesh enough to load down a camel.

FROM UTAH TERRITORY.

The last mail from the west brought us a letter, and some papers, from the Great Salt Lake City, up to July 1st. The news is not of remarkable interest. No rain had fallen for the six weeks previous to the 1st of July, and still the gardens and crops in general looked fine and promised an abundant harvest. There were some exceptions in fields of wheat which had been burnt, or perished for want of irrigation, as the streams were so low a sufficient quantity ty could not be obtained to supply all.

Trade, it is said, opens dull, and it was feared that there was not money enough in the city to buy the merchandise that was coming. There was talk already of taking part of it to Oregon or some other quarter.

The people have had considerable difficulty with the Indians, by whom large numbers of cattle and horses had been stolen. The Mormons collected a party, and pursued the Indians into the mountains and among the cedars. They killed about a dozen Indians, broke up their encampment, and destroyed all their provisions. The Indians have stolen, at various times, great numbers of mules, horses and cattle.

The emigration to California is represented as quite small, though the intelligence from that quarter was very flattering. A very large emigration to California from the States was anticipated this season, overland; and it is said, unless this takes place, and money becomes more abundant, pecuniary affairs would be seriously affected.

Flour was selling at $8 per hundred, and it was supposed that it would go down to $6.

TO THE TWELVE.

BY H. RANDALL.

Go forth in power, ye heralds go,
From Ephraim's fruitful land;
Go preach the gospel clear and bold,
For God has given command.
Unto the nations of the earth
Your message bold declare;
Go armed with power from Joseph's God,
A people to prepare.
Tell them that God once more to earth
The priesthood has restored,
And gather all to Zion's fold
Who will obey your word.
Point to the standard that is rais'd,
With banners wide and unfurl'd,
To gather in from every land
The noble of the world.
First unto Europe's fertile shores—
In Asia loud proclaim;
Till songs from every land shall raise,
To the Redeemer's name.
And then to Africa's sable sons
May heaven direct your way;
Tell them no galling chains you've bro't,
To force their friends away.
The savage tribes that roam the west
Shall be your converts soon;
When God says to Ephraim's sons,
Your wanderings they are done.
Go boldly on your mission, go,
To every distant shore;
Preach the eternal gospel where
It ne'er was preach'd before.
Be faithful to your Lord's command
Until the glorious day,
When God shall call his servants home,
Their labour to repay.
Then on Mount Zion you shall stand,
And be our saviours there;
And all you've turned from error's ways
Rejoice to meet you there.

INTELLIGENCE AND AFFECTION.

These, like material things, have their origin in eternal, uncreated elements; and like them, must endure forever. They are the foundations of enjoyment, the main-springs of glory and exaltation, and the fountains from which emanate a thousand streams of life, and joy, and gladness; diffused through all worlds, and extending to all extent. They are the principal roots from which shoot forth innumerable branches, which bud in time, and blossom and ripen in eternity; producing a perfume more delicious than the balmy sweets of Arabia, and fruits more precious than the apples of Eden.

The human mind in infancy, like the body, is small and weak indeed. It neither possesses intelligence nor affection to any great degree; for the latter is the production of the former—grows with its growth, and strengthens with its strength; and cannot exist independent and separate therefrom.

This infant mind commences to expand, and continues to enlarge itself just in proportion to the truths that are presented for its food, and the time and opportunity it has to digest and comprehend them. If unassociated with other intelligence, it expands but very little—all its powers remain in a great measure inactive and dormant. For instance, let an infant be cut off from all communication with other intelligences, let it grow to manhood entirely alone, and it still knows little more than in infancy.

One child may be raised to manhood possessing only the limited knowledge of Holofernes, while another is made to comprehend the sublime truths of a Newton.

The human mind then, is capable of a constant and gradual expansion to an unlimited extent. In fact, its receptive powers are infinite.

Once set free from the chains of innocent tradition; and unfettered from the limited creeds and superstition of men, and associated with beings of unlimited intelligence, it may go freely on from truth to truth; enlarge itself like the rays of the morning; circumscribe the earth and soar to the heavens; comprehend the mysteries of the past, and remove the veil from the future; till the wide expanse of eternity, with all its treasures of wisdom, is brought within the range of its comprehension.

It is true, that in this life, the progress of the mind in intelligence, is not only gradual, but obstructed in various ways. It has to contend, not only with its own prejudices, and the errors of an opposing world, but with innumerable weaknesses, temptations, cares, and troubles, with which it is continually beset.

And finally, its organs are weakened by disease, or worn with age, till it sinks into the backward tendency—loses a portion of that which it has been able to comprehend, and partakes of a kind of secondary childhood.

From this fact, some are ready to conclude, that the mind, like the body, has its limits; its point of maturity, beyond which it can never expand; and that arriving at this climax of maturity, like a full grown plant, it is incapable of further advance. But this is a mistake. It is not the mind itself that is thus limited and confined, within a circle so narrow, but it is the circumstances in which it is placed. That is, its bodily organs, once strong and vigorous, are now weakened by disease, or worn with age. Hence, the mind, while connected with them, and dependent on them, is compelled to partake of their weaknesses. And like a strong traveler with a weak companion, or a strong workman with a slender tool, it can only operate as they are able to bear. What then is the means by which this formidable obstacle can be overcome, and the mind be enabled, with renewed vigour, to continue its onward progress in the reception of intelligence?

We will best answer this question by a parable.

A certain child had continued the use of food until its teeth were worn, loosened and decayed to that degree that they were no longer able to perform their accustomed office. On this account, its food was swallowed in such a manner as not to digest properly.

This soon caused a general weakness and disorder of the system. Some unthinking persons seeing this, came to the conclusion that the child had come to maturity—that it no longer needed its accustomed nourishment, but must gradually sink and die. But in process of time, nature provided its own remedy. The old teeth were shed, and a new set more strong and durable took their place. The system being thus restored in every part to a full, vigorous and healthy action, was enabled to make rapid progress towards perfection, and to receive and digest food far more strong and hard of digestion than before.

So with the organs of the mind. This temporary body, frail and mortal, is to the mind what the children's teeth are to the system. Like them it answers a momentary purpose, and like them its organs become decayed and weakened by age and use; so that many truths which present themselves to the mind, cannot be properly digested while dependent on such weak organs. But let this feeble and decayed body share the fate of the child's first set of teeth—let it be plucked by death, and the mind set free. Nay, rather let it be renewed in all the freshness and vigour of eternal life; with organs fresh and strong, and durable as the powers of eternal intellect.

And the mind, thus provided with organs, fully adapted to its most ardent powers of action, will find itself no longer constrained to linger on the confines of its former limits, where, impatient of restraint, it had struggled in vain for freedom. But like a prisoner, suddenly freed from the iron shackles and gloomy dungeons of a terrible tyrant, it will move nimbly onward with a joyous consciousness of its own liberty. It will renew with redoubled vigour its intellectual feast, and enlarge its field of operations amid the boundless sources of intelligence, till earth, with all its measures of wisdom, becomes too small, and the neighbouring worlds too narrow to satisfy a capacity so enlarged. It will then, on wings of faith, and by the power of the spirit, waft itself far beyond our visible heavens, and "far above earth's span of sky," and explore other suns, and other systems; and hold communion with other intelligences, more remote than our weak minds can possibly conceive.

In these researches and discoveries, the mind will be able by degrees to circumscribe the heavens, and to comprehend the heights and depths, and lengths and breadths of the mysteries of eternal truth, and like its Maker, "comprehend all things, even the deep things of God."

While the mind is thus expanding and increasing in intelligence, the affection will expand and increase in proportion, both in this life and in the life to come.

God is light, God is truth, God is love.

The reason why he loves, is because he is light and truth. Or, in other words, he loves because he knows; and in proportion to the extent of his knowledge, or intelligence, so is the extent of his love; and so it is with the human mind. In infancy, our love is as narrow as our intellectual capacity. But as our intelligence increases, so our affection grows, till from knowing and loving our mother, we begin to know and love the circle of our immediate kindred and family. Thus, love or affection is dependent on knowledge, or intelligence, and can only be increased by an increase of knowledge. These two principles are the foundations, the fountains of all real happiness.

Some persons have supposed that our natural affections were the result of a fallen and corrupt nature, and that they are "corrupt, sensual and devilish," and therefore ought to be resisted, subdued, or overcome as so many evils which prevent our perfection, or progress in the spiritual life. In short, that they should be greatly subdued in this world, and in the world to come entirely done away. And even our intelligences.

Such persons have mistaken the source and fountain of happiness altogether. They have not one correct idea of the nature of the enjoyments or happiness of heaven, or earth; of this life or any other. If intelligence and affection are to decrease at such a low ebb that we shall neither recognise our kindred and friends, then a stone, a block of wood, or a picture in the wall is as capable of the enjoyments of heaven as we are. So far from this being the case, our natural affections are planted in us by the Spirit of God, for a wise purpose; and they are the very main-springs of life and happiness—they are the cement of all virtuous and heavenly society—they are the essence of charity, or love, and therefore never fail, but endure forever.

These pure affections are inspired in our bosoms, and interwoven with our nature by an all-wise and benevolent being, who rejoices in the happiness and welfare of his creatures. All his revelations to man touching this subject, are calculated to encourage, and strengthen these emotions, and to increase and perfect them; that man, enlightened and taught of God, may be more free, more social, cheerful, happy, kind, familiar and lovely than he was before, that he may fill all the relationships of life, and act in every sphere of usefulness with a greater energy and with a readier mind, and a more willing heart. All the monkish austerity, all the sadness and reserve, all the unsocial feelings and doings of priests, and monks, and nuns; all the long-facedness, unsocial sadness, groanings, sighs, and mortifications of sectaries, whether of ancient convents, where men and women retire from all the busy scenes and pleasures of life, to live a life of celibacy, self-denial and devotion; or whether in the more modern and fashionable circles of the camp meetings, or the "mourners' bench." All these I say are expressly and entirely opposed to the spirit and objects of true religion; they are so many relics of superstition, ignorance and hypocrisy, and are expressly forbidden, and condemned by our Lord and Saviour.

Man was designed for a social being; he was made to cultivate, beautify, possess, enjoy and govern the earth; and to fill it with myriads of happy, free, and social intelligences. Woman was made for him, as a help and a comfort. All the faculties of his are precisely adapted to his several duties and enjoyments. He owes a duty to his wife, to his parents, to his children, to his brothers and sisters, and kindred, and finally to his neighbours, his nation, and to all mankind. He also owes a duty to the earth, and to his God. These several spheres of action are termed in times, political, civil, moral, social, domestic, foreign, religious, &c., &c. But they may all be summed up in one term, viz: religious.

That man who, through a mistaken zeal, or through the influence of ignorant teachings or incorrect traditions, so far mistakes the object and purpose of his being, as to withdraw from all these; to shut himself from the world, and to seek to overcome and subdue the natural affections with which God has endowed him, is not a religious man at all. On the contrary, he is opposing the will and commandment of God, and neglecting the duties of religion.

How often do we hear of persons, and even whole societies, who hold that a religious man or community should have nothing to do with politics, government and office. Such persons judge of the depth of a man's religion by his indifference to, or retirement from, the arduous duties of family, church, or state. How different is this notion from the facts of the case, if we may judge either from common sense, or from precepts and examples set before us by God's people.

What then is sinful? I answer, our unnatural passions and affections, or, in other words, the abuse, the perversion, the unlawful indulgence of that which is otherwise good. Sodom was not destroyed for their natural affection, but for the want of it. They had perverted all their affections, and had given place to that which was unnatural, and contrary to nature. Thus they had lost those holy and pure principles of virtue and love which were calculated to preserve and exalt mankind; and were overwhelmed in all manner of corruption; and also hated towards those who were good.

So it was with the nations of Canaan who were doomed to destruction by the Israelites. And so it was with the Greeks, Romans, and other Gentiles in the days of Paul. Hence his testimony against their wicked works, and his warnings to the churches to beware of these carnal, sinful, corrupt and impure works of the flesh; all of which we more or less interweave with their natures by reason of long and frequent indulgences therein. Now it was not because men's natural affections were sinful that all these sins existed; but it was because wicked customs, contrary to nature, had become so prevalent as to become a kind of second nature.

So it is in the present age; men who do not govern their affections so as to keep them in their proper and lawful channel; but who indulge in every vice, and in unlawful use of that which was originally good, so far pervert it that it becomes a minister of evil; and they seek to change their nature; and call upon God to make them into a different being from what he made them at first. In short they seek to divest themselves of a portion of the very attributes of their nature, instead of seeking to govern, to improve, and to cultivate and direct their powers of mind and their affections, so as to cause them to contribute to their happiness. All these are the result of innocent tradition, superstition and practices. Know ye, O man, that God created you in his own image, and in the light of heaven, the rays of his happiness are within and around thee.

As we said in the beginning of this subject, we say again; that our intellect and affection, only buds in time, and ripens in eternity. Then we shall know and love our kindred and our friends; and there we shall be capable of exercising all those pure emotions of friendship and love which fill our hearts with such inexpressible delight in this world. And not only so, but our love will be far more strong and perfect in many respects. First, because we shall know and realize more. Secondly, because our organs of thought will be more strong and durable. Thirdly, because we shall be free from those mean, selfish, grovelling, envious and disagreeable influences which disturb, and hinder the free exercise of our affections in this world. And lastly, because we shall be associated with a more extensive and numerous society of those who are filled with the same freedom of spirit and affection that we are; and therefore are objects truly worthy of our love. While those of a contrary nature will be banished to their own place, and not suffered to mingle in the society, or mar the peace of those who have gotten the victory.

Having discovered and set forth in plainness the origin, purpose, and destiny of man's physical organization and the powers, attributes, energies, affections and capabilities of his intellect, till we find him standing erect in God-like majesty, with organs of strength beyond the reach of death; and powers of thought, capable of spanning the heavens, and comprehending all things. We must now inquire into the nature of his employment in that eternal world of joy and bliss. On this subject, as on most others, where investigation has been considered a sin, men have greatly erred. They have supposed that this short life was the only active one; and that the world to come was a life of repose, or of inactive and eternal rest; where all our powers of body and mind would remain dormant, or only be engaged in shouts, songs and acclamations. To prove this we often hear quotations like the following:—"There is no work or device, nor knowledge in the grave whither thou goest." "As the tree falleth so it lieth." "His death leaves us, so judgment will find us." To the first of these we would reply that the spirit never goes to the grave; and the body does not stay in it long. And beyond it, in the regions of eternal life there is abundance of work, knowledge and device. To the second we would say that the tree lieth as it falleth until it is removed, and used for some other purpose. And to the third, we reply, that it is a sectarian proverb, instead of a scripture; and, by the by, a false one too. For death leaves us in the grave, with body and spirit separated; and judgment finds us risen from the grave, and spirit and body united.

Thus organized anew, we are prepared to enter upon a life of business and usefulness, in a sphere vastly enlarged and extended. Possessing a priesthood after the order of Melchisedec, or after the order of the Son of God, which is after the power of an endless life, without beginning of days or ending of years, a priesthood which includes a sceptre and kingly office—we are more fully than ever qualified to teach, to judge, to rule and govern—and to go and come on foreign missions. The field of our labours may extend, for aught we know, to the most distant worlds—to climates where mortal eye never penetrated. Or we may visit the dark and gloomy regions of the spirits in prison, and there like a risen Jesus, preach the gospel to those who are dead; "that they may be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit." Or we may be called upon, with the other sons of God to shout for joy, at the organization of new systems of worlds, and new orders of being; over which we may reign as kings, or to whom we may minister as priests.

These ideas may be considered by some as mere flights of fancy, no where supported by positive evidence. But we contend that the very nature of our existence and of our priesthood is such as to warrant the conclusion to which we have arrived. But if proof were wanting, we have only to refer, as a precedent, to the active life and ministry of a risen Jesus; and to his administration as king of kings and lord of lords; as well as to the promises made by him to those whom he had sent. It appears that Jesus Christ after rising from the dead, immediately entered upon the most active ministry; in which he taught, expounded, opened the scriptures, commanded, commissioned, prophesied and blessed. By this means he laid the foundation for his kingdom to be established not only among the Jews and Gentiles, but also among the Nephites and the lost tribes of Israel. He also visited the spirits of the dead and preached the gospel unto them, as is recorded in one of the Epistles of Peter. Not only so, but he ascended to realms of exalted glory, where, seated on a throne, he still is active both as a king and priest. And, if we look into the future, we shall find that he has yet a great work to do upon the earth, not only as a judge, king and priest; but as an executioner, warrior, and a military commander. For he will tread them in his anger, and trample them in his fury, and stain his raiment with their blood; while all the armies in heaven follow him in martial splendor, mounted on white horses, and all arrayed in a uniform of spotless white. This same Jesus conferred on his apostles an everlasting priesthood, after his own order, as it is written:—"As the father hath sent me, even so I send you." "And the works that I do shall ye also do." He also promised to be with them always even unto the end of the world; and therefore is yet with them in their labours and ministry, whether as men or angels. Those who suppose a man's office or priesthood to end with his life have been in the habit of applying that promise, as if it only meant them and their successors; but he said no such thing. But rather that he would be with them always unto the end of the world. If they had successors, it was then time enough for similar promises to be made to them, when they in turn should enter upon their holy and sacred office.

These apostles not only hold the perpetual office of the apostleship and priesthood; but also partake of kingly power. Hence it is written "they shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." And this too, when the son of man shall come in his glory. Then will be fulfilled that which was recorded by John, saying: "They have made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." In view of an eternal kingdom, and of an immortal reign and ministry, they might well rejoice when arraigned before the dreadful tribunals of earthly tyrants, knowing as they did that they should reign in turn, and that their persecutors would be in turn arraigned before a judgment bar.

From all these and a thousand other promises made to prophets and apostles, we feel safe in the conclusion, that a field wide as eternity and boundless as the ocean of God's benevolence, extends before the servants of God. A field where ambition knows no check, and zeal no limits; and where the most ardent aspirations may be more than realized. A field where crowns of glory, thrones of power and dominions of immortality are the rewards of diligence. And where man—once a weak and helpless worm of dust—may sit enthroned in majesty on high, and occupy an exalted station among the councils of the sons of God.

THE FAMILY OPPOSED TO NEWS-PAPERS.

The man that don't take his county newspaper was in town yesterday. He brought the whole family in a one horse wagon. He still believed that Gen. Taylor was President, and wanted to know if the "Kamscatkins" had taken Cuba, and if so, where they had taken it. He had sold his corn for twenty-five cents—the price being thirty-one—but on going to deposit the money, they told him it was mostly counterfeit. The only hard money he had was some three cent pieces, and these some sharper had "run on him" for half dimes!—His old lady smoked a "cob pipe" and would not believe that anything else could be used. One of the boys went to a blacksmith's shop to be measured for a pair of shoes, and another mistook the market house for a church. After hanging his hat on a meat hook, he pioussly took a seat on a butcher's stall, and listened to an auctioneer, whom he took to be the preacher. He left before "meetin" was out," and had no great opinion of the "sarin."

One of the girls took a lot of seed onions to the post-office to trade them for a letter. She had a baby, which she carried in a "sugar-trough," stopping at times to rock it on the side-walk. When it cried, she stuffed its mouth with an old stocking, and sung "Barbara Allen." The oldest boy had sold two "coon skins" and was on a "bust." When last seen he had called for a glass of "sody and water," and stood soaking ginger-bread and making wry faces. The shop keeper, mistaking his meaning, had given him a mixture of sal soda and water, and it tasted strongly of soap. But he'd heard tell of sody and water, and was bound to give it a fair trial, poke or no poke. Some "town fellow" came in and called for lemonade with a "fly in it," whereupon our "soaped" friend turned his back and quietly wiped several flies into his drink.

We approached the old gentleman and tried to get him to "subscribe," but he would not listen to it. He was opposed to "internal improvements," and he thought "larnin'" was a wicked invention. None of his family ever learned to read, but one boy, and he "taught school awhile, and then went a studying divinity."

We cut me above from the Boston Times, where we find it without credit. It is certainly good enough to credit to some one.

NOT BAD.

Miss Susan Nipper gives a loud certificate in favour of some of the popular patent medicines of the day. She was suffering from general debility, sick head-ache, heart-burn, indigestion, tape-worms, constipation, rheumatism in the back, shoulders and hips, and besides these, she didn't "feel very well herself" more than half the time. At length, she says, "I was brought very low so that my most impudent friends didn't know me, and the regular faculties didn't expect me to live from one end to the other."

"About this time, a friend recommended, as the last resort, that I should try a few bottles of the Pectoral Oxenated Compound Sassafla Extract of Wild Cherry Wine Bitters and Syrup of Huckleberry, satisfaction given or no money refunded, to be well taken before shakin' destroy the label as soon as possible, no pay no cure, beware of counterfeits—none genuine unless the proprietor is on the wrapper—I took three dozen bottles of this truly invaluable medicine, and it gives immediate relief in three months."

Personally appeared the said Susan Nipper as aforesaid, and swore to the foregoing, and said she'd be darned—if it wasn't true.

PATENT LABOUR-SAVING FLUID.

HOW A YANKEE GOT HIS FINGERS BURN'T.

The following humorous account of a vial of Washing Fluid was made in the following manner, which is condensed from the Boston Museum:—

"Don't make yourselves uneasy about the children's dresses, ladies," exclaimed a labour saving fluid man. "I have a few bottles of the transparent washing fluid in my trunk, that will in five minutes time, without the least labour or inconvenience in the world, man, renovate the dresses in a manner that is truly astonishing, and bring back the colour to a few shades brighter than the original tint."

A raw boned Vermonter, sitting by our side, and who, until this time, kept as silent as a pine slab, here drew up his long neck, and exclaimed:

"Stranger, you'll oblige me much by discontinuing your remarks about your infernal washing fluid; for I'm in rather good humour to-day, and I don't wish to be riled. I once purchased a bottle of that stuff, and it came near ruining me for life, and I've taken an oath to lick the first man who offers me another bottle. I could tell you a yarn on that subject, that would bring tears to your eyes; but of course no man wants to hear a yarn now."

The Yankee proceeded with his yarn thus: Having on such an application made a purchase, he proceeds to tell his experiments.

"My purchase was on Saturday afternoon about three o'clock, and I took my big black bottle of fluid, put it in my coat pocket, and started for home. Now, thinks I to myself, my wife always picks up her clothes on Sunday night, and does washing Monday morning, after breakfast; and so it would be a good joke for me not to let her know anything about the blessed fluid, stir 'em up with a stick, and hang them up to dry. Lord, says I to myself, right in the street, as loud as I'm talking now, I'll do it, by ginger, if I have to get up at two o'clock! So when I gets home, I just takes the bottle of fluid out into the woodshed, and pokes it upon a high shelf, among a lot of old beer bottles and blacking boxes, and went whistling around the house just as if nothing had happened.

"Saturday night I went to market just as usual, and Sunday we both went to church in the forenoon, and staid to home and talked about our future prospects in the afternoon; but I kept a keeping still about the fluid, and didn't let on but what I expected she would do the washing the next morning just the same as ever. But I didn't sleep much that night.

"I kept a thinking about stirring up the tub of clothes, and getting 'em out to dry before daylight. Once I got into a short doze, and I dreamed I was swimming across a deep river of gushing fluid, and the rocks at the bottom and both sides were all petrified shirt bosoms and pillow cases, and there was an old wash woman on the banks of the river, who kept a stirring on us up with a long pole. I reckon I woke up about five o'clock; for 'twas just about half between daylight and dark, and I could just see the leastest streak of light in the world among the clouds around the tops of the Green Mountains.

"I turns over and looks at wife, and she was sleeping as sound as a dead salmon; so I carefully slid out of bed, hurried on my clothes, and in less than ten minutes had the old wash tub filled clear to the top with all of wife's white clothes, and all I could find of my own. I poured in about a pailful and a half of clean rain water, and then goes out to the woodshed, takes down the bottle of fluid, walks back to the tub, and pours her all in!—Lord! but 'twould have done you good to have heard it sis!

"Well, says I to myself, if that's the dirt coming out, it makes a good deal of noise about it, any way; and I guess it's doing up the thing handsomely. So after letting it sis for about a minute, I takes up an old broom handle that was standing there, and wallops the things about like a lamb's tail in fly time, for three minutes, and takes hold of 'em with my hands to string 'em on the fence. But, gentlemen, you'd better believe I dropped that ere pile o' duds mighty sudden!—bilin' water wasn't a circumstance to 'em, and afore I could get my hands into a pail of fresh water, I thought my soul I should lose 'em both.

"For about a minute I was mad as a scratched kitten. I finally thought I wouldn't wake up my wife with my belling, but I hung out the bilin' duds with the broom handle, and let 'em dreat and dry on the fence; but the plaguy things never cooled to the last minute, and every time the pesky fluid splattered on my hands or face, it burnt worse than a half bushel full of live coals. I soon got tired of the sport, however, and before I had hung out on the fence half what was in the tub I just washed my hands and face in some clean rain water, and streaked it for bed. But I couldn't sleep a wink; my hands pained me so that I had to keep a blowing 'em to keep from belling; so says I to my wife, says I—

"Susan, hadn't you better get up and put your clothes to soak?"

"Ho, h-u-m," said she, rubbing her eyes with her thumb joint, and kind o' winking, as if she was half asleep. 'Yes, John, I guess I had; but how long have you been awake?'

"Oh, some time," says I, blowing my hands, and digging my legs with my toe nails all the time to keep from groaning; 'but get up now, Susan, do, dear, or you will be late about your breakfast, and I've got to go out to town this morning on important business.'

"If that's the case," says she, 'I'll certainly hurry.'

"You may depend upon it, gentlemen, I was in a mighty uncomfortable fix about that time! I wanted to groan like a dying horse, and have something cooling wrapped round my fingers; and then again, I didn't want to make any noise till wife had seen how nice I had fixed her things.—Well, wife she hurried and dressed herself, and went out into the kitchen to fill up the tub, and in a few minutes I heard her say to herself, says she—

"Good heavens and earth! What does all this mean? I never put these things to soak!—John! get up and come here, do!

"I am under strong impressions, gentlemen, that this customer was not very slow in his movements, about that time; for in less than forty seconds I was there, and says I—

"What's the matter, Susan? What's the matter?"

"Why, do look here," says she, somebody has put all my best clothes in a tub, and then put something on them which has entirely ruined them!"

"Ha, ha, ha," says I, 'well, Susan, I suppose I might as well own up the joke at once, for my hands ache so that I can't hold in any longer. It's nothing but washing fluid, and it cleans clothes without any rubbing. I got up this morning while you were asleep and done the whole washing, and hung part of 'em out on the fence to dry.'

"While I was saying this, wife she took a stick, and in trying to lift out of the tub one of her—that is—one of her garments—by ginger! the ternal thing burst in two! right through the middle! one half holding on to the stick, and the other half falling back into the tub! Although I was suffering from my burnt hands, and was as mad as a Green Mountain catamount, at what the infernal fluid had done, I couldn't keep from laughing at that moment, if I'd a died for it.

"Wife took a peep at the clothes on the fence—called up the doctor to dress my hands, and then sat down to have a crying spell. The doctor hurried in to my room, and after seeing my wife a sitting in the rocking chair a crying, and me a walking the room a groaning like a fall wind in a grave yard, says he—

"In the name of calomel and hot jallep, what's the matter now?"

"Nothing particular," says I, 'only I've burnt up all the clothes in the house, and both of my hands, with a bottle of thunder-in' washing fluid, that I've been experimenting with.'

"The doctor looked at my hands, and says he—

"Where's the bottle?"

"Out on the door step," said I.

"The doctor went out into the woodshed and took a peep at the old beer bottles and blacking boxes, and after swearing a little to himself, came back into the kitchen, and says he—

"Well, you have immortalized yourself, and no mistake, and you shall be known hereafter as the Washing Fluid Experiment-er.'

"What in thunder are you laughing at?" says I.

"Why," says he, 'your bottle of washing fluid stands out on the shelf where you put it, I suppose; and you have used a quart and a half of the best quality of oil of vitriol, that I've had on hand these six months.'

"Gentlemen, I'm a man that don't use profane language only in extreme cases, but if I didn't make the atmosphere in that room blue for a few moments, then 'twas because I didn't know how. I went and smashed up the uncorked bottle of fluid, and swore eternal enmity to every thing of the kind, and we've always washed our clothes in the old fashioned way ever since; and if a man ever offers me a bottle of that infernal stuff again, he has got to be a smarter man than I am or take a thrashing."

By the time our loquacious Vermonter had finished his very interesting washing fluid story, our stage had arrived at Vienna, where, as good luck would have it, part of our passengers left, including all of the children, and the dealer in patent transparent washing fluid, so that during the remainder part of the trip we had a very lively and pleasant time.

POWER OF MONOSYLLABLES.

The N. Y. Journal of Commerce some time since contained a communication, which was at once an argument and an exemplification in regard to the force of short words, from which two or three paragraphs are copied.—You will notice there is not in the whole extract a single word of more than one syllable.

THOUGHTS ON AND IN SHORT WORDS.

The speech of our sires, far back in the days of yore, like that of the first man, who may well be thought to have been taught of God, was made up for the most part of those short words which are spoke with one pulse of the breath, and one stroke of the tongue. The stream of time through a long tract of years, and from lands not our own, has brought down to us a vast drift of new and strange terms, with which we may think our speech has come to be rich, but it is clear that much of its strength has in this way been lost.

Thus we are shown to be base sons, who, both from our limbs and our tongue, have lost the brawn of our sires. They in truth were poor in purse, but rich in speech. Their words, like gems, were as great in wealth as they were small in bulk; while the mass of ours are as poor as they are large and long. We must add to this, not only the loss of force, but the waste of breath and time when we would speak our thoughts, and that of type and ink when we print them.

Huge tomes would shrink to one-third their bulk, and time and pains would be spent less in vain to those who read, if there were a due care to clip the length and size of the words, and to use no more than thought can claim. In our age, the price of time is as great as that of books is small; and the first charge we should give to those who would have us read what they write is, 'in all ways and by all means be brief; for life is short, and art is long.'

Nor let us think that the good old stock of words, so short and strong, is lost. They are not lost; they lie blent with the trace of the heap, and in bright points shine out here and there from the mass, like the stars when a fog dims the air, or the face of the sky is dark with clouds. It will be well worth while to mine out these gems, and string them on the chains of our thoughts, which will then shine with new life; and though the tongue may lose in sound, it will be more fit to speak all that the deep soul can feel. The heart feels but throbs by throb; and it is thus that the tongue should beat while it gives vent to its joys and its pains.

The arts of life and the lore of the head have need, it is true, for terms both cold and long. The heart must be kept cool while we search for truth, and truth shines best in what some call a 'dry light.' But what we have said holds in full force when we look to all that large class of thoughts which comes from the heart, and which we wish to go down in the souls of those to whom we speak.

Here we need the thoughts that breathe, and the words that burn—those that wing their speech like a bolt, and pierce like the barb of the shaft. Such are the terms in which it is fit to hail the long lost friend, when we once more grasp his hand, and hang on his neck, and tell him, 'I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God.' Thus should we 'sing praise to the Lord with a harp; with the harp and the voice of a psalm, and pay our vows in the house of the Lord.'

Hear him who cries out of the depths, and say, what are the strains of this sad plaint. 'Wo to the day in which I was born! Let that day be dark with the clouds of death. Let no voice of joy break in the night, and let us stars be dark; let it look for light but have none; nor let it see the dawn of day. My gray hairs shall go down in grief to the grave of my son, and there our heads shall be at rest. O, my son! my son! would to God I had died for thee; my son! my son!

INDIAN CRUELTY—A THRILLING INCIDENT.

An incident occurred at the Key Biscayne light house during the Florida war, which is perhaps worth recording. The light house was kept by a man named Thompson. His only companion was an old negro man; they both lived in a small hut near the light house. One evening about dark they discovered a party of some fifteen or twenty Indians creeping upon them, upon which they immediately retreated into the light house, carrying with them a keg of gunpowder, with the guns and ammunition.

From the windows of the light house Thompson fired upon them several times, but the moment he would show himself at the window, the glasses would instantly be riddled by rifle balls, and he had no alternative but to lie close.

The Indians meanwhile getting out of patience, at not being able to force the door, which Thompson had secured, collected piles of wood, which, being placed against the door and set fire to, in process of time not only burnt thro' the door, but also set fire to the staircase conducting to the lantern, into which Thompson and the negro were compelled to retreat. From this, too, they were finally driven by the encroaching flames, and were forced outside on the parapet wall, which was not more than three feet wide.

The flames now began to ascend as from a chimney some fifteen or twenty feet above the light house. These men had to lie in this situation, some seventy feet above the ground, with a blazing furnace roasting them on one side, and the Indians on the other embracing every occasion, as soon as any part of the body was exposed, to pop at them. The negro, incautiously exposing himself, was killed, while Thompson received several balls in his feet, which he had projected beyond the wall.

Nearly roasted to death, and in a fit of desperation, Thompson seized the keg of gunpowder, which he had still preserved to keep from the hands of the enemy, and threw it into the blazing light house, hoping to end his sufferings and destroy the savages. In a few moments it exploded, but the walls were too strong to be shaken, and the explosion took place out of the light house, as though it had been fired from their gun.

The effect of the concussion was to throw down the blazing materials level with the ground, so as to produce subsidence of the flames, and then Thompson was permitted to remain exempt from their influence. Before day the Indians were off, and Thompson being left alone, was compelled to throw off the body of the negro while strength was left him, before it putrefied.

The gunpowder was heard on board a revenue cutter at some distance, which immediately proceeded to the spot to ascertain what had occurred, when they found the light house burnt and the keeper above on top of it. Various expedients were resorted to, to get him down; and finally a kite was made and raised with strong twine, and so manoeuvred as to bring the line within his reach, to which a rope of good size was next attached and hauled up by Thompson.

Finally, a block, which being fastened to the light house, and having a rope to it, enabled the crew to haul up a couple of men, by whose aid Thompson was safely landed on terra firma.

The Indians had attempted to reach him by means of the lighting rod, to which they had attached thongs of buckskin, but could not succeed in getting more than half way up.—Charleston News.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,
THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1851.

We are under the necessity this week of getting out a half sheet, having been disappointed again in obtaining a supply of paper. We are also short of help, one of our hands having gone away on a visit, short of cash, and no editor, therefore our readers will excuse us if the paper is not as interesting as usual. Some of our indebted subscribers would much oblige us by sending on a little cash. The printers have hard times as well as other people. Do not forget us entirely in your hurry of business.

We learn from various sources that the wheat and potato crop in the northern part of Illinois and the southern part of Wisconsin has proved nearly a failure, which no doubt is true. The potato crop here we learn is somewhat damaged by rot, caused by the cold wet weather recently.

THE SELKIRK SETTLEMENT.

This settlement is about six hundred miles north-west from the falls of St. Anthony, in the British Possessions, on the Red river of the north. The distance from Selkirk to York Factory, on Hudson's Bay is about seven hundred miles. This is their seaport.

The annual caravans from the settlement arrived at St. Paul, Minnesota, about the 20th of July, consisting of 102 carts, for the most part, drawn each by one ox, and laden with buffalo skins, moccasins, buffalo tongues, pemmican, &c., which they exchange for merchandise suited to their wants. The train left Selkirk on the 4th of June, and usually occupies about three months in the entire trip.

A monthly mail has been established between St. Paul and Pembina, which is on this side, and near the boundary line between the United States and the British Possessions.

The Minnesota Democrat states that the population of Selkirk settlement is about seven thousand, including Indians. They raise large crops of barley, oats, spring wheat, potatoes, and all kinds of garden vegetable that grow in temperate latitudes.—They plant early in May. They usually have frost till the 1st of June, and again in September.—The corn crop is not relied upon—it is a precarious crop, though raised in every garden for table use.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, writes that this Government has determined that Hawaiian independence shall be respected by France; that the hostile interference of France in Hawaiian affairs shall not be tolerated, and that the United States will never permit the transfer of those interests to the control of any foreign power.

The cabinet came to a determination last week on these subjects, and the French Government will be speedily notified that its threatened hostile course against the Hawaiian Government will be resisted, even at the hazard of war; that the Hawaiian authorities and people ask protection from the United States and ultimate annexation to them. Should France persist in her course, it may lead to some very close political as well as commercial relations between the United States and the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. Rives, our Minister to France, has been written to upon the subject, and will make proper representation to the French Government of the feelings and intentions of this Government.

THE WORKING MAN.

A great mistake often made and fraught with the worst of consequences is, that labour is discreditable to a gentleman. Nature says there can be no gentleman without it. It is necessary to the existence—certainly to the perfection of the race in their proper relations here. It is necessary to wealth, comfort and happiness. It is the appointment of God himself. God made man a labourer. He made the labourer a gentleman, and the gentleman a labourer. It has been said that the devil made the gentleman, and this very vulgar expression is certainly graphic in truth whenever any man is tempted to believe that it is discreditable to work for a living, and that a gentleman is found by idleness.

Our day is distinguished for expedients to improve and advance the human race. This is well. The effort is a noble one—worthy of man; and this is saying enough. But, like the efforts of the day on all other subjects, there is a very strong tendency to fanaticism in the labours of those who seek human perfectibility by ordinary agencies and fictitious schemes. Here, too, men seek for the philosopher's stone, some catholicism—a panacea which is to work miracles—some high pressure expedient for making a gentleman without labour, and securing the avails of labour without industry. After men are starved into the truth they will find that nature cannot be well forced to make a gentleman—they must come in the regular way. As well might the doll maker attempt to compete with nature—he may make a pretty thing, but he produces no living, breathing, thinking, useful being. So fashion may make a gentleman out of any dandy that walks on two legs instead of four; but it is a thing only fit to show in the windows of a toy shop, and had much better be left there for fools to gaze at than to be put into the hands of a young lady.

Confer a real benefit, do something effectually to elevate the race, and make advances to the only real philosopher's stone which turns everything it touches into gold, whenever we do anything creditable to the man who engages in it. This we do whenever the labourer is made a scholar, and secures to himself the influence and respect which knowledge commands for the man who has it. This we do, too, when the labourer is cheered on to perseverance in his efforts, and attains the wealth which is the proper result of industry.

So men have been honoured, are honoured, must be honoured wherever they are found.—The man who has it, other things being equal, will exert a controlling influence. He triumphs over matter; he controls the mass of men—their minds as well as their physical force.—This it is that gives the great superiority to some men over others. They are sought out, and will occupy the highest place of society. When these powers are directed to the amelioration of human woes, those who exert and possess them become and are called benefactors. Their names are inscribed on the catalogue of honour and honourable men. They do their part and do much to render labour reputable. Let the mass of working men do their duty, and things will find their proper level—the order of nature will be restored in the estimate men place upon the different professions and occupations for life.

ORIGIN OF THE WORE "JOURNEYMAN."

There was at one time—perhaps there is still—a law in force in Germany which required all mechanics, at the expiration of their terms of apprenticeship, for a period of three years, to travel about from place to place, not being allowed to remain more than three months in any one place. They worked at their trade during their tramp, but if it became necessary they were assisted at the expense of the State. At the expiration of the three years, it being supposed that the wanderer had seen something of the world, he was allowed to settle down where he chose. Hence the word "journeyman."

TOTAL DEPRAVITY.

The Baltimore Patriot contains a letter from Utica, N. Y., dated the 10th ult., which says: "Our city police have recently brought to light one of the most extraordinary gangs of incendiaries that ever cursed a community.—Over $150,000 worth of property has been destroyed by some forty-three or four different fires during the past eighteen months, embracing stores, hotels, dwelling houses, ships, lumber yards and churches—all of which now turn out to have been set on fire by some five or six young men attached to two engine companies. I should perhaps except two small fires. The proof against them is sufficient, and their conviction is certain, and it is more than probable that they will plead guilty. Some instances have been arson in the first degree, which is punishable by death. The most remarkable feature in the whole transaction is the utter want of motive to prompt to such enormity.—The very men who put the torch to the buildings, worked the hardest at the fire. The only reason assigned by the guilty pirates is that they wanted a little fun and frolic, and that they went on undetected until they acquired a sort of mania for such excitement, as the French do for suicide."

SWEETNESS OF HOME.

He who has no home has not the pleasure of life, he feels not the endearments that cluster round that hallowed spot to fill the void of his aching heart, and while away his leisure moments in the sweetest of life's joys. Is misfortune your lot? you will find a friendly welcome from hearts beating true to your own.—The chosen partner of your toil has a smile of approbation when others have deserted, a hand to help when all others refuse, and a heart to feel your sorrows as her own. Perhaps a smiling cherub, with prattling glee and joyous laugh will drive all sorrow from your careworn brow and disclose it in the wreaths of domestic bliss.

No matter how humble the home be; how destitute its stores, or how poorly its inmates are clad, if true hearts dwell there, it is yet a home—a cheerful prudent wife, obedient and affectionate children, will give their possessors more joy than bags of gold and windy honour. The home of a temperate, industrious man will be his greatest joy. He comes to it "weary and worn," but the sound of the merry laugh and happy voice of childhood cheers him, and a plain but healthy meal awaits him. Envy, ambition and strife have no place there, with a clear conscience, he lays his weary limbs down to rest in the bosom of his family, and under the protecting care of the poor man's Friend and help.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Do all in your power to teach your children self-government. If a child is passionate, teach him by fair and gentle means, to cure his temper. If he is greedy, cultivate liberality in him. If he is selfish, promote generosity. If he is sulky, charm him out of it, by encouraging frank, good humour. If he is indolent, accustom him to exertion, and train him so as to perform even onerous duties with alacrity. If pride comes in to make his obedience reluctant, subdue him either by counsel or discipline. In short, give your children the habit of overcoming their besetting sins.

CHEAP BOARDING.

A thousand and one stories are told of the extreme cheapness of living in the Far West, but as to the way it is occasionally done, we were never aware until the matter was explained by the late Dan Marble.

"You keep boarders here, ma'am?" said an individual, addressing the landlady of a house, upon the door of which he saw "cheap boarding" painted.

"We do," was the reply.

"What do you charge a week?"

"For board without lodging, do you mean," inquired the lady.

"Yes ma'am."

"Fifty cents is our regular price."

"Well," rejoined the inquirer, "that's cheap enough, at any rate. Do you give your boarders much of a variety?"

"Yes sir, something of a variety. We give them dried apples for breakfast, warm water for dinner, and let them swell for supper!"

"Let go that jib—let go that jib, quick!" shouted the captain of a down east sloop to a raw hand in a squall.

"I ain't touching your darned old jib!" replied Jonathan indignantly, as he jammed his fists deeper into his trouser-looms.

"Well, Sambo, how do you like your new place?" "Oh, berry well, Massa." "What did you have for breakfast this morning?" "Why you see missis biled tree eggs for herself, and gib me de brof."

"Wont you take half of this poor apple?" said a pretty damsel to a witty swain. "No, I thank you; I would prefer a better half!" Eliza blushed and referred him to papa.

The following is from the pen of JOHN G. WHITTE, and is well worth a perusal.

THE DOCTOR'S MATCH-MAKING.

"Good morning Mrs. Barnet!" cried the Doctor, as we drew near a neat farm house, during one of our morning drives.

A tall, healthful young woman, in the bloom of matronly beauty, was feeding chickens at the door. She uttered an exclamation of delight and hurried towards us. Perceiving a stranger in the wagon she paused with a look of embarrassment.

"My friend, who is spending a few weeks with me," explained the Doctor.

She greeted me civilly, and pressed the Doctor's hand warmly.

"Oh, it is so long since you have called on us, that we have been talking of going up to the village to see you, as soon as Robert can get away from the corn field. You don't know how little Lucy has grown. You must stop and see her."

"She's coming to see me herself," replied the Doctor, beckoning to a sweet blue-eyed child in the door way.

The delighted mother caught up her darling and held her before the Doctor.

"Doesn't she look like Robert?" she inquired. "His very eyes and forehead! Bless me! here he is now."

A stout, hale, young farmer, in a coarse checked frock and broad straw hat, came up from the adjoining field.

"Well, Robert," said the Doctor, "how do matters stand with you? Well I hope."

"All right Doctor. We've paid off the last cent of the mortgage, and the farm is all free and clear. Julia and I have worked hard, but we're none the worse for it."

"You look well and happy, I am sure," said the Doctor. "I don't think you are sorry you took the advice of an old bachelor, after all."

The young wife's head drooped until her lips touched those of her child.

"Sorry!" exclaimed her husband, "not we! If there's anybody happier than we are within ten miles of us, I don't know them. Doctor, I'll tell you what I said to Julia the night I brought home that mortgage: 'well' said I, 'that debt's paid; but there's one debt we can never pay as long as we live!' 'I know it,' says she, 'but Dr. Singletary wants no better reward for his kindness than to see us live happily together, and do for others what he has done for us."

"Pshaw!" said the Doctor, "letting up his reins and whip. 'You owe me nothing. But I must not forget my errand. Poor old Widow Whiting needs a watcher to night, and she insists upon having Julia Barnet and nobody else. What shall I tell her?'"

"I'll go, certainly. I can leave Lucy now as well as not."

"Good bye, neighbors."

"Good bye, Doctor."

As we drove off, I saw the Doctor draw his hand hastily across his eyes, and he said nothing for some time.

"Public opinion," said he at length, as if pursuing his meditations aloud—"Public opinion is, in nine cases out of ten, public folly and impertinence. We are all slaves to one another. We dare not take counsel of our consciences and affections, but must needs suffer popular prejudice and custom to decide for us, and at their biddings are sacrificed love and friendship, and all the best hopes of our lives. We do not ask what is right and best for us, but what will folks say of it? We have no individuality, no self, no length, no sense of freedom. We are conscious always of the gaze of the many-eyed tyrant. We propitiate him with precious offerings; we burn incense perpetually to Molech, and pass through his fire the sacred first born of our hearts. How few dare to seek their own happiness by the lights which God has put in them, or have strength to resist the false pride and the prejudices of the world, and stand in the liberty of Christians! Can anything be more pitiable than the sight of so many who should be the choosers and creators under God of their own spheres of utility and happiness self-degraded into mere slaves of propriety and custom, their natures undeveloped, their hearts cramped and shut up; each afraid of his neighbor, and his neighbor of him, living a life of unreality, deceiving and being deceived, and for ever walking in a vain show? Here now we have just left a married couple who are happy because they have taken counsel of their honest affections, rather than of the opinions of the multitude, and have dared to be true to themselves in defiance of impertinent gossip."

"You allude to the young farmer Barnet and his wife," said I.

"Yes, I will give their case as an illustration. Julia Atkinson was the daughter of Ensign Atkinson, who lived on the mill road just above Deacon Warner's. When she was ten years old, her mother died; and in a few months afterwards her father married Polly Wiggin the tailoress, a shrewd, selfish, managing woman. Julia, poor girl, had a sorry time of it; for the Ensign, although a kind and affectionate man naturally, was too weak and yielding to interpose between her and his strong minded, sharp tongued wife. She had one friend however, who was always ready to sympathize with her. Robert Barnet was the son of her next door neighbor, about ten years older than herself; they had grown up together as school companions and playmates; and often in my drives I used to meet them coming home hand in hand, from school, or from the woods with berries and nuts, talking and laughing as if there were no scolding step-mothers in the world.

It so fell out that when Julia was in her sixteenth year, there came a famous writing master to Peewawkin. He was a showy, dashing fellow, with a fashionable dress, a wicked eye, and a tongue like the old serpent's when he tempted our great grandmother. Julia was one of his scholars, and perhaps the prettiest of them all. The rascal singled her out from the first, and the better to accomplish his purpose, he left the tavern, and took lodgings at the Ensign's. He soon saw how matters stood in the family, and governed himself accordingly, taking special pains to conciliate the ruling authority. The Ensign's wife hated young Barnet, and wished to get rid of her daughter-in-law. The writing master, therefore, had a fair field. He flattered the poor young girl by his attentions, and praised her beauty. Her moral training had not fitted her to withstand this seductive influence; no mother's love with its quick instinctive sense of danger threatening its object, interposed between her and the tempter. Her old friend and play mate—he who could alone have saved her—had been rudely repulsed from the house by her step-mother; and indignant and disgusted, he had retired from all competition with his formidable rival. Thus abandoned to her own undisciplined imagination, with the inexperience of a child and the passions of a woman, she was deceived by false promises, bewildered, fascinated, and beguiled into sin."

It is the same old story of woman's confidence, and man's duplicity. The rascally writing master, under pretence of visiting a neighboring town, left his lodging, and never returned. The last I heard of him, he was the tenant of a western penitentiary. Poor Julia, driven in disgrace from her father's house, found a refuge in the humble dwelling of an old woman of no very credible character. There I was called to visit her, and, although not unused to scenes of suffering and sorrow, I had never before witnessed such an utter abandonment to grief, shame, and remorse. Alas! what sorrow was like unto her sorrow. The birth hour of her infant was also that of its death.

The agony of her spirit seemed greater than she could bear. Her eyes were opened, and she looked upon herself with loathing and horror. She would admit of no hope; of no consolation; she would listen to no palliation or excuse of her guilt. I could only direct her to that source of pardon and peace to which the broken and contrite heart never appeals in vain.

In the mean time, Robert Barnet shipped on board a Labrador vessel. The night before he left, he called on me, and put in my hand a sum of money, small indeed, but all he could command.

"You will see her often," said he. "Do not let her suffer, for she is more to be pitied than blamed."

I answered him that I would do all in my power for her, and added that I thought far better of her, contrite and penitent as she was, than of some who were holding her up to shame and censure.

"God bless you for these words!" he said, grasping my hand. "I shall think of them often. They will be a comfort to me."

As for Julia God was more merciful to her than man. She rose from her sick bed thoughtful and humbled, but with hopes that transcended the world of her suffering and shame. She no longer murmured against her sorrowful allotment, but accepted it with quiet and almost cheerful resignation, as the fitting penalty of God's broken laws, and the needed discipline of her spirit. She could say with the Psalmist, "The judgments of the Lord are true, justified in themselves.—Thou art just, Oh Lord, and thy judgment is right." Through my exertions, she obtained employment in a respectable family, to whom she endeared herself by her faithfulness, cheerful obedience, and unaffected piety. Her trials had made her heart tender with sympathy for all in affliction.

She seemed evidently drawn towards the sick and suffering. In their presence, the burden of her sorrow seemed to fall off. She was the most cheerful and sunny-faced nurse I ever knew; and I always felt sure that my own efforts would be well seconded, when I found her by the bedside of a patient. Beautiful it was to see this poor young girl, whom the world still looked upon with scorn and unkindness, cheering the desponding, and imparting, as it were, her own strong, healthful life to the weak and faint; supporting through weary nights, the heads of those who in health, would have deemed her touch pollution; or to hear her singing for the ear of the dying, some sweet hymn of pious hope or resignation, or calling to mind the consolations of the gospel and the great love of Christ.

"I trust," said I, "that the feelings of the community were softened towards her."

"You know what human nature is," replied the Doctor; "and with what hearty satisfaction we abhor and censure sin and folly in others. It is a luxury which we cannot easily forego, although our own experience tells us that the consequences of vice and error are evil and bitter enough, without the aggravation of ridicule and reproach from without. So you need not be surprised to learn that, in poor Julia's case, the charity of sinners like herself did not keep pace with the mercy and forgiveness of Him, who is infinite in purity. Nevertheless, I will do our people the justice to say, that her blameless and self-sacrificing life was not without its effect upon them."

"What became of Robert Barnet?" I enquired.

"He came back after an absence of several months, and called on me before he had even seen his father and mother. He did not mention Julia, but I saw that his errand with me concerned her. I spoke of her excellent deportment and her useful life, dwelt upon the extenuating circumstances of her error, and of her sincere and hearty repentance."

"Doctor?" said he, at length, with a hesitating and embarrassed manner. "What should you think if I should tell you that, after all that has passed, I have made up my mind to ask her to become my wife?"

"I should think better of it if you had wholly made up your mind," said I; "and if you were my own son, I wouldn't ask for you a better wife than Julia Atkinson. Don't hesitate. Robert, on account of what some ill-natured people may say. Consult your own heart first of all."

"I don't care for the talk of all the busy bodies in town," said he, "but I wish father and mother could feel as you do about her."

"Leave that to me said I," said I; "they are kind hearted and reasonable, and I dare say will be disposed to make the best of the matter, when they find you are decided in your purpose."

"I did not see him again, but a few days after I learned from his parents that he had gone on another voyage. It was in autumn, and the most sickly season I have ever known in Peewawkin. Ensign Atkins and his wife both fell sick, and Julia embraced with alacrity this providential opportunity to return to her father's house, and fulfil the duties of a daughter. Under her careful nursing, the Ensign soon got upon his feet; but his wife, whose constitution was weaker, sunk under the fever. She died better than she had lived, penitent and loving, asking forgiveness of Julia for her neglect and unkindness, and invoking blessings on her head. Julia had now for the first time since the death of her mother a comfortable home, and a father's love and protection. Her sweetness of temper, patient endurance, and forgetfulness of herself in her labors for others, gradually overcame the scruples and hard feelings of her neighbors. They began to question whether, after all, it was meritorious in them to treat one like her as a sinner beyond forgiveness. Elder Stables and Deacon Warner were her fast friends. The Deacon's daughters—the tall, blue eyed, brown locked girls you noticed in meeting the other day—set the example among the young people of treating her as their equal and companion. The dear good girls! they reminded me of the maidens of Naxos, cheering and comforting the unhappy Ariadne.

One midsummer evening, I took Julia with me to a poor sick patient of mine, who was suffering for lack of attendance. The house where she lived was in a lonely and desolate place, some two or three miles below us, on a sandy level just elevated above the great salt marshes, stretching far away to the sea. The night set in dark and stormy; a fierce northeasterly wind swept over the level waste, driving thick snow clouds before it, shaking the doors and windows of the old house, and roaring in its vast chimney. The woman was dying when we arrived, and her drunken husband was sitting in stupid unconcern in the corner of the fire-place. A little after midnight she breathed her last.

"In the mean time the storm had grown more violent; there was a blinding snow-fall in the air and we could feel the jar of the great waves as they broke upon the beach."

"It is a terrible night for sailors on the coast," said I, breaking our long silence with the dead, "God grant them serenity!"

Julia shuddered as I spoke, and by the diminishing fire-light I saw that she was weeping. Her thoughts, I knew, were with her old friend and playmate, on the wild waters.

"Julia," said I, "do you know that Robert Barnet loves you with all the strength of an honest and true heart?"

She trembled, and her voice faltered as she confessed that when Robert was at home, he had asked her to become his wife.

"And like a fool you refused him, I suppose—the brave generous fellow!"

"Oh, Doctor!" she exclaimed, "how can you talk so? It is just because Robert is so good, and noble, and generous, that I dared not take him at his word. You yourself Doctor, would have despised me if I had taken advantage of his pity or kind remembrance of the old days when we were children together. I have already brought too much disgrace upon those dear to me."

I was endeavoring to convince her, in reply, that she was doing injustice to herself, and wronging her best friend, whose happiness, in a great measure, depended upon her, when, borne upon the strong blast, we both heard a faint cry, as of a human being in distress. I threw up the window, which opened seaward, and we leaned out into the wild night, listening breathlessly for a repetition of the sound. Once more, and once only, we heard it—a low, smothered, despairing cry.

"Some one is lost, and perishing in the snow," said Julia. "The sound comes in the direction of the beach plum bushes on the side of the marsh. Let us go at once."

She snatched up her hood and shawl, and was already at the door. I found and lighted a lantern, and soon overtook her. The snow was already deep and badly drifted, and it was with extreme difficulty that we could force our way against the storm. We stopped often to take breath and listen; but the roaring of the wind and waves was alone audible. At last we reached a slightly elevated spot, overgrown with dwarf plum trees, the branches of which were dimly visible above the snow.

"Here, bring the lantern here!" cried Julia, who had strayed a few yards from me. I hastened to her, and found her lifting up the body of a man who was apparently insensible. The rays of the lantern fell upon his face, and we both in the same instant, recognized Robert Barnet. But, kneeling in the snow, and still supporting the body, she turned towards me a look of earnest and fearful inquiry.

"Courage!" said I, "he still lives. He is only overcome with fatigue and cold."

With much difficulty—partly carrying and partly dragging him through the snow—we succeeded in getting him to the house, where, in a short time, he so far recovered as to be able to speak. Julia, who had been my prompt and efficient assistant in his restoration, retired into the shadow of the room as soon as he began to rouse himself and look about him. He asked where he was, and who was with me—saying that his head was so confused that he thought he saw Julia Atkins by the bed-side. "You were not mistaken," said I "Julia is here, and you owe your life to her." He started up and gazed round the room. I beckoned Julia to the bed-side; and I shall never forget the grateful earnestness with which he grasped her hand, and called upon God to bless her. Some folks think me a tough-hearted old fellow, and so I am; but that scene was more than I could bear without shedding tears. Robert told us that his vessel had been thrown upon the beach a few miles below, and that he feared all the crew had perished save himself.

Assured of his safety, I went out once more, in the faint hope of hearing the voice of some survivor of the disaster; but I listened only to the heavy thunder of the surf rolling along the horizon of the East. The storm had in a great measure ceased; the gray light of dawn was just visible, and I was gratified to see two of the nearest neighbors approaching the house. On being informed of the wreck, they immediately started for the beach, where several dead bodies, half buried in the snow, confirmed the fears of the solitary survivor.

The result of all this you can easily conjecture. Robert Barnet abandoned the sea, and with the aid of some of his friends, purchased the farm where he now lives, and the anniversary of his shipwreck found him the husband of Julia. I can assure you I have reason to congratulate myself on my share in the match-making. Nobody ventured to find fault with it except two or three sour old busybodies, who, as Elder

Staples well says, "would have cursed her whom Christ had forgiven, and spurned the weeping Magdalen from the feet of her Lord."

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,
THURSDAY, MARCH 18, 1852.

THE SALT LAKE SETTLEMENT.

There occurred last summer between the Mormons at Salt Lake, and the officers of the U. S. government, sent out to rule them, a most serious difficulty, several rumors of which reached us before the close of navigation. We have not at any time seen a collected detail of the difficulty. But it appears that after the Territory of Utah was partially organized by the appointment of Brigham Young, Governor, and some other leading Mormons to some of the highest offices in the Territory, the President saw fit to appoint several persons having no connection with the Mormons, and no particular good will for them, to the judicial and various other offices of the Territory. These went out in the summer with their year's salary, and a heavy outfit paid in advance. On arriving at Utah some of them held public meetings in which they lectured the people, as a pedagogue would the same number of half grown boys and girls, on their alleged delinquencies and immoralities. They do not complain that they were not heard through attentively and without interruption. But they received no vote of thanks, and it was evident that the people felt insulted.

A controversy grew up between the officers who were, and those were not Mormons, concerning the control of the public funds; which being decided by the judges, not Mormons, against the Mormons, they quietly submitted. It is charged however, that they, in various subsequent meetings, spoke disrespectfully of General Taylor, late President, and expressed the opinion that he was not fit for the kingdom of God; an opinion certainly not very uncommon among that class of politicians who thought his nomination, not fit to be made.

They are also charged with hostile intentions towards the U. S.; with preaching sedition, and threatening rebellion, and with universal immorality and countless crimes against social good order.

Some rumors have gone so far as to say they had proceeded to acts of violence, robbing the emigrants, and putting the officers of the government in fear, and in effect driving them from the settlement, and threatening to resist any officers sent among them who are not of themselves.

It is not for us, who have no connection with the Salt Lake Mormons, and are not treated with common courtesy by them, to defend them. Yet we cannot but have an opinion on these matters, and perhaps, more means of judging accurately than most men. Common wrongs ought to produce common sympathy, and does with us, if not with them.

We say, then, we believe this out cry against them is unjustifiable and wicked. We do not believe that the Salt Lake Mormons have been guilty of any high handed offence against the United States. We do not believe that they have any general criminal purpose, or that crime more rife among them than in any other part of the U. S. Should any one go upon the ground, he would there learn that the struggle was for the possession of a country, where Mormon law's have made roads, constructed bridges, built houses, and set mills in operation. As usual, other men have followed in the footsteps of the Mormons, and after they have done the labor wish to rob them of its fruits. We shall not be in the least disappointed, to hear of a formidable attempt to dispossess them of the Salt Lake Valley. God grant that it may terminate as the late vindictive attempt against this place.

But however such a movement may effect the Mormons, it will be unfortunate to all who engage in it. Time was that all Mormons felt a deep attachment to the American government. Whether native or alien born, their faith taught them to revere the American nation as the instrument of God, in preparing the way for the dispensation of the fullness of times, and all were proud of the name "American citizen."

But that time has gone, never to return. Whatever good they look for, growing out of the peculiarities of the American institutions, they expect on persecution, malice, and ill-will, from people and government. All Mormons, without exception, have a lively consciousness of the deep and unpalliated wrongs they have received from the American nation. All look for the repetition of those wrongs. And if any of them pretend to any especial attachment to the American government, the pretense is merely hypocritical. They do not feel it; and he who makes the most pretensions at the political forum, will be found most rancorous in the unwatched pulpit.

But it does not follow therefore that they will rebel against the government, or commit treason against the nation. They are fools who fear any such event, and were it not that the public maw has digested falsehoods still more ridiculous, we should expect to hear such an assertion nowhere out side of a mad-house. The entire population of Salt Lake Valley probably does not exceed 5,000. That a people, so few in numbers, should undertake to throw off the authority of the U. S. government and defy the power of the nation, is so entirely improbable, that the Federal officer who comes home with such a report, ought to be sent to the hospital for the insane, rather than the department of the Interior.

We presume the punishment invoked against the Mormons, will be the abolishing of legal government in Utah, as was done at Nauvoo, when the politicians of Illinois sought to provoke them to some act, which might be made an excuse for outrage and violence.

Should this be done, and then a horde of robbers press upon them to drive them out of the Valley, and take their lands as they did twice in Missouri, and once in Illinois, they may drive them from their towns, but they cannot from the fastness of the mountains. They have yielded a home for the last time. The feeling of revenge was suppressed with difficulty when they left Nauvoo. A thousand farmers, all of American blood, for the fourth time made houseless, would be rough neighbors to the Frontier. We pity the man who should plant himself in their deserted Valley. We know it is possible to produce such a state of things that the overland emigrants will track their path in blood from the confines of Nebraska, to the Sierra Nevada. That a thousand men of the most energetic character, to be speedily joined by thousands of others like themselves, may be made houseless and homeless, by a band of robbers and driven from their settlements, to become the terror of emigrant and settler from the Gulf of California, to Nootka sound is both possible and probable. But that the Mormons should cease to occupy and rule large portions of Utah, is, to us so utterly improbable, that we find it difficult to speak of it as a possibility.

They well know how much sympathy is felt by the public, and expressed in the Newspaper Press for their persecutors; how little for them. Well do they know that though only a band of wretches, destitute of character, may attack them, the great body of the people, set them on, and triumph in their success. Whatever may occur, they look for no protection from the United States. To God and their own hands only do they look for protection.

From among our exchanges we have clipped the following, the latter floating without credit, but the former from the Rochester Democrat of January 15th.

THE MORMONS IN UTAH.

It is undoubtedly a matter of concern to every lover of good order, morality and religion, that a sect holding such principles as the disciples of Joseph Smith should not only exist, but grow and strengthen itself in the midst of this Republic, in a day when enlightenment and Christianity are so broad-spread. But we are doomed to have errors and wickedness side by side with truth and piety. Such is the decree of that Providence which governs all events. The Mormons systematize and license licentiousness by local laws; in every community the same exists, but hides itself in darkness; sometimes indeed palliated by those who reprobate it in general by neglecting to punish the guilty, and even receiving the transgressor into honest society. Such things as, however, by some means given a coloring hides the real enormity of the thing; and we are expected to abide with the sinful, who brought forward and patronized by influential associations. The Mormons pursue an open course, and not only legalize the enormity, but throw over it the sanction of their mis-called religious faith. Christendom is outraged by such a thing; but the remedy is not attempted, otherwise than by resort to measures of hostility and outrage against the sect. By means not recognized under our laws, the Mormons have been driven from place to place, until they have sought an asylum in the heart of a wilderness, choosing always most admirable locations for their towns, and exhibiting industry and thrift. We are not advised that they are dishonest in their conduct with each other or the strangers who go among them. With the exception of the one peculiar dark stain, they are as correct as their neighbors. They reject the Bible, which is the foundation of good government and every good thing. But in this they are not worse than other proscribed sects who separate from the world to enjoy their own distinctive opinions.—We say this not to make any lighter the condemnation which the public judgment has passed upon the strange votaries of a monstrous belief. But we fancy there

IMMORTALITY AND ETERNAL LIFE OF THE MATERIAL BODY.

If we can give an example of a material organization of flesh and bones, actually rescued from the dominion of death and the grave, and made immortal, and capable of eternal existence, then the immortality of the body is clearly established, and the same example will form a precedent from which, (reasoning from analogy,) we may draw a safe conclusion as to the redemption of all others, especially if we have direct and positive promises to that effect.

SUCH WAS JESUS CHRIST, THE CRUCIFIED AND RISEN SAVIOUR. It was not enough that he should die for the sins of the world, but he must also rise from the dead. Christ Jesus and him crucified, would never have been preached by Peter, Paul or any one else, as glad tidings of salvation if he had not risen from the dead. A gloomy solemn silence brooded over all nature, and the once eloquent tongues of the apostles themselves were staid with grief, and their lips sealed with sadness, and the death gloom of despair hung upon their brows, and settled in deep desponding melancholy upon their hearts, till, on a sudden, they "were begotten unto a lively hope by the resurrection of their Master from the dead." When they first saw him, they, (like the mystics of modern times,) supposed it was only a spirit: they seemed to have no idea of a physical or material salvation, or existence beyond the grave. But, like Socrates, Plato, Confucius, and other heathen philosophers they thought of nothing more than a spiritual existence.

But judge their surprise, joy, and wonder, when he exclaimed, "handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have."

Here was an end of mysticism; here was a material salvation; here was flesh and bones, immortal and celestial, prepared for eternal bloom in the mansions of glory; and this demonstrated by the sense of seeing, feeling, and hearing.

The apostles not only handled him and examined his wounds, but ate, drank, walked, and conversed with him, and found him every way adapted and qualified for an active and useful life, and for an enlarged sphere of action, as a king, lawgiver, priest, mediator, judge and conqueror, and preacher of the gospel. Hitherto his labors had been confined to Judea, and to his own kindred people in that small province which gave him birth.

Unfettered from the bonds of mortality and death, and clothed with organs strong and lasting as the immortal mind, and no longer governed by the laws of this limited sphere of action, he could speed his way to distant continents and islands, beyond the towering waves and boisterous storms of the ocean; and there in other tribes and tongues make known the glad tidings of immortality and eternal life. Or speeding his way to the abodes of spirits, he could there preach deliverance to the captive and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, and thus bind up the broken hearted, and comfort all those that mourn. Or taking leave of earth with all its cares and sorrows, and of the dark regions of the unhappy dead, once dark but now illuminated with a ray of hope, he could speed his way to the mansions of his Father, and sit down on his throne, as the joy of better worlds, till the times of restoration should call him again to earth, to reign on the throne of his father David, and to take the universal government of the purchased possession, as King over all the earth.

His disciples, being by tangible evidence now delivered from mysticism, and made to realise in the most lively manner, a real and substantial salvation from sin, death, hell, and the grave, were filled with joy, as intense as was their sorrow; and were now prepared, when the appointed time should arrive, to be the bearers of the glad tidings indeed, to a dark and benighted world; a world who through fear of death had been all their lifetime subject to bondage. They not only preached Jesus Christ and him crucified; but they testified of his resurrection, and that he would change our vile bodies, and fashion them like unto his glorious body.

What is it my friends which makes us unhappy? Why do we mourn? and why are our souls sorrowful? In short, why does all creation groan in pain together? The answer is—sin—sickness, pain, and death. These, together with our sins, weigh us down in gloom and sorrow till we think a visitor from a world of eternal life would hardly be able to look upon our world and contemplate the scene for a moment.

What kind of salvation do we need? I reply, we need salvation from death and the grave, as well as from our sins. And we have now shown clearly that this is the salvation provided and brought to light by the gospel; a salvation not only of our spirits, but of our body and parts of our flesh and bones, of our hands, feet and head, with every organ, limb and joint. What kind of salvation does the earth need, in order to fit it for the abode of immortal man? I answer, it needs a redemption from the withering curse of sin, and a restoration to its paradisaical state. The inquiry now arises whether this salvation will be universal as it relates to the body; to which I answer in the affirmative, as proved by the texts before quoted. This gives rise to another inquiry, viz: whether all who rise from the dead will be equally happy? to this I answer so. After the resurrection of the body, men are to be judged according to their works; and will enjoy that which they are prepared to enjoy. For instance, our works determine the time of our rising, as well as the enjoyments we shall possess. We read, Rev. xx, that there will be a first resurrection, enjoyed by the blessed and holy, while the rest of the dead will not rise till a thousand years afterwards.

Again, we read that among the servants of God one man is made ruler over ten cities; another over five; another over none; notwithstanding they all rise from the dead.

In the resurrection, and the life to come, men that are prepared will possess a material inheritance on this earth. They will possess houses, cities, and villages, gold, silver, and precious stones, food and raiment; and will eat, drink, converse, think, walk, taste smell and enjoy. They will also sing, preach, teach, learn and investigate; play on musical instruments, and enjoy all the pure delights of domestic felicity. While each can, like the risen Jesus, take his friend by the hand and say; "handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have."

We now proceed to examine the writings of the prophets and apostles on this subject, in order to show that a material existence in the flesh, upon the earth, in their glorified and risen bodies, was the doctrine uniformly taught and embraced by holy men of old; and that they all lived and died, in the hope of no other, than a material immortality and eternal life.

To begin at the fountain head, let me say that God the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is every where in the scripture revealed as a being possessing a bodily organization in all its parts. He is said to have head, eyes, ears, mouth, nose, nostrils, face, arms, fingers, back-parts, feet and all other parts. It is also said that man was made in his likeness and image.

Jesus Christ is also represented to be the express image of his person. From all these facts we learn that God the Father, has a real and substantial existence in human form and proportions, like Jesus Christ, and like man. Men's precepts would carry the idea that it was the "moral image" only, and not the physical likeness of Deity, that man was formed to represent. But as we find no such term in the scriptures as "moral image;" and as we presume God has no immoral images or likenesses, and that his features, shape or form, which is said to be like Jesus, and like man, therefore we can only judge of his existence by the pattern which represents him. But it is said that "God is a spirit." This is often quoted to prove that he does not exist in a personal or bodily form. But I would inquire of such, what is a spirit? Is there such a being as an individual intelligence in personal form, without flesh and bones, and without the grosser properties of matter which are tangible to our senses, or touch? We freely admit there is. For such are we, while our bodies are in the grave. But who shall say that an individual spirit of this kind, is not an organized personage of a proper shape, form and proportions; and who shall say they are not composed of matter, although of a more subtle and refined nature than we are prepared fully to comprehend, while moving in our present sphere? The fact is, mortal man knows but a very little in regard to the more refined properties of matter as it approaches the confines of spirituality and approximates towards its highest state of refinement, in order to form those links which connect it with mind, or with intelligence. Suffice it to say, that reason and experience teaches that every individual intelligence, must have a definite centre and circumference, definite form and shape, and must therefore occupy a certain point in space. And therefore to say that an individual intelligence really exists, "whose centre is every where and his circumference no where;" or even to assert that an individual intelligence can personally occupy two distinct places at the same time is worse than nonsense; it is folly in the extreme. It is clearly manifest that Jesus Christ himself cannot occupy more than one place at a time, in person. And we believe it is admitted on all hands, that he partakes of all the fullness of the God-head, and has the same power as his father; and is glorified with the same glory. Indeed, in his prayer to the Father, he admits that they are not one, and he prays that his disciples may be one with them as they are one. Now, if the father's centre is every where and his circumference no where, then Jesus Christ is the same; and if the father and Son are thus, then all his disciples must in turn have their centre every where and their circumference no where, in order to be one, as they are one. Again, if the Father is without body or parts, then the son must also be without body and parts in order to be like him; and if the Father and Son are thus, then his disciples must be without body and parts, in order that the prayer may be answered, which was, that father and son and his disciples might be one in the same sense of the word. What a world of mystery has been thrown over the subject of the oneness of the father and the son, when the simple truth is this; they are one in the same sense of the word, that all of the children of God are required to be one; that is, one by perfect agreement. "God is a spirit," so is Jesus Christ a spirit, and so are we spirits. But then some spirits are associated and connected with bodies of flesh and bones, and some are not. But all intelligent beings have a personal identity, and embodiment; whether it be of flesh and bones, or of some substance more refined. The only difficulty remaining to be solved is this, how or in what sense can an organized intelligent being be every where present?

The omnipresence of God is the necessary consequence of his sovereignty. The very idea of his sovereignty implies presence, not in person, but in power wherever this sovereignty exists. God is every where present in his sovereign power. He is every where able to see, and to exert his power both to cause, to guide, and to prevent. Not only by his angels who minister unto him throughout the universe, and his priesthood which ministers to him throughout the earth, but by his person exercising his omnipotence throughout space, his presence is every where.

The Sun is here present by his light. By his light he illuminates distant stars. Wherever his light is, there by it he is present. Still he is not everywhere. But there is no place where God is not present by all his attributes, and by them all exercises his sovereignty.

This in God's sovereignty is a fact, a living active truth. With man the same thing exists in theory, if not in truth. In theory the king of England is present throughout the empire. The records of the court of king's Bench always recite that the court sat in the presence of the king. The processes purport to issue from him, and they are returnable nominally whosoever the king shall be, though in fact regularly returned at the same place, because in his sovereignty he is ever present. The person summoned to answer &c., before the king on the morrow of the festival of saint Hilday does not suspect for a moment that he is to inquire where the king's presence is on that day that he may obey that mandate. He goes to the court of king's Bench at Westminster Hall, though he well knows the king's person is at Windsor Castle. Yet feeling himself in the king's presence, and I may add feeling equally sure that he is in the presence of God, whose person he is quite as certain is in heaven, for he invariably there takes an oath the formula of which is "you do solemnly swear in the presence of Almighty God &c." This use of language, speaking of him as present, who is present in sovereignty, is universal, and it is to us surprising that it should have been questioned.

But to return to the examination of the prophets and apostles, on the subject of man's material existence and inheritance in the life to come. As Job is one of the most ancient writers, let us commence with his testimony. Job, what say you? did you look for a material existence on the earth after the resurrection, or otherwise? Ans. "I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." Job xix, 25, 26.

Let the Psalmist next speak: come David, speak out and tell us what you know on this subject: "The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever." Psa. xxxvii. 29. Solomon, are you of the same mind of your father? If so, speak. "The upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it." Prov. ii, 21. Isaiah, your turn comes next; what do you testify? "Thy people shall all be righteous; they shall inherit the land for ever." Isa. lx, 21. "For as the new heaven and the new earth which I will make shall remain before me saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me saith the Lord." Isa. lxvi, 23, 23. Ezekiel, as you are a witness in this case, please relate to us whether any thing was revealed to you in regard to the resurrection of the material body, and its final residence on the earth.

"So I prophesied as I was commanded, and as I prophesied there was a noise, and behold a shaking and the bones, came together, bone to a bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews, and flesh came upon them, and the skin covered them above. And the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army. Thus saith the Lord God, behold O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit in you, and you shall live; and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children, and their children's children forever; and my servant David shall be their prince forever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them, and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore." Ezekiel, xxxvii. We will now dismiss this witness who has spoken to the point and call on Daniel.

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." Daniel, xii. 2. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the saints of the Most High." Daniel, vii, 27. Very well Daniel. Now here comes little Hosea to give his voice with the rest. Hear him.

"I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction." Hosea, xiii, 14. Now let us hear Zachariah.

"And his (the Lord's) feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east. And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee. And the Lord shall be king over all the earth; in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one. All the land shall be tilled as a plain, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem; and it shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place from Benjamin's gate, unto the place of the first corner gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-presses. And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited. And it shall be that whosoever will not come up of all the families of the land unto Jerusalem to worship the king, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain." Zach., xiv.

Having selected a few out of many of the most important witnesses on this subject from the Old Testament, we will now proceed to an examination of New Testament witnesses, beginning with Jesus Christ: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." "Thou shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke, i, 31, 32. "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." "The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second is the Lord from heaven." "As is the earthy, such are they that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly." "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." "Now this I say brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." 1st Cor., xv, 42, 50.

So numerous are the testimonies of the apostles in regard to the resurrection of the material body, that we do not deem it expedient to quote them at large, but will submit the case to the judgment of our readers, with a single remark on one passage. "Flesh and blood," says the Apostle, "cannot inherit the kingdom of God." Now if he had said that flesh and bones could not inherit the kingdom of God, then he would have excluded a risen Saviour therefrom, together with all those who are to rise from the dead in his image, and in the fashion of his glorious body. The fact should be carefully borne in mind, that while the prophets and apostles every where speak of flesh and bones, and sometimes even of skin and sinews, in connection with the resurrection, they nowhere speak of a restoration of the blood to the physical system, but always substitute the word spirit. Hence we conclude that the immortal body in its new organization is quickened by a fluid called spirit, which emanates from God, and is as pure that it renovates the system, and fills it with eternal life and vigor. While the natural body and spiritual body are alike composed of flesh and bones, etc., the one is quickened by the blood, and the other by spirit only. And this seems to constitute the principal difference between them. Having now examined the highest authorities on the earth, as far back as ancient Job, and down through all former dispensations, and having proved that they all agree in the expectation of a material resurrection and an everlasting possession on the earth; we will soar to the heavens and for a moment listen to the songs of beings who have bid farewell to this vale of tears, and who dwell in the immediate presence of God and the Lamb, and see whether they have altered their minds on this subject since their exit from time into eternity. "And they sung a new song, saying:

"Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us, to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people and nation; and hast made us unto our God, Kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v, 9, 10.

ploring, conversing, searching, and forming an acquaintance with God and his works. He will be able to receive and impart that finish of education and knowledge which only buds in time; but blossoms and ripens in eternity. While the continued and ceaseless exertions of creative goodness will, by the acquisition of new creations, form a sufficient field for the exercise of his priestly and kingly powers; and thus fulfil the prediction on the head of Jesus, as recorded by the prophet Isaiah, "of the increase of his kingdom and government there shall be no end."

MUSIC IN THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

In 1833 a trial occurred in the "Court of King's Bench," between two publishers of music, as to an alleged piracy by one of the parties, of a new arrangement of the old song, "The Old English Gentleman."

Sir James Scarlet was counsel for one of the parties litigant, and Tom Cook, the musical composer, was a witness called by the opposite party. As in professional honour and duty bound, Sir James cross examined Tom in the sharp and flippant manner following;

Sir James—"Now sir, you say that the two melodies are the same but different. What do you mean by that sir?" Tom—"I said that the notes in the two copies were alike, but with a different accent, the one being in common time, the other in six eight time; and consequently the position of the accented notes was different."

Sir James—"What is a musical accent?" Tom—"My terms are a guinea a lesson, sir." (A loud laugh.) Sir James, (rather muffled)—"Never mind your terms here. I ask you what is a musical accent. Can you see it?" Tom—"No."

Sir James—"Can you feel it?" Tom—"A musician can." (Great laughter.) Sir James, (very angry)—"Now, pray sir, don't beat about the bush, but explain to his lordship (Lord Densmore was the judge) and the jury, who are supposed to know nothing about music, the meaning of what you call accent."

Tom—"Accent in music is a certain stress laid upon a peculiar note, in the same manner as you would lay a stress upon any given word for the purpose of being better understood. Thus, if I were to say, 'You are an ass,' it rests on ass, but if I were to say, 'You are an ass,' it rests on you, Sir James."

Reiterated shouts of laughter by the whole court, in which the bench itself joined, followed this repartee. Silence having been at length obtained, the judge, with much seeming gravity, accented the chop fallen counsel thus:

Lord Densmore—"Are you satisfied, Sir James?" Sir James (who, deep red as he naturally was, to use poor Jack Reeve's great huff said, "The scarlet,") in a low down, witness may go he did, amidst renewed laughter, in which all joined, particularly the learned brother, except one who did not see any joke in the matter.

"Homestead Exemption!" exclaimed an Nipple, throwing down the paper. "Come to a pretty pass, indeed, that men going to exempt themselves from home when they please without any proviso for nights."

A TOURNAMENT IN THE WILDERNESS.

BY JOHN MILLS.

The following narrative surpasses in thrilling interest the scenes of chivalric days:

In a close line our party continued to advance brandishing their lances, and, from time to time, giving vent to the most discordant cries which met with a ready response on the part of the enemy in their war-whoop of defiance. It seems, indeed, necessary for the savage, when going to fight, to excite his courage by shouts and yells, and those primitive means are doubtless productive of a corresponding effect with the white warrior's drum and spirit-stirring fife.

With as noble a bearing as a knight of old when about to tilt for his "lady's love," Black Wolf sat upon his horse and led the van as became a chief of the Osages. With that love for display, which is an innate passion with the Indian, he pulled his horse's neck into a curve, and keeping a pair of antique Spanish rowels pricking against his flank, proudly curveted him at the head of his troop, "trimm'd like a yonker prancing to his love."

We had now approached so near to the Pawnee band that momentarily I expected to see them sweep toward us; as in Indian warfare neither side wait with the coolness, which well disciplined courage can only inculcate, to receive the others charge, and each brave is free to fight on his own plan, or any mode which the impulse of the moment may direct.

Much, however, to my surprise, a solitary warrior singled himself from his party, and with something white flying at the head of a lance, approaching at a foot pace. The Osages instantly checked their horses to the command of their chief, and unattended he rode forward to meet the messenger of peace.

I may here remark upon the singularity that the flag of truce—a piece of white buffalo skin—should be adopted by those sons of the wilderness similar in color to our own. The copy doubtless, was taken from the pale faces upon learning that the emblems met with such inviolable respect; but the Indians deny this, and avow that their fathers regarded it as a signal for peace before the great canoes came across the great lake. In support of this it is worthy of observation that the skin of the white buffalo—a most rare prize—is held in great reverence by them.

The conference was brief between the Pawnee and Black Wolf, and the latter, riding back to where we stood watching their movements, with an interest easier to be conceived than described, informed his brethren in arms that the Pawnee chief was willing to settle the fight in single combat, and that he himself would meet either of the Osage braves who might be chosen the champion of his nation.

This plucky challenge created the wildest commotion among the aspiring warriors of our party, and so numerous were the volunteers and urgent their claims to have the honor assigned them, that unless Black Wolf had settled the contention by claiming it for himself, it is far from improbable that a new diversion might have arisen in mutiny against his orders. There was no disputing, however the right of the chief to take the precedence of all; but the opinions veered to the opposite point, concerning the policy of the measure, when they found that they were to take no share in the glory. The greater number urged the expediency of a general fight, alledging that we were stronger than the enemy, and should capture all their horses and skins, which they were laden like ourselves, in addition to a pretty haul of invaluable scalps.

Black Wolf, however, either from prudential motives, or a desire to gratify his own vanity, decided to accept the challenge on the terms on which it was sent, and agreed that the horse and accoutrements of the vanquished should become the prize of the victor, which he was to take unmolested possession of in the presence of the respective parties.

These preliminaries being adjusted, the arms of Black Wolf were now carefully examined by his companions, who threw aside all jealousy the moment the question was settled. One took his lance and tried the soundness of the shaft by bending it so as the two ends nearly met. Another thumbed his bowstring, while several changed their best arrows for those in his quiver which appeared defective. The touch-hole of his rifle was pricked and re-primed, and even the knife and tomahawk underwent careful scrutiny. The honor of the nation was at stake, and the breast of each individual present seemed to burn with patriotic pride and solicitude for the event which was to decide the fate of the Osage or Pawnee chief.

All being in readiness, Black Wolf dashed his spurs into his horse's sides, and bringing him upon his haunches by way of a start, galloped in a wide circle before us for the combined purposes of exhibiting himself, and announcing to his enemy that he

HOSPITAL.

An Ordinance for the establishment of a Hospital.

At the annual Township meeting of the Township of Peaine for the year 1852, held at the house of Marvin M. Aldrich on the 5th day of April 1852.—

It is ordained by the inhabitants of said Township, in Township meeting assembled:—

§. 1. That there be established in said Township, and constantly kept, up, and provided with necessary fixtures, furniture, and utensils, for the reception of persons having smallpox, and other diseases, which may be dangerous to the public health, one hospital.

§. 2. The hospital shall be located on such lot as the supervisor shall select, on Whiskey Point, remote from any house occupied at the time of its location.

§. 3. It shall be the duty of the Supervisor of the Township to provide suitable buildings, with the necessary fixtures, furniture, and utensils, at the expense of the Township: and if in his opinion the interest of the Township will be promoted thereby, he may procure a title to a suitable lot of land, and cause permanent buildings to be erected thereon, from time to time as he shall deem necessary for such hospital.

§. 4. The conducting and management of such hospital shall be entrusted to the board of health of the Township, and such officers and persons as they shall appoint, for that purpose.

§. 5. All accounts for expenditures in executing this ordinance shall be audited by the Township board and on their warrant paid by the Treasurer.

CHAPTER III.

DOGS.

An Ordinance for regulating and licensing Dogs.

At the annual Township meeting of the Township of Peaine for the year 1852, held at the house of Marvin M. Aldrich the fifth day of April 1852:—

It is ordained by the inhabitants of said

Township, in Township meeting assembled,

§. 1. That no male or female Dog shall be kept or suffered to go at large in said Township by any inhabitant thereof, or any other person, except Dogs owned by Indians residing on Garden Island, and kept thereon: unless the person keeping, or letting go at large such Dog, shall first obtain a license therefor in the manner herein after provided.

§. 2. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of the foregoing section, shall incur a penalty of five dollars for every male or female Dog which he shall keep or let go at large in said Township contrary to the provisions of this ordinance: and an additional penalty of fifty cents for every day he shall keep or suffer to go at large such Dog after the first day, and any inhabitant of the Township may kill such Dog.

§. 3. The Supervisor shall have power upon the conditions and subject to the regulations contained in this ordinance, to grant licences to any of the inhabitants of the Township to keep one or more Dogs on payment of two dollars for each Dog for which he shall obtain licence. But such license shall not authorise any person to allow such Dog to go at large in such Township.

§. 4. And no such license shall be granted unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Supervisor that the person applying therefor has need of such Dog for some useful and lawful purpose: and such license shall express on its face that such Dog is not to go at large.

§. 5. It shall be the duty of the person so licensed to keep such Dog at all times either safely and securely chained up in his own enclosure; or safely and securely shut up in his own enclosure; or in the immediate custody of some person able to restrain him from mischief: and for every violation of the provisions of this section, he shall incur a penalty of one dollar, and one dollar for each day that such Dog shall go at large.

§. 6. If such dog shall when going at large in violation of this ordinance bite any domestic animal or if he shall wrongfully bite any domestic animal while travelling in any highway the person so licensed to keep such dog shall incur a penalty of two dollars: if he shall wrongfully assault any person the person so licensed shall incur a penalty of five dollars: and if such dog shall wrongfully bite any person, the person so licensed shall incur a penalty of eight dollars.

§. 7. The Supervisor may also grant to any person applying therefor, licenses to keep and let go at large any peaceable and well disposed Dog, on paying therefor two dollars for every female Dog and one dollar and twenty five cents for every male Dog of the weight of twenty pounds and upwards, and one dollar for every female Dog and fifty cents for every male Dog of less than twenty pounds weight.

§. 8. Every Dog for which such license shall be obtained shall at all times wear a ring strap or belt about his neck, with the name of the person obtaining the license inscribed thereon; and if he shall let such Dog go at large without such ring, strap or belt so inscribed, he shall incur a penalty of twenty-five cents for every day such Dog shall go at large, and such Dog shall be deemed to be at large contrary to this ordinance whenever he shall be off the premises of, and more than twenty rods from the person having him in possession.

§. 9. If any Dog so licensed shall wrongfully assault any person, or bite any domestic animal, the person obtaining such license shall incur a penalty of one dollar, and if he shall wrongfully bite any person, the person obtaining such license shall incur a penalty of five dollars.

§. 10. The Supervisor may revoke any license granted by him, on proof that the person holding it has incurred and refused to pay any penalty under this ordinance, and any license to let go at large any Dog on proof that such Dog is so vicious as to endanger persons engaged in any lawful business, and thereafter the same penalties shall be incurred by any person keeping or letting such Dog go at large as, if no license had at any time been granted.

§. 11. All licenses given under this ordinance shall expire on the day of the annual Township meeting next following their issue.

§. 12. The Township clerk shall keep a register of all licenses granted under this ordinance, in which he shall state the date of every license; the name of the person to whom granted; the sum paid therefor, the Dog for which they are severally granted, and the character of the license, and if any such license shall be revoked the fact and date of revocation.

§. 13. No license shall be of any force until it shall be signed by the Supervisor, and registered by the clerk, and the fees paid to the Treasurer therefor; which facts shall all appear upon the face of the license.

§. 14. Every person obtaining a license under this ordinance shall pay to the Supervisor fifteen cents for issuing, and to the Township Clerk ten cents for registering the same.

§. 15. All penalties incurred shall, if not voluntarily paid, be recovered with costs of suit before any Justice of the Peace of said Township, and it shall be the especial duty of the Supervisor to prosecute therefor.

REGULATIONS.

OF THE

BOARD OF HEALTH.

CHAPTER I.

An Ordinance against the exposure of stinking Fish.

At a meeting of the Board of Health of the Township of Peaine, held at the house of James J. Strang the 12th day of April 1852, it is ordained by said Board.

Sec. 1. No person engaged in Fishing or otherwise shall in said Township leave dead Fish, spoiled Fish, or the offal of Fish upon the beach, nor cast the same into the waters of Lake Michigan, or any of the bays, streams or inlets thereof, or any of the Lakes within Big Beaver Island.

Sec. 2. All persons engaged in Fishing are required to dress their Fish on land, above low water mark, and to bury the offal in the earth at least one foot deep within twenty four hours.

Sec. 3. All persons having at any time spoiled Fish in their possession, are required to bury the same at least one foot deep in the earth within twenty four hours after ascertaining, or receiving notice that the same is spoiled.

Sec. 4. No person shall bury any Fish, spoiled Fish, or offal of Fish, in any street, road, or highway, nor within ten rods of any dwelling house.

Sec. 5. The Board of Health, a member thereof, or the Health officer, shall once in each month from May till October, visit every fishing establishment in said Township, and inspect the same, to see that this ordinance is observed, and that all nuisances and sources of filth may be destroyed, removed, and prevented, as the public health demands.

Sec. 6. The fees for such visits and inspections, shall be fifty cents for each inspection, of each establishment, and shall be paid by the owners or occupants thereof, to the officer making the inspection, and on refusal to pay, shall be collected with costs by suit.

Unanimously adopted.

was ready for the strife.

Nothing nobler can be pictured to the imagination than the appearance of the chief, as naked as he came into the world, with the exception of his arms slung across his shoulders, he sat upon his plunging and excited steed with grace, ease, and confidence. A tuft of the war eagle's plume surmounted his head, proudly raised and thrown back, while his finely developed chest stood out like that of a gladiator's. With tightened rein he held his horse's head close to his chest, and using the spur freely, roused the animal's fiery blood until large flakes of foam flew from his jaws, his nostrils dilated, and eyes looked ready to spring from their sockets.

After making the circuit, he reined in his horse, and the two stood motionless, as if carved from granite, some hundred yards in advance of where we remained stationary to watch the result and see fair play. There was not, however, as I subsequently learned, the slightest apprehension for treachery, as in combats, which, although rare between members of rival tribes, are occasionally indulged in, the strictest faith is kept with the terms on which they are fought.

The piebald horse with the bearer of the lance, on which a small red flag fluttered, now darted from the body of horsemen drawn up closely in the distance, and making a corresponding circle with Black Wolf, drew up in the same way opposite to him, and they appeared, for a few brief seconds, to be eyeing each other with intent far from charitable. As if moved by a common impulse, both drove the butt ends of their lances into the ground, and then raising their rifles from their thighs, dashed forward and fired at the moment of passing each other, some fifteen or twenty paces apart. Whether the bullets flattened, or were rendered harmless against the tough shields of buffalo hides which were suspended round their necks, or whether they flew wide of their marks, I cannot tell; but, for aught I could see, no harm was done.

Dropping their reins to take aim, their horses carried them unchecked to within a few yards of where the respective parties of Osages and Pawnees were posted. Indeed room had to be given to the Pawnee chief, who came with such a rush towards us as to threaten to upset a handful of the foremost of the spectators, among whom, as there was no danger to be apprehended, I had placed myself, on the Squabby Nigger. There was little opportunity to examine him closely; but he was evidently of much less stature than Black Wolf, and possessed none of that fire and noble bearing which characterized the chief of the Osages. He seemed equipped in precisely the same way, and was equally devoid of the smallest article of attire. If however, his personal attractions fell short of his antagonist, in horsemanship and manner of using his weapons he appeared in every way equal to him.—Snatching up his reins he checked the animal, and brought him round as if turned upon a pivot, and then adjusting his rifle with a rapid movement, he drew an arrow from his quiver and, with bended bow, swept towards Black Wolf like an eagle stooping upon his prey.

But the Osage, knowing the expertness of the enemy with whom he had to deal, was prepared in like manner, and as they met about midway between the plated lances, their barded weapons were drawn to their heads, and whiz they went at the same moment with barely a dozen feet intervening between them. At close quarters such as these, and with marksmen of unrivalled skill, it was barely possible that they should miss each other; but their bucklers received the arrows, and both warriors as yet remained unscathed.

The short bows being easier to manage than the rifles, round they turned their horses as soon as the arrows were discharged, and again they swept the same course, with their bows prepared as if by magic for the bout. In this the second turn the Pawnee chief was not so fortunate; for as he came towards us I perceived a stream of blood trickling down his bridle arm, the arrow having passed through the fleshy part of his shoulder, ripping it upwards, but not hanging in the wound.

Black Wolf also met with a wound in the breast from the Pawnee's arrow, being buried almost to the feather in his shield and although thus greatly spent in force with which it was driven, it carved a deep, jagged gash in his right side, from which the blood flowed copiously.

With increasing excitement the two now rode at each other, delivering their arrows as fast as they could turn their horses, and it appeared to be a point to endeavor to get a shot without receiving one in return. But so well matched were they both in the skill of managing their horses and use of their weapons, that neither could obtain this advantage, in spite of the most strenuous exertions.

The bodies of the two chiefs became crimson with gore from the number of flesh wounds each had received, but as yet no mortal one had been given, and from the care observed in protecting the body by means of the shields, and lying along the backs of their horses, so as to present to view as little of their person as possible, there was no great probability of these weapons terminating the fight.

At length Black Wolf's last arrow was shot, and his enemy came towards him, he held up his bow to signify that his quiver was exhausted. In a moment the Pawnee turned his horse, and galloping back to where he planted his lance, plucked it from the ground and couched it by his side; nothing loth to imitate his example, Black Wolf grasped his lance, and without breathing time, the pugnacious foes spurred their hot and impatient horses again to the combat, and as they did so, thoughts of tilt and tournament flitted across my mind, albeit my attention was absorbed beyond description in the pending struggle.

With a terrific shock the weapons crossed, and coming against the centre of the bucklers, the tough shafts bent like willow wands, and the horses were thrown almost upon their haunches. Either from the greater weight of the Osage, or the more effective direction of his lance, the Pawnee was laid flat upon his back; and as his horse bounded forward it seemed impossible that he could regain his perpendicular in the saddle; but with an effort which could be made only by an Indian, he flung himself into his seat, and seizing the rein, turned with the agility of a cat.

It was one of the fixed rules in these bloody frays that there should be no time given between the acts, and that it was to be continued without let, check, or stop, until one of the two were slain. As soon, therefore, as the horses could be brought round, their respective riders recouched their lances and dashed at each other again, with the fury of contending tigers. It might have been the effect of a heated imagination, but as they met I fancied I heard the crashing of a lance as it entered the flesh, and at the same moment the Pawnee chief was flung as if a round shot had blown him from his seat. In an instant, however, he was upon his feet, trying to catch the lasso which was dangling at his horse's heels; but missing his hold, the animal made the best use of the opportunity, and fled away with all the fleetness he possessed.

Black Wolf now dismounted, and giving his horse and lance to Fire-fly, who rode forward to receive them, strode toward the Pawnee chief armed only with the knife and tomahawk.

The appearance of both as they advanced towards each other, was most appalling. From head to heel they presented one thick mass of blood from the numerous wounds which they had received; but as if insensible to pain or faintness each appeared apt as game cocks to renew the feud.

They now went to work hand to hand, backing at each other with their tomahawks with deadly fury, and inflicting now and then most terrible cuts. As the battle progressed, their shields became chopped to pieces, and hung in strips from the surface, while the blows were showered on them as thick as hail.

With that advantage, however, which a big man possesses in a personal encounter with a smaller one, provided his courage be not inferior the odds now became painfully evident in favor of Black Wolf. Up to the point of the Pawnee being hurled from his horse, the chances of the encounter appeared to be pretty nearly balanced; but when its features became changed into a stand up fight between man and man, hand to hand, in sporting phraseology, it was a horse to a hay seed. Towering above his enemy but little less than a foot, the Osage drew his tomahawk down with terrific force, and from his superior reach of arm, often kept his antagonist completely on the defensive, and returned two blows for one.

Nothing daunted, however, the Pawnee maintained the unequal contest with a spirit which was to be extinguished only with his life. Although his arm grew momentarily weaker, and he staggered and reeled before his enemy's fierce onslaught, yet he made as good a requital as laid in his waning powers, and faced his foe as the bravest of the brave could only do. But like an expiring lion he was to be conquered but with his death, and when apparently on the point of falling before the repeated strokes of the enemy, he suddenly sprang forward, and clinging to Black Wolf's shield, endeavored to make a thrust with his drawn knife under it. The Osage, however, was too much upon his guard to be taken by surprise, and shaking the Pawnee off, as he would a snake, he caught him by the throat in his iron grasp, and holding him at arm's length, drove his long Spanish blade into the lower part of the belly, and ripped him to the chest.

A long wild shout of exultation burst from the lips of our party as they witnessed this decisive act on the part of Black Wolf, who stood over the body of his fallen foe with his head proudly erected and turned towards the body of the Pawnees, who were silent spectators of their defeat. For a few seconds the Osage maintained this attitude, without the perceptible motion of a muscle, and then stooping he took the dead chief's scalp lock between his fingers, and passing the point of his knife adroitly round the skull, plucked the scalp, hot and bleeding, from it, and held the prize up in triumph above his head.

Again his companions yelled with savage pleasure at the sight; but no one presumed to approach the spot where he as yet remained to complete the measure of his triumph.

A Pawnee brave now came forward leading the piebald horse, which had been either caught by lasso, or stopped upon reaching the main body of his own free will, and moving slowly towards Black Wolf, as if reluctance was in every step, he gave the rein without sign or word into his hands, and again returned to his party.

There was now little to be done. Black Wolf collected the arms of the Pawnee chief, which were strewn upon the ground, and trying as must have been the feat, vaulted upon the back of the horse, and rode at a gallop towards us. Upon coming close, I saw that both his body and limbs were cut and hacked most fearfully; but Indian-like, he paid no attention to his wounds, and as far as I could see, suffered but little from the loss of blood.

We now returned to the encampment, and permitted the discomfited Pawnees to bury their chief in peace where he had so bravely fallen.—In the prairie wilderness they laid him; and when all had quitted the solitary grave, a stranger visited it with sorrow for his fate.

THE GOSPEL.

The gospel comes to the world, not only its origin, but in all its parts, as the scheme of heaven, and all its advocates claim for it the right of Divine authority from its first promulgators through all successive ages to the present. All believers in it disclaim all right, of interference with it, other than believe and obey it. No right to alter or amend, add or diminish and all attempts of the kind are received with abhorrence by all believers of every sect whatever, let the facts of the case be as they may, whether it is altered or not, all equally disclaim the right of so doing. In doing with the gospel by the consent of all, we have to do entirely with revelation what ever is written on the subject, that the consent of inspiration, is the only source to which we safely go for information in relation to it, or any part of it. It is then, of the first importance, that we let the inspired writers give their own account of the matter, from first to last; and all that is left for us, is to judge for our selves, whether, in the course of human events, we have adhered closely to its doctrines and precepts, or whether we have departed from them.

The sacred writers claim for it the only power to save men. All other schemes, it matters not how specious or how fascinating, are in the matters of salvation unsavory, and have no power unto salvation. Salvation comes alone by the gospel, and by nothing else. He who does not embrace it must be damned; let his character be what it may, from a devout Cornelius to a persecuting Cæsar; for "he that believeth not shall be damned," are the words of its divine author himself, after he had risen from the dead, and claimed all power in heaven and on earth. Not only was it heaven's plan for saving individuals, but it was the only means by which the world could be saved from destruction; for the divine author said, after his ascension, he would come again "in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2d Thessalonians, 1st chapter and 8th verse. God has therefore ordained the gospel as the way of acceptance with, and the rule of obedience to Jesus Christ; without receiving its doctrines, and obeying its precepts, no acceptance with, no reverence to Christ is acknowledged. The mandate which has gone forth from of old to the kings and judges of the earth, is to be instructed, and to serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. To kiss the son lest he be angry, and you perish from the way, when his wrath is but a little kindled. And he says, "Blessed are all they [the kings and judges] that put their trust in him." 2d Psalm, 10, 11, 12, verses. If the kings and judges of the earth are ever blessed it must be obeying Jesus Christ, and if they ever obey him; they must do it by receiving the gospel, and obeying all its precepts, for without this, if we credit the plain declarations of scripture, there is no obedience on the part of heaven acknowledged, and no blessing promised.

But for a fuller and clearer light on the subject, let us attend to what the promulgators of the gospel have said, themselves, in the books of inspiration. We will begin with the Savior. His last words before his ascension, to his disciples, as recorded in the xvi. chapter of Mark, 15 to 18 verses. "And he said unto them go ye into all the world, and preach my gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned; and these signs shall follow them that believe, in my name they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." The following things are to be noted, particularly, in the above sayings. First, they were to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. They were not only to go into all the world, but to preach the gospel to every creature in all the world; no exceptions here made for any human being in all the world. Second, he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. That is, every creature in all the world that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. Third, he that believeth not shall be damned. The same as to say that every creature in all the world that did not believe should be damned. No allowance is here made for any man's righteousness. A praying conclave as well as a murdering high priest, must equally believe, and equally obey.

LAUGH.—"A laugh is worth a hundred groans in any market," said Charles Lamb—and so say we. There never was any good resulting from despondency; and when we see a man trying to groan himself out of difficulties, we conclude him rather weak in the upper story. When you get into a tight place, first look things in the face, and get out the best way you can—but don't 'groan.'

A REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.

The following interesting document was recently found among the papers of Maj. John Jacob Schaeffner, a deceased patriot of the Revolution. It is a discourse delivered on the eve of battle of Brandywine, by Rev. Joab Trout, to a large portion of the American soldiers, in presence of Gen. Washington, Gen. Wayne, and other officers of the army:

REVOLUTIONARY SERMON.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

Soldiers and Countrymen:

We have met this evening perhaps for the last time. We have shared the toils of the march, the peril of the fight, and the dismay of the retreat alike; we have endured the cold and hunger, the contumely of the internal foe, and the courage of the foreign oppressor. We have sat, night after night, beside the camp-fire, we have together heard the roll of the reveille, which called us to duty, or the beat of the tattoo, which gave the signal for the hardy sleep of the soldier, with the earth for his bed and the knapsack for his pillow.

And now, soldiers and brethren, we have met in the peaceful valley on the eve of battle, while the sunlight is dying away beyond yonder heights, the sunlight that tomorrow will glimmer on scenes of blood. We have met, amid the whitening tents of our encampment; in the time of terror and gloom have we gathered together—God grant that it may not be for the last time.

It is a solemn moment. Brethren, does not the solemn voice of nature seem to echo the hour? The flag of our country droops heavily from yonder staff—the breeze has died away along the green plain of Chad's ford—the plain that spreads before us glitters in the sunlight—the heights of Brandywine arise gloomily and grand beyond the waters of yonder stream—all nature holds a pause of silence on the eve of uproar and bloodshed and strife of to-morrow.

"They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

And have they not taken the sword?

Let the desolate plain, the blood-sodden valley, the burned farm-houses blackening in the sun, the sacked village, and ravaged town, answer—let the whitening bones of the butchered farmer strewn along the fields of his homestead, answer—let the starving mother with her babe clinging to the withered breast that can afford no sustenance, let her answer with the death rattle mingling with the murmuring tones that marked the last struggle of her life; let the dying mother and her babe answer.

It was but a day past and our land slept in the quiet of peace. War was not here; wrong was not here. Fraud and woe, and misery and want dwelt not among us. From the eternal solitude of the green woods, arose the blue smoke of the settlers' cabin, and golden fields of corn looked forth from among the waste of the wilderness, and the glad music of human voices awoke the silence of the forest.

Now, God of mercy, behold the change! Under the shadow of a pretext, under the sanctity of the name of God, invoking the Redeemer to their aid, do these hirelings slay our people! They throng our towns—they darken our plains, and now they encompass our posts on the lonely pass of Chad's Ford.

"They that take sword shall perish by the sword."

Brethren, think me not unworthy of belief when I tell you the doom of the British is near. Think me not vain when I tell you that beyond the cloud that now enshrouds us, I see gathering thick and fast, the darker cloud and blacker storm of Divine retribution!

They may conquer us to-morrow. Might and wrong prevail, and we may be driven from this field; but the hour of God's own vengeance will come!

Aye, if in the vast solitude of eternal space, if in the heart of the boundless universe, there throbs the being of a God, quick to avenge and sure to punish guilt, then will the man George Brunswick, called King, feel in his brain and his heart, the vengeance of the eternal Jehovah! A blight will be upon his life—a withered brain, and an accursed intellect; a blight will be upon his children and on his people. Great God, how dread the punishment!

A crowded populace, peopling the dense towns where the man of money thrives while the laborer starves; want striding among the people in all its forms of terror; an ignorant and God-defying priesthood chuckling over the miseries of millions; a proud and merciless nobility adding wrong to wrong, and heaping insult upon robbery and fraud; royalty corrupt to the very heart, and aristocracy rotten to the core; crime and want linked hand in hand, and tempting men to deeds of woe and death—these are a part of the woe and retribution that come upon the English throne, and the English people!

Soldiers—I look around upon your familiar faces with a strange interest. To-morrow morning we will go forth to the battle—for need I tell you that your unworthy minister will march with you invoking God's aid in the fight—we will march forth to battle! Need I exhort you to fight the good fight, to fight for your homesteads, for your wives and children?

My friends, I might urge you to fight by the galling memories of British wrong. Walton—I might tell you of your father butchered in the silence of the night on the plains of Trenton; I might picture his grey hairs dabbled in blood; I might ring his death shriek in your ears. Shelmire—I might tell you of a butchered mother, and a sister outraged; the lonely farmhouse, the night assault, the roof in flames, the shouts of the troopers as they dispatched their victims, the cries for mercy and the pleadings of innocence for pity. I might paint this all again in the vivid colors of the terrible reality, if I thought your courage needed such wild excitement.

But I know you are strong in the might of the Lord. You will march forth to battle on the morrow with light hearts and determined spirit, though the solemn duty of avenging the dead may rest heavy on your souls.

And in the hour of battle, when all around is darkness, lit by the lurid cannon glare, and the piercing musket flash; when the wounded strew the ground, and the dead litter your path—then remember, soldiers, that God is with you. The eternal God fights for you—he rides on the battle-cloud, he sweeps onward with the march of the hurricane charge—God, the awful and infinite, fights for you, and you will triumph.

"They that take the sword, shall perish by the sword."

You have taken the sword, but not in the spirit of wrong or ravage. You have taken the sword for your homes, for your wives, for your little ones. You have taken the sword for truth, and justice, and right, and to you the promise is—be of good cheer, for your foes have taken the sword in defiance of all that men hold, in blasphemy of God—they shall perish by the sword.

And now, brethren and soldiers, I bid you all farewell. Many of us may fall in the battle of to-morrow. God rest the souls of the fallen! Many of us may live to tell the story of the fight to-morrow, and in the memory of all will rest and linger the quiet scene of this autumnal night.

Solemn twilight advances, over the valley; the woods on the opposite fling their long shadows over the green of the meadow; around us are the tents of the continental host, the suppressed bustle of the camp, the hurried tramp of the soldiers to and fro among the tents, the stillness and awe that marks the eve of battle.

When we meet again, may the shadows of twilight be flung over a peaceful land. God in Heaven grant it. Let us pray.

Great Father, we bow before thee; we invoke blessings, we deprecate thy wrath; we return thee thanks for the past, we ask thy aid for the future. For we are in times of trouble, oh, Lord, and beset by foes, merciless, unpitying. The sword gleams over our land, and the dust of the soil is dampened with the blood of our neighbors and friends.

Oh! God of mercy, we pray thee to bless the American arms. Make the man of our hearts strong in thy wisdom; bless we beseech thee, with renewed life and strength, our hope, and thy instrument, even George Washington; shower thy counsels on the Honorable the Continental Congress; visit our host, comfort the soldier in his wounds, and afflictions nerve him for the fight, prepare him for the hour of death.

And in the hour of defeat, oh, God of hosts, do thou be our stay; and in the hour of triumph be thou our guide.

Teach us to be merciful. Though the memory of galling wrongs be at our hearts, knocking for admittance, that they may fill us with the desire of revenge, yet let us, oh, Lord, spare the vanquished, though they never spared us, in the hour of butchery and bloodshed.

And in the hour of death do thou guide us to the abode for the blest; so shall we return thanks unto thee, through Christ our Redeemer. GOD PROSPER THE CAUSE. Amen.

A COLLEGE SCRAPE.

One of the gravest, yet one of the sharpest-witted men we ever knew, was old Dr. C—, president of W— College, who was wont in the "olden time" to preach long and ponderous sermons on Melchisedec, King of Salem, and other kindred subjects, in a down east village.

The Doctor was a Calvinistic preacher, of the old school, and had a face as "severe and stern to view" as Goldsmith's schoolmaster; but, though his visage seemed to put the Jocos Rissusque to flight, a dry or eccentric remark would drop from his lips occasionally, which Nestor himself would swear were laughable. We shall not soon forget the peculiar manner in which he once gave notice of an appointment by a Universalist minister to preach a discourse in the house (a "Union" meeting house) where he was wont to hold forth. Intending himself to preach in a school house near by, at the same time, he gave his anti-brimstone brother of "the cloth" a lift after the following fashion: "My friends, I am requested to give notice that Rev. Mr. D—, a Universalist, will preach at this house at five o'clock. The Gospel (laying a heavy stress on this word) will be preached in the school house at the same hour."

As President of the College, the Doctor was exceedingly rigid in his manner of government, and wielded the sceptre of authority with as firm and despotic a hand as the Emperor of all the Russians. He believed in strict discipline, and would sooner have seen the College empty of students, and its walls toppled to the ground, than yield a jot or tittle to any rebellious or refractory spirit that had been placed under his care. Among the mischievous chaps, who were continually fretting him and causing him to wax wroth, Bill S— was the sharpest thorn in his side. In all the forms of devilry and mischief-making, Bill was fully "posted up;" and to tense, worry and torment the Doctor by some new scrape or violation of College edicts, was "particular greens" to him—he relished it as keenly as an Irishman would a fight for which he had been "spiling," or as an epicure would green turtle. Though the perpetrator of nine-tenths of the scrapes that were committed, Bill was never once detected; he was exceedingly sly and cunning in his operations, plotting alone and in secrecy, and had a quick and brilliant inventive genius, which never failed him in an emergency. One of these affairs, which caused the furnace of the President's wrath to be seven fold heated, we shall long remember.

The Doctor's daughter was to be married on a certain evening to the senior College Professor, and our hero's brain was at once big with the idea of having some fun out of the affair. Accordingly, at the appointed hour of the ceremonies, between nine and ten o'clock one dark evening, having previously fastened a line to the tongue of the college bell, and caused it to be conveyed to his room in the fourth story of an adjacent college building. Bill began to toll the bell for fire.—The bell was the only one in the village, and being tolled as was usual when there was a conflagration, the people, hearing the alarm, which was pealing in their ears every moment in tones of increased loudness, leaped from their beds, supposing the colleges must be wrapped in flames.

Rushing to the engine house, they dragged forth their "Cataracts" and "Niagaras," and arming themselves with hose, buckets, hooks and ladders, hurried, half-dressed, at the top of their speed, and with yells and screams of "Fire!" "Fire!" that made night hideous, to the colleges, which they feared were already one sheet of flame, if not a heap of blazing ruins. Arriving within sight of the halls of learning, they found the latter wrapped in Egyptian darkness; but seeing the President's house brilliantly illuminated on the occasion of the wedding, they supposed it was there the flames had broken out, and hastened forward to extinguish them!

The scene that ensued, both within doors and without, baffles description. Only a Dickens' pen, or a Cruickshank's pencil, could do it any shadow of justice. The bride and bridegroom had just stood up together in a life long union, when the parson's voice was drowned by a noise as of seven thunders, from without—every moment it waxed louder, and soon the clattering of engines were heard, and mingled yells and shoutings as if of Indians in a warhoop, or as if a menagerie had broken loose:—a moment more, and dash! came a deluge of water upon the windows, shivering the glass into atoms, flooding the floor, drenching the men, women, and wedding "fixins," frightening the bride nearly into hysterics, and making all parties think that a second edition of Noah's diluvian experience was come. For a moment or two all was confusion and "hideous rout;" but presently one of the company, a college professor, saw through the affair, and, guessing at the author of the mischief, rushed out of doors, and stopped the engines: thence, hurrying to the college belfry, he essayed to check the bell's incessant clangor; but the cunning Bill had removed the ladder and with his long string was keeping up a continual "ding," "ding," while snugly perched in his "eyerie" in the other building, he was chuckling over the success of his joke in an ecstasy of glee. As for the energetic villagers, who, in their zeal to save the colleges from the "devouring element," had hurried from their warm beds into the frosty night air without fully donning their habiliments—they returned sullenly to their homes, muttering curses "not loud, but deep," and declaring that "the colleges might burn to ashes the next time, for aught that they would do to save them."—Yankee Blade.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,
THURSDAY, JUNE 17, 1852.

Well, reader, here we are again. It is a long time since our last visit. We are now fairly in motion once more, and hope to pay our regular weekly visits to you all. The time elapsed has been so long that you probably had thought the "Islander" defunct, or had forgotten the kind faces that greeted him. No, not that. Long and anxious have we been waiting for the present issue. The senior printer, having spent the winter east, returned here late in May, afflicted with sore eyes, while the junior has had a press of other matter, is our excuse for not appearing sooner.—The reader will be so kind as to excuse us for the present, and in future we shall endeavor to be more punctual, at least during the season of lake navigation.

The weather for the past week has been warm, and gardens have flourished finely. To-day (15th) the thermometer stands at 80 deg. in the shade. The farmers have been very busy all the spring in putting in crops, and the consequence is that a larger amount of crops have been put in than was at first anticipated, and all look fine. Still the work is not yet abandoned.—Many are now preparing ground for late oats and turnips. Yesterday the thermometer stood at 112 deg. at noon, in the sun.

The emigration has been steady, and of the right sort—those coming who are determined to be useful in a new country in clearing and cultivating the land.

The fisheries about the Island are not as good as heretofore.—Several reasons assigned by the fishermen, but none are to us conclusive as to the true cause.

THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION.

This body closed its labors on the 5th inst., after a struggle of five days to get a nominee to suit the demands of the people. The labors of this body were very protracted, making 48 ballottings without a choice, and the prospect then of a much longer trial before a final settlement upon a candidate. The 49th ballot however changed the complexion of the matter. FRANKLIN PIERCE, of New Hampshire, being the nominee for President, and Hon. WM. R. KING, of Alabama, for Vice President.

The Whig National Convention probably met yesterday, according to previous arrangement. But with respect to the labor of that body, we shall have no news until our next issue. Who will be the champion to oppose Mr. PIERCE we will not venture to guess, but patiently await the result of the Convention.

LAKE SUPERIOR JOURNAL.

This neat sheet is on our table, and it is welcome here. It is the first of the newspaper kind that has been published in this northern country, and as a neighbor we hail its appearance with due respect. The Journal, together with the Islander, are the only papers published north of Saginaw. The Journal is devoted to the mining interest, and well sustains its character as a mining journal; which, together with its general news items, make it one of the best sheets of the country.

ABORIGINAL IMPLEMENTS OF METAL.

We make the following interesting extract from the splendid work recently published by the Smithsonian Institute on Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley.

The first inquiry suggested by an inspection of the mounds and other earthwork of the West, relates to the means at the command of the builders in constructing them.

However numerous we may suppose the ancient people to have been, we must regard these works as entirely beyond their capabilities, unless they had some artificial aids. As an agricultural people, they must have possessed some means of clearing the land of forests and of tilling the soil. We can hardly conceive at this day, how their operations could be performed without the aid of iron; yet we know that the Peruvians and Mexicans, whose monuments emulate the proudest of the old world, were wholly unacquainted with the uses of that metal, and constructed their edifices and carried on their agricultural operations with implements of wood, stone and copper. They possessed the secret of hardening the metal last named, so as to make it subserve most of the uses to which iron is applied. Of it they made axes, chisels and knives.

The mound builders were acquainted with several of the metals, although they do not seem to have possessed the art of reducing them from the ores.— Implements and ornaments of copper are found in considerable abundance among their remains; silver is occasionally found in the form of ornaments, but only to a trifling amount; the ore of lead galena, has been discovered in considerable quantities, but none of the metal has been found under such circumstances as to establish conclusively that they were acquainted with the art of smelting it. No iron or traces of iron, except with the recent deposits, have been discovered; nor is it believed that the race of the mounds had any knowledge of that metal. The copper and silver found in the mounds were doubtless obtained in their native state, and afterwards worked without the intervention of fire.

The locality from which they were derived seems pretty clearly indicated by the peculiar mechanico-chemical combination existing, in some specimens, between the silver and copper, which combination characterizes only the native masses of Lake Superior. In none of the articles found is there evidence of welding, nor do any of them appear to have been cast in moulds.— On the contrary, they seem to have been hammered out of rude masses, and gradually and with great labor brought into the required shape. The lamination, resulting from hammering the baser metals while cold, is to be observed in nearly all the articles. But, notwithstanding the disadvantages which they labored under, the mound-builders contrived to produce some very creditable specimens of workmanship, displaying both taste and skill.— No articles composed entirely of silver have been discovered: the extreme scarcity of that metal seems to have led to the utmost economy in its use. It is only found reduced to great thinness and plated upon copper. By plated, it should not be understood that chemical combination, or a union produced by heat, exists between the two metals, but simply that thin slips of silver were wrapped closely around the copper, their edges overlapping so as to leave no portion exposed. This was done so neatly, as, in many cases, almost to escape detection.

AXES.—Among the implements recovered from the mounds, are several copper axes. They are well wrought, and each appears to have been made from a single piece,—showing that the metal was obtained in considerable masses. The largest of these, weighs two pounds five ounces. It measures seven inches in length, by four in breadth at the cutting edge and has an average thickness of about four tenths of an inch. Its edge is slightly curved, somewhat after the manner of the axes of the present day, and is bevelled from both surfaces. Another is less in size, but of heavier proportions. It measures six and one third inches in length, by three and one third in width on the edge. Unlike the other, it has a nearly straight cutting surface; the blade, however, is curved or gouge shaped, closely resembling the adze at present used in hollowing timbers, and it was probably applied to a similar purpose with that instrument. Its head is slightly battered, as if it had sustained blows from a hammer, and had itself been used in pounding.

It may seem incomprehensible to many persons, how these axes, being destitute of an eye for the insertion of a handle, and not even possessing the groove of the Indian stone-axe, for the reception of a withe, could have been used with any effect.

They were doubtless fitted in the same manner with those of the ancient Mexicans and peruvians, with which from all accounts they seem to be identical in form.

"The Mexicans," observes Clavigero, "made use of an axe to cut trees, which was also made of copper, and was of the same form with those of modern times except that we put the handle in an eye of the axe, while they put the axe in an eye of the handle."

The Pacific Islanders have a sort of adze, which is formed by firmly lashing a blade of stone, with its cutting edge at right angles, to a handle having a sharp crook at its extremity. This mode of fastening would enable the axe with the curved blade to be used with the greatest efficiency as an adze. That it was designed to be so used, seems apparent from the fact that the edge is not formed by bevelling from both sides, but from the inner surface only, precisely in the manner that the adze of the present day is ground.

The circumstances under which these interesting relics were discovered, are detailed in the chapter on mounds.

It will be seen that they were not found where, as a general and almost invariable rule, we must look for the only authentic remains of the mound builders, viz: at the bottom of the mound.— They are nevertheless classed as undoubted relics of the ancient race. The implements of the modern Indians are found, whenever they occur in the mounds, in connection with human remains, in the position in which they were deposited with the dead. We have no evidence that the northern tribes of Indians possessed copper articles of this description, and but slender evidence at best that they were in use among the Indians along the Gulf.

A positive argument in favor of the origin imputed to them, is presented in the fact that many of the articles found both in the sepulchral and sacrificial mounds are of copper, and of similar workmanship, denoting that the mound builders possessed the metal in considerable abundance, and were very well acquainted with its capabilities. That they have an antiquity higher than the date of the first European intercourse, is established by their form; but if this were insufficient the evidence may be found in the fact that from immediately over them was removed the stump of a tree, originally of the largest size, which had long since fallen and decayed.

"With respect to the question whether these remains are of European origin or manufacture, I have merely to remark that their workmanship is very rude; that no traces of iron or European implements were found with them, and that the copper corresponds exactly with the specimens of native metal obtained from Lake Superior. The nature of the soil at this spot is favorable for the preservation of organic remains; the fact, therefore, that the bones found with these relics were in so advanced a stage of decomposition, induces me to believe that they were deposited long before the discovery and occupation of Canada by Europeans."

We might expect here to find relics bearing the stamp of French manufacture; but there is nothing in the form or composition of these which would lead one to suppose them to be of French origin. This spot was not the usual burying place of the Indians. Their cemetery seems to have been some distance back from the river, upon a high sandy ridge, where their remains, apparently of very ancient deposit, are now found in abundance.

From what has been presented, it appears that the mound builders were very well acquainted with the use of copper. They do not, however, seem to have possessed the secret of giving it any extraordinary degree of hardness. The axes above described were found upon analysis to be pure copper,—unalloyed, to any perceptible extent—by other metals. The hardness which they seem to possess, beyond the copper of commerce, is no doubt due to the hammering to which they were subjected in their manufacture. As already observed, the metal appears to have been worked, in all cases, in a cold state. This is somewhat remarkable, as the fires upon the altars were sufficiently strong in some instances to melt down the copper implements and ornaments deposited upon them, and the fact that the metal is fusible could hardly have escaped notice.

It has already been suggested, upon the strength of the fact, that some of the specimens of copper obtained from the mounds have crystals of silver attached to them, that a part of the supply of the ancient people was obtained from the shores of Lake Superior, where alone this peculiar combination is known to exist. The circumstance that the mound axes are made of unalloyed copper, does not affect this conclusion, for a large proportion of the native metal found at this locality is pure. The conclusion is further sustained by the amount of the metal extracted from the mounds, implying a large original supply. Besides numerous small pieces, some large fragments are occasionally discovered. One of these, weighing twenty-three pounds, and from which portions had evidently been cut, was found a few years since near Chillicothe. Still it does not appear that copper was sufficiently abundant to entirely supersede the use of bone and stone implements.

"The copper axes of the Peruvians differ very little in shape from ours; and it appears that these were implements with which they performed most of their works. They were of various shapes and signs, the edge of some is more circular than others, and some have a concave edge."—Ulina, vol. 1 p 143.

† It is asserted by the Portuguese chronicler of De Soto's ill-fated expedition, that copper hatchets were found in possession of some of the Indian tribes along the Gulf, "which were said to have a mixture of Gold." These, the Spaniards were told, were obtained in a province towards the north called Chisca "where there was a smelting of copper, and of another metal of the same colour save that it was much finer and far better to the sight, which they used not so much, because it was softer." The Spaniards did not visit the province of Chisca; as they were informed high mountains intervened, which could not be passed with horses. This, it is believed, is the only account of the kind occurring north of Mexico.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY.—Aime N. Derode, of Paris, has recently taken out a patent for the following method of uniting cast iron with cast iron and other vessels: Mr. Derode's process of uniting metals to each other consists in the employment, in conjunction with ordinary heat, of a succession of electric or electro galvanic shocks. The metals may be operated on either in the solid or partially liquid state. The metals are first scoured with acidulated water, the effects of which may be aided by heat and electric agency, then rubbed with wire brushes, placed in contact with each other in the position they are ultimately intended to occupy, have solder applied to the meeting parts, are heated by means of a clear fire in a suitable furnace, and while the solder is melting a rapid succession of electric shocks is caused to act on the two metals so as to combine with the solder, to produce perfect union of the two. The solder which the patentee prefers is composed of two parts yellow copper solder, one part brass, and one six hundredth part nickel in powder; but other may be used, and these proportions may be varied. The joint product by the process described is stated to be so perfect as to be capable of resisting a force more than sufficient, in the case of two bars of iron uniting together by it, to fracture the bars.

READING.

The vast storehouse of human knowledge is unlocked to man by the art of reading, and by it he is invited to partake of the treasures it contains. It unseals the crystal fountains of living waters, where he may quench his mental thirst, and opens to him boundless elysian fields, where he may feast his noblest faculties upon the purest joys and richest treasures of the universe.

But he who learns to read by rote, repeating words and sentences of which he knows no meaning, is like a man so nearly blind, that, having turned together the contents of a rich storehouse, he walks amid its treasures, perceiving here and there a massive pile of grossest merchandise, but knows not that he walks where pearls and diamonds, and precious gems are glittering on every side.

To such, this noblest art, this most invaluable key, is of but little worth. They have the key; but when they venture to make use of it, they see but here and there a bold projecting thought, so plainly visible that the vision of a blind man could scarcely fail to see it; while all the pearls, and diamonds, and precious gems of thought, which lie within the nicer shades of meaning, are unperceived by them.

Hence they find but little pleasure in reading works of merit, where purity of sentiment and style combine, and form a chain of pearls; all bright and beautiful; but none, or very few, so bold as to strike the vision of an obtuse mind. Such people have but little taste for reading; or, if they at all, they seek those works of fiction which paint the strong passions of mankind in glowing colors.

This mammoth evil, which prevails to such a vast extent throughout the land, should be removed. Those who are taught are subject to their teacher's skill and the book, together with the living teacher, should so instruct the young, that the full meaning of every word and sentence, in all its strength and beauty, would be readily perceived by them.—Teachers must instruct their pupils to think, and no branch of our schools affords so apt an opportunity as the exercise of reading. Thought is and must be a necessary accompaniment of the pupil, if he pursues his work with the greatest benefit to himself.—Wisconsin Farmer.

A London paper states that four men, apparently voyagers from a far country, recently found their way into the great area of the Bank of England, where they seemed to be a little out of their reckoning. Their helpless state being observed by one of the bank porters, he went over and asked their business, when the spokesman of the party inquired "if they wanted to buy a little gold dust." The porter, seeing no parcel with them, wondered where the dust might be, and took them to the assay office of the bank, when, on being asked to produce it, they instantly commenced ripping up their coats waistcoats, linings and flaps, lapels and cuffs, and so disgorged their hidden treasures. Lump after lump of the glorious store tumbled forth; and when the operation was concluded, the whole was taken away and melted into a solid ingot, which, on being placed in the balances, was found to weigh 36 lbs., some odd ounces, and its value amounted to something over £1,700. They were paid a part at once, and called for the remainder on the following day. They were Cornish men, fresh from the diggings.

HIGH WATER.—The high water this spring has exceeded anything of the kind for many years. The Bay and river are at least two and a half feet above the usual mark, and at "high tide" cause considerable inconvenience along the bank, almost flooding the wharves. As an instance, the dock at Wheelock's Ferry, which last year was raised two feet to place it above high water, is again overflowed, and the water has covered the floor of the small buildings near it. Yet every boat which has undertaken to come into the river has grounded near the mouth, probably because the water has covered the reeds and landmarks which pointed out the channel.—Green Bay Advocate.

HORSES ON HIGHWAYS.—A case of considerable importance has recently been adjudicated upon the Supreme Court of Michigan. It is that of Williams, vs. the Michigan Central Railroad Company. It was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for horses which were killed by being run over while staying on the highway. In the course of the opinion the whole subject of domestic animals staying on the highway is examined with great care; many legal points hitherto popularly held to be doubtful are clearly elucidated, and while the decision is against the plaintiff, on the score that his horses were trespassing, it is fully proved that no animals have the right of living on the public ways, unless the township owns a bona fide common, and has legally given permission for its use.

A coal mine has been discovered in Kentucky, which appears to be inexhaustible.—The coal burns like gas, imparting great heat. It will as readily ignite as a candle, and the steamboat men use it for torches, instead of pine knots. Its quality is supposed to be far superior to the undiscovered coal mines of Japan, in search of which the Administration has sent a large naval force.

ANOTHER BLOCK FOR THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

There is understood to be a movement on foot among the different border tribes of western Indians, notwithstanding their supposed utterly destitute condition, to unite and contribute a memorial to the Government in the shape of a block of stone for the Washington Monument.

The Chicago Journal says the design has been so far consummated already as to render it nearly certain that the material is to be procured from the celebrated "Starved Rock," in Illinois; the Indians having no land they call their own, to obtain it from—and the inscription it is to bear when finished has been decided upon. It is simple, but expressive, as conveyed in the following characteristic terms:—

THIS STEP THE RED MAN GIVES TO THE PALE FACE

to build him a path to a better HUNTING GROUND.

The "Board of Foreign Missions," it is expected, will volunteer the expense of its transportation to Washington.

Ah! the pale face has got all the red man's land—and now is asking him to help build him a path to heaven. Wonder how much the pale face charges for the block of stone from "Starved Rock?" And the "Board of Foreign Missions" will pay the expense of transportation—what with? The cents and half cents they have coaxed out of little boys and girls attending Sunday schools, and begged of kitchen maids and washerwomen, by exciting their sympathy for the heathen, roasting in hell fire.—Wonder if the "Board of Foreign Missions" were not looking for a Congressional appropriation for some Indian school, which they are to handle?

MOVEMENTS OF THE MILITARY.—Orders have been received for the immediate removal, to California and Oregon, of the Companies that have been stationed here at Fort Brady, at Mackinac, Green Bay, Fort Gratiot, and the other posts occupied by the 4th Infantry. We understand that Fort Gratiot, Fort Madison and one or two others on the northern frontier are to be permanently abandoned; Mackinac and Sault Ste. Marie garrisons are to be immediately re-garrisoned by companies of the 4th Artillery.—Lake Superior Journal.

HAD HIM THERE.—Laugh today, we did, at the reply of an aristocratic Californian adventurer, by a young lady to whom he was exhibiting his revolver pistol, and relating his plans. The young spright intimated that instead of digging for gold he intended to blow out the brains of successful miners, and then "pick up the dust," to which the lady replied, he would supply a greater want by picking up the brain.

HARD WATER.

None of the waters produced by nature are entirely pure and soft—artificially distilled water alone is so, and often then, without care and some chemical knowledge of the process, it is not free from impurities.

The waters from primitive formations, particularly from mountainous districts, are almost pure, and springs and wells on sandy plains are nearly—owing to the rocks and soils being wholly composed of silicious and other constituents, insoluble in water. All streams and springs in secondary, or limestone countries, contain more or less materials constituting what are called hard water—and often the waters from sudden showers, which have been produced by evaporation from extensive regions of like formation, are sensibly affected.

All waters known as hard, result from some of the acids or their salts being held in solution. The most common are the carbonic acids and their carbonates, and sulphurous and chloric acids and their combinations. All the waters containing carbonic acid gas, and sulphureted hydrogen, (the material that makes the sulphur springs of the country,) uncombined with the earths, are rendered soft by simple boiling, as the gasses are expanded by heat and thrown off, and no deposit is left—but when united with lime, alumina (clay) or the metals, boiling deposits a portion by releasing the solvent, in the form of a hard stony concretions.

The process used by washing women, to cleanse the hard water by adding lye, ashes, or potash, is a strictly correct chemical process. Acids and alkalis are antagonistic principles; one destroys or neutralizes the other, and renders both inert and harmless. The sulphureted waters are more difficult to cleanse, or purify, than any other class except the muriates (acid of common salt, now called chlorates,) as they adhere to their combinations with greater tenacity.

The effects produced on hard water in washing, where soap is used, is very simple when investigated. Soap is a compound of an alkali and animal fat, or vegetable oils and resins, and when added to water containing any acid, or acidulated substance, the acid, by its chemical affinities, seizes and neutralizes the alkali of the soap, disengaging the fatty substance in the same shape it was originally, and in the worst possible shape, for cleansing the person or clothing.

There is a vulgar error prevailing among the people generally, that it is dangerous to add lime to wells and cisterns, on account of its rendering the water hard. There is no greater fallacy among our traditional beliefs. Lime is strictly an alkaline substance, and as such is a neutralizer of all the acids that water contains, and may be freely used when in a quick or unslacked state—old and airslacked is hurtful, as it has become a sub-carbonate. One ounce of fresh quick lime, dissolved in water, will soften two barrels of ordinary hard water, and render it fit for washing purposes. It is also advantageously used to sweeten cistern water when it becomes stagnant, and of bad odor, and the cheapest and most ready deodorizer of all unpleasant, unhealthy effluvia.

THE GOSPEL.

(Concluded.)

The same sentiments are maintained by all those who were commissioned by him, to bear his message to the human family. Paul says of the gospel he preached, "For I certify you brethren, that the gospel which was preached by me is not after man; for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by revelation of Jesus Christ." Galatians, 1st chap. 11, and 12th verses. And in the preceding part of the same chapter, 8th and 9th verses. But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so we say again: If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that which you have received, let him be accursed. This language cannot be mistaken: it is definite as well as authoritative. A curse is pronounced upon any man, who will venture to preach any other gospel than that which the Galatians had received; and an angel from heaven, if he dare presume to preach any other gospel, than that which Paul preached, had a curse given for a departure from it even in the smallest. The result would be that whoever ventured to do it would be cursed, instead of saving themselves and others, and that for the greatest of all reasons, because the preacher of this gospel had obtained it by revelation of Jesus Christ.

This same apostle in addressing Timothy, whom he calls his son in the gospel, uses language of similar import. 1st Tim., chap. iv. 14, 15, and 16th verses, he says, "neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Meditate upon these things, give thyself to them, that thy profiting may appear to all. Take heed unto thyself, and the doctrine; continue in them, for in doing this, thou shalt save both thyself and them that hear thee." Timothy is here admonished to take heed, to himself and also to the doctrine, for in so doing he would save himself as well as those that heard him. For though Timothy had gifts of the spirit bestowed on him, which had been prophesied of him, and confirmed by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, still, his own salvation depended on his taking heed to the doctrine as much as those who heard him. No salvation to him nor others, only by a strict adherence to the doctrine of Jesus Christ, if he perverted it, instead of salvation a curse. All his former righteousness ceased to be counted to him for righteousness.

We learn from what this same Paul says to the Galatians that he preached the same gospel that was preached by the apostle Peter. Galatians, 2d chapter, 8th and 9th verses. "But contrariwise, when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to me as the gospel of the circumcision was to Peter, (for he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me toward the gentiles.) In consequence he (Paul) received the right hand of fellowship that he should go to the gentiles."

The circumstances under which the gospel was proclaimed, were very peculiar. The Jews, to whom it was at first proclaimed, were in the greatest ignorance of it; they did not know that there was any Holy Ghost, see Acts of the Apostles, 19th chapter, and 2d verse. Though the Jews here spoken of, dwelt at Ephesus, it may be fairly inferred that this was the condition of all the Jews at the time the gospel was preached to them by Peter. They did not know that there was any Holy Ghost. That is, they did not know that there was any Holy Ghost given in those days, they doubtless knew that the Holy Ghost had formerly inspired their prophets, both to reveal the things of God as well as to work miracles, but it had long since ceased and they knew not now that there was any such thing given.

There had many centuries passed away that there were no true prophets in Israel, some six hundred years since the voice of a true prophet had been heard in the once favored land of the Lord. During this long reign of silence, the Jews had made shipwreck of the order of heaven established among them by the special revelation of heaven, and had departed so far from the living God, at the time the gospel was proclaimed by the apostles, as not to know that the Holy Ghost was given or to be given any more.

It was during this long period of the absence of the voice of the Lord among them, that they so corrupted their way, and had sunk into such ignorance, as not to understand the voice of the prophets, which was read every sabbath day in their synagogues. In consequence of this apostasy, Israel became completely blinded. They did not know the voice of the Lord when they heard it. When a true prophet was sent they rejected him, and when their Messiah came, they crucified him, away with him, away with him it is not meet that such a fellow should live, was their cry. Not that they did not believe in the coming of a Messiah, this they believed with all their hearts; but this Jesus was not he: for want of the spirit of inspiration, which had long since been withdrawn, their sacred books were a dead letter to them. They could read them but not understand them.

There was to be a Messiah, but they could not tell when he came, they could not distinguish him from an impostor, and why this darkness? Because the spirit of revelation had departed from them. They had eyes, but could not see, ears but could not hear, hearts but could not understand; and why? Because the spirit of inspiration had departed from them. They groped for the wall, as if they had no eyes. Isaiah 59th chapter; 10 verse. Why happened all this blindness to Israel? Because the spirit of revelation had departed. They went back, they stumbled, they fell, because there was no vision: the prophets were no more the voice of inspiration, they would not hear. Their talk was made a snare and a trap unto them, and they finally fell, and were scattered, and remain so to this day, and will remain so "until they shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." No art of man can redeem them, no human power can raise them up the voice of a prophet, the language of inspiration alone, can bring them back, or else they lay forever.

Had they not rejected the prophets, and said, we have revelation enough, they would have been in glory to this day; but instead of this, they are as a wild bull in a net, not knowing that there is any Holy Ghost given, believing that the day of revelation is over, forever over.

The blindness which had happened to Israel, and the cause of that blindness, is so clearly set forth that all who read may see and understand it. Such was their condition when the gospel was first preached unto them, and the apostles well knew that nothing but the proclamation which they made could remove their blindness, or enlighten the gentiles; for through that alone, the spirit of revelation would or could return to the world.

The description given of the gentiles, shows that they were equally destitute of the true knowledge of God. Paul says of them, in his day, that they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. Eph. ii. 12 ver.

Such was the condition of the Jews and Gentiles, when the apostles went forth to preach the gospel. All the light and knowledge there was in the world were the Jewish scriptures, of the so called, Old Testament. All beside that was darkness and ignorance. No prophet to correct the errors of the Jews, and no teacher to enlighten the Gentiles. The Jews had killed the prophets, and stoned those whom God had sent unto them, by reason of which their leaders had become hypocrites, blind leaders of the blind; but notwithstanding this, they were the only people who had any knowledge of the true God, or the means of knowing him; but the light in them, in consequence of refusing to have any more inspired men among them, had nearly become darkness.

From the Times and Seasons. GOSPEL.

Whatever difference may exist in the world about the scheme of eternal life, and the duties enjoined upon the human family to prepare them for its enjoyment, all, we believe, who acknowledge the truth of the bible, agree in this, that the ancient apostles, commissioned by the Savior, were fully authorized to proclaim the gospel, and to make known the will of God to man; and that the things which were taught by them were correct; and the gospel which they preached was God's only scheme of life; and that adding to it, or taking from it, deprived mankind of the benefits resulting therefrom, and tended to disarm the plan of eternal life of its powers.

We believe it is universally admitted by all believers in revelation, that no persons could receive into their hearts, the things taught by these men, and practice the duties they required, without obtaining the promises made by them; for if this were not the case, it would be worse than folly to hold them up to view as messengers sent of God to bless the nations.

The point of light in which these apostles are held up to view in the scriptures is, that the gospel which they preached was the only gospel, acknowledged of God and the proclamation which they proclaimed, the only one that men were authorized to receive, and the promises which they made, were to be as certainly enjoyed, as ever men put themselves in a situation to receive them, by obeying the instructions which they gave them.—For though religion in some form was prevailing in every part of the civilized world in the days of the Savior and his apostles, still they presented themselves to the world as the only persons who were capable of enlightening the minds of men, and of bringing them into an acquaintance with the true faith, and of introducing them into the family of the Most High, having (as they said) authority from God to do this work, and that a dispensation of the gospel was committed to them for this purpose.

The professed object of their apostolic mission was, that men might be saved: this their commission clearly sets forth. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not shall be damned!"—From this it is plain, that whatever might have been the amount of religion in their day, there was not a sufficiency of righteousness on earth to save one man, only as it was restored to the world through the Savior and his apostles, nor was it possible for one single creature in all the world to be saved unless put under their guidance: for they were to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature; so that every creature in all the world, had to be taught by them, and receive the gospel which they preached, or else be damned; for they who believed not should be damned. This was certainly placing their commission in an important point of light: and their own teachings were in perfect consistency with their commission.

Paul says, when writing to the Galatians, first chapter, 8th and 9th verses. "But though we, or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." In all their teachings they held themselves up to view as the only teachers of righteousness which were approved of God in the world, and that their mission was not necessary only for a part of the world, but all of it; yea every creature in it. It mattered not what progress the world had made in the knowledge of other things: in the knowledge of the science of salvation, they had retrograded, until there were none doing good, no not one. And unless God had sent the apostles, or others authorized as they were, the world must have perished: every creature in it must have been damned: for they were to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, he, (that is, every creature) that believed and was baptized, should be saved; but he, (that is, every creature) that believeth not, should be damned. Had there been one creature in all the world who was in a state of salvation, or could have attained that state without the apostles, this commission would not have been correct, that is, that every creature in all the world who did not believe them and be baptized by their direction should be damned.

Nothing can make the apostles' commission true, but the fact, that no creature in all the world could be saved without being brought into favor with God through their ministry.

The Savior, through the whole course of his ministry in the flesh, made it one of the principal items of teachings to make it clearly manifest to the religious Jews, that they had departed from the principles delivered unto them through the messengers whom God had inspired to make known his will to men.—He did not reprove the Jews for adhering to the law, but because they had corrupted it, and made it void by their traditions. For neither the law nor the prophets, made hypocrites, blind guides, a generation of vipers: but a corruption of one, and a perversion of the other did—they made both. Neither was the law nor the prophets against the promises of God, nor yet a hindrance to any person coming into the kingdom of God; but a perversion and a corruption of them were against the promises of God, and a barrier to men entering into the kingdom of heaven.

The Jews were not to blame for adhering to both the law and the prophets, but for corrupting one and perverting the other, through which corruption and perversion, they ceased to believe either Moses or the prophets; for had they believed them they would have believed the Savior also; for they wrote of him.—Had the leaders of the Jews never corrupted the law nor perverted the prophets, they would never had been overthrown: for they would have received their Messiah when he came, and have escaped "the wrath to come." But in consequence of their having corrupted the law, and perverted the prophets, they would neither enter the kingdom of God themselves nor let these who were entering go in; for which the Savior upbraids them. Not that they worshiped God according to the law, but according to their own tradition, by which they had made void the law, and rendered it of none effect: teaching for doctrine the commandments of men. Mark 7th chapter from the 5th to the 15th verses. Matthew, 15th chapter from the 2nd to the 10th verse.

OLD TIME WINTER.

In 1664, the cold was so intense that the Thames was covered with ice sixty-one inches thick. Almost all the birds perished.

In 1682 the cold was so excessive that the famished wolves entered Vienna and attacked beasts and even men. Many people in Germany were frozen to death in 1585, and 1695 was nearly as hard.

In 1709, occurred that famous winter, called, by distinction, the cold winter.

All the rivers and lakes were frozen, and even the sea for several miles from the shore. The ground was frozen nine feet deep. Birds were struck dead in the fields, and men perished by thousands in their houses. In the south of France the wine plantations were almost destroyed, nor have they yet recovered that fatal disaster. The Adriatic sea was frozen, and even the Mediterranean about Genoa, and the citron and orange groves suffered extremely in the finest parts of Italy.

In 1716, the winter was so intense that people travelled across the straits from Copenhagen to the provinces of Senia in Sweden.

In 1740, the winter was severely inferior to that of 1710. The snow lay ten feet deep in Spain and Portugal. The Zayder Zee was frozen over, and thousands of people went over it. And all the lakes in England froze.

In 1733, the winter was very cold. Snow fell in Portugal to the depth of twenty-three feet on the level.

In 1784 and 1785, the winters were very severe and cold. In England, the strongest ale, exposed to the air in a glass, was covered with ice one-eighth of an inch thick.

In 1771, the Elbe was frozen to the bottom. In 1776, the Danube bore ice five feet deep below Vienna. Vast numbers of the feathered and finny tribes perished.

The winters of 1774 and 1775 were uncommonly severe. The Little Belt was frozen over.

From 1800 to 1812 also, the winters were remarkably cold, particularly the latter, in Russia, which proved so destructive to the French army.

FROGS AND THE CHESTNUT BURS.

Many years ago, a young man twenty-one years of age, and whom I will call Daniel, was hired to work on a farm by Mr. W—, a man of considerable note as a farmer, in Massachusetts. Mr. W— had a daughter and a hired girl, both about eighteen years of age, and Daniel being of a steady turn, was not talkative enough to suit their fancy, and after trying various plans and tricks, without success, to— as they said—raise his ideas, they caught a large frog, and put it into Daniels bed. On going to bed, he soon discovered the whereabouts of his bedfellow, and pitched his frogship out or the window, and never afterwards betrayed the least sign of knowledge in regard to the joke.

About a month afterwards, Daniel found a lot of chestnut burs, nearly as sharp as thistles, and contrived to deposit nearly half a peck in the girl's bed, and after the girls had gone to their room and had time to undress, he took a candle and went to the door and rattled the latch, when the girls put out their light and such a squalling was seldom heard or seen before. Daniel now opened the door and stood in it with light in hand.

"Dan, torment your picture, I wish you were as far beyond the light house as you are on this side," said Suky.

"Why, what's the matter?—have you any frogs there?" said Dan.

"Dan, if you don't shut the door and clear out I will call Mrs. W—," continued Suky. "I will call her myself, if you wish," said Dan.

"Daniel," said Anna W—, if you will shut the door and go back to the kitchen, there shall be no more tricks or jokes put upon you by us for the next six months at least.

Daniel, thinking he had punished the girls enough, shut the door and left them. A few moments after this, Suky came out to light her candle.

"I thought you had gone to bed, Suky, said Mrs. W—."

Suky made no reply, but looked daggers at Dan, and quietly returned. After this scrape the girls put no more jokes or tricks upon Dan. He was a steady faithful man—saved every dollar of his earnings, and six years from that time owned a good farm, married Anna W— and was three years first select man of the town, which he afterwards represented in the State Legislature.

BY JAMES J. STRANG.

To one well acquainted with the surface and appearance of the earth, the extent of its continents, and the height of its mountains, nothing would be more difficult to conceive possible than an universal deluge. Yet are we required, not merely by the traditions of nearly all nations, but by our faith in the sacred oracles, to believe that such an event has taken place in the time past.

I propose, in a brief essay, to show that such an event, however impossible it may be now, was, at the creation, quite possible; and beyond the mere testimony of historic writing, to show from the geologic structure of the earth, and its planetary arrangement, that it has occurred.

The great difficulty in believing in the verity of an universal deluge arises from the impossibility of obtaining water to produce it. Water will naturally and forever seek its own level. The mass of the waters find their common level at the surface of the ocean. If all the lakes, rivers and fountains of water were drained into the ocean, they would suffice to raise it but a very few feet—probably not more than two or three. But the highest mountains are elevated some five miles above the level of the ocean. From what source was the water supplied that deluged these mountains?

This is the great question concerning the deluge. This we propose to answer, not merely to the fanatical, but to the philosophical, in a manner perfectly satisfactory to the rational and thinking.

Any one will readily admit that such an event as an universal deluge must have effected great changes; and must also have been produced by means of great changes of some kind or other.—Though the earth in its present condition could not be deluged, was it not so created that it could be deluged as easily as any other great event in nature could be produced?

Gen. i. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.—“In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament heaven. And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he seas.”

By this short account it appears that the earth was not created as it now is, with its surface one vast ocean, broken by two continents, and specked with innumerable islands. It was a vast surface of land, with here and there in its deepest vallies a gathering together of waters called seas. The great body of water which has filled up these seas till they join together in one vast ocean was then the waters “above the firmament.” For God formed the firmament, that is, the natural heavens, dividing the waters above it from the waters below it.

There was, then, at the creation, a vast body of water above the firmament. That water should thus be held above the firmament cannot be regarded as incredible, since the planet Jupiter is found by modern astronomers to be thus situated at the present time. It has its belts or rings of aqueous matter constantly surrounding it, and the centripetal and centrifugal attractions which keep all the planets in their proper orbits would, as they do in the case of the planet Jupiter, keep this water at the proper elevation above the earth. So it did not require any act of violence to the laws of nature to keep a great body of the water above the firmament, and therefore off from the earth, leaving the principal part of the earth dry land, fit for the habitation of man, for whom it seems most peculiarly designed.

The planet Jupiter has no change of seasons; no natural division into zones. The plane of its equator and ecliptic are identical, and its days and nights are continually of the same length. And, though astronomers have not observed the fact, it is nevertheless a demonstrable truth, that its nights are distinguished from its days by a very moderate degree of darkness, quite insufficient to break off men's ordinary avocations. For the reflections of light upon the internal surface of its rings must extend its twilight quite round its circumference.—So, too, when the earth was in like manner surrounded by its waters above the firmament, it could not properly be said that day and night alternated, but evening and morning alternated.—There was no night there.

It is an interesting fact in this connection that all mention of natural events and of the habits of the Antediluvians confirm us in the opinion that previous to the deluge there was no change of season, no burning heat, or freezing cold, but a perpetual harvest in spring time.

It is nowhere mentioned that any of the Antediluvians lived in houses. True, one tribe “dwelt in tents.” Gen. iv. 20. Yet this is spoken of as a marked peculiarity which distinguished them from other tribes. I may safely affirm further that the sacred writer did not originally assert that the sons of Jabal dwelt in “tents,” but only that they “dwelt in changeable habitations.” They were herdsmen; or, in the simple language of the sacred historian, “such as have cattle,” and wandered about from place to place, dwelling where inclination led them, instead of cities or fixed places, where various tribes constantly dwelt.

Previous to the deluge men wore clothing, it is true; but this was merely to cover themselves for shame, (Gen. iii. 7, 21,) and not to protect from inclement weather; and the ideas of heat and cold are nowhere named or alluded to till after the deluge. Seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, rain and drouth are all ideas originating with the deluge. At the time of the creation we are told that it did not rain, but that God caused a mist to go up from the earth, and water it. Gen. ii. 6.

When the flood abated from the earth, God “spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying, And I, God, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you; and with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth. And I will establish my covenant with you: neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood: neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you; and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud: And I will remember my covenant which is between me and you, and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh. And the bow shall be in the cloud, and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth.” Gen. ix. 8 to 16.

Thus it appears that the rainbow was not known till after the deluge. Yet any one having the slightest acquaintance with the laws of light can readily see that there could be no rain but the rainbow would appear to those who were on the sunny side of the storm. It is vain to pretend that the rainbow was miraculously introduced. It is produced by well known natural causes; causes existing in the nature of light itself, and therefore coeval with it. The non-existence of the rainbow previous to the deluge, therefore pre-supposes the non-existence of rain, and of clouds high above the earth.

To account for all these facts, so different from what we find in the present state of the earth, we have only to give credence to the account of the creation in Genesis that God made a firmament to divide the waters above the firmament from the waters below, and that he gave the earth the same manner of motion with the planet Jupiter, which has its firmament dividing its waters in the same manner.

The waters around the earth protected the equatorial regions from the burning heat, and the reflected rays from the sides of the rings made up for the loss of heat by the obliquity of the sun's rays in the polar regions. The water was so near above that mists did not rise into clouds; but if the tendency to ascend was strong, the mists would be attracted to the waters above.—If not strong enough for that, they watered the earth in dews, which, falling on the earth every day, always watered without ever drenching it.

With the poles of the earth always perpendicular to the ecliptic, there could be no change of seasons; and the warmth and moisture of every part of the earth gave it universal and perpetual fruitfulness. In the cultivation of the soil man had only to contend with thorns and thistles, (Gen. iii. 18,) which, like the fruits, were everywhere spontaneous. With such a climate the growth of plants could not but be exuberant in every part of the earth; and, considering these facts, the geological remains of equatorial plants of enormous size, near the poles, can no longer surprise us.

Corresponding to this theory the sacred historian, speaking of the coming of the flood, says, “the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the WINDOWS OF HEAVEN WERE OPENED.” The opening of the windows of heaven can mean nothing but the pouring down of the waters above the firmament.

As to the means by which the waters were precipitated to the earth, it does not become me to speak dogmatically. But it is enough to know that a large comet passing in the immediate vicinity of the earth would be cause sufficient to incline the poles to the ecliptic, cast down the waters by deranging the balance of centripetal and centrifugal attraction, and thus deluge the earth and produce an alternation of seasons by one single act.

There could be no bow before the deluge, for there was no rain. There could be none during the deluge, for the rain was then universal, and there was no sunny side on which to form a bow.

But as soon as the deluge was finished, God set the bow in the cloud; not by creating a new law of light, but only by that change of circumstances which brought it into action. The law of light by which the refraction of the sun's rays at a certain angle produces the rainbow is doubtless eternal—immutable—essential to the existence of light itself, and therefore could not have been produced by the exercise of creative power even, at the time of the deluge. It must have been in existence as a scientific truth as long as light had a being.

The same act which precipitated the waters above the firmament to the earth, also broke up the fountains of the great deep. For the attractive power of a comet or other heavenly body sufficient to change the position of the earth in its orbit would produce a tide even in the inland seas of the Antediluvian earth sufficient to inundate all the low grounds about their shores.

A question will be raised, how does it happen that the water does not now cover the whole earth? For, says the sacred writer, “the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered.” Gen. vii. 19, 20.

This objection is predicated upon the theory that the water stood at a dead level fifteen cubits above the tops of the mountains. Such a theory is not warranted by the language of the sacred historian. The waters prevailed fifteen cubits where the writer speaks of; probably where the ark was; but in regard to the high hills and the tops of the mountains, we are only assured that they were covered. After this (Gen. viii.) we learn that the waters abated, but we do not learn that any part of them were returned to the heavens, or in any way removed, except by abating; that is, sinking down to their natural level. In thus sinking down the present division of land and water, with some slight differences, was doubtless formed, without any diminution of the quantity of water, which, in the act of precipitation, “covered the tops of the highest mountains,” so as to destroy everything “that had the breath of life.”

After the deluge, the Lord said, “I will not any more curse the ground for man's sake, neither will I again smite every living thing, as I have done.” And the earth having lost its perennial productiveness, in the alternation of seasons, which was established by the change of the direction of the earth's axis, he promised farther, (Gen. vii. 22,) “While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease." This is the first mention in all human records, of any such changes.— They were new facts, founded on the new state of the earth, and the promise was that the earth should not be any farther cursed, so as to take away the advantages it then possessed.

Agreeing with this hypothesis is the fact that throughout all northern Europe and Asia the skeletons of elephants and other animals peculiar to the tropics are found in vast abundance. Indeed, not many years since the carcass of an elephant was discovered imbedded in a vast mass of ice near North Cape in Norway, in a state of nearly perfect preservation. It was first brought to light by the sliding off of a vast avalanche, undermined by the constant washing of the sea. The flesh was being devoured by the bears as fast as it thawed out, but so perfect was its preservation that almost the entire hide, as well as the skeleton, were preserved for the royal museum. This carcass, previous to the abrasion of the ice, was imbedded several hundred feet beneath the surface of snow and ice, where it had been left at the abating of the waters of the deluge, frozen by the first frosts, and covered by the first snows ever witnessed on the earth.

There are places where the waters are constantly wearing away the coasts of Greenland, and imbedded in ice, and covered with snows, are cane brakes as regular as any on the Mississippi, and of as luxuriant a growth as those of Central America. These must have grown, as the animals lived, at a period when the polar regions had a tropical climate; that is, in the Antediluvian world.

In the Delta of the Mississippi, the Niger and several other large rivers, forests are found standing where they grew, buried in the alluvian which has been accumulating for ages, and remaining perfect in their structure to about sea level. Those forests are extensive in Louisiana, and in the lower part of the State the trees are found entire. Further up the tops are rotted away down to sea level, but in either places if you dig down to the roots they are found to stand in the soil where they grew.— These forests must have grown when the surface of the ocean was below where their roots now are.

Geologists have attempted to account for the existence of these forests by supposing that the ground has sunk since they grew. But it is a well known fact that the down-sinking, and up-rising of the earth goes on so very slowly as to be scarcely perceptible in a generation.— Consequently if these grounds had merely sunk by the burning out of internal fires, (as the countries bordering on the German ocean are supposed to be,) the forests would have utterly wasted long before the waters rose over them so as to preserve them.

Unquestionably these forests are Antediluvian. They grew on their present level, and were drowned out, and preserved from decay by the waters of the ocean, which was filled up at the subsiding of the deluge so as to cover them; those portions of the forest not entirely submerged rotting off near the surface of the water, and preserved merely the stumps. The annual deposit of mud since that time have filled up these narrow and shallow portions of the ocean, and made Del-tas where were formerly the estuaries of the great rivers.

This hypothesis stands with the account given by the sacred historian, both of the creation, the history of the Antediluvians and the deluge. It agrees with a vast mass of facts discovered by the scientific in modern times in the geology of the earth. It makes the flood a possible and probable fact, which would otherwise be incredible and impossible. And I submit that the various facts and circumstances referred to in the course of this article, show it not merely possible and probable, but true.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATIONS.

The election canvass for President of the United States, it seems, is to take place between Mr. Pierce and Gen. Scott. Neither of them is the choice of even a majority of the party that has put him in nomination, and the result of the canvass depends entirely on appliances, yet to be put in requisition. The former was put in nomination merely because the sages of the Democratic party could not agree upon any distinguished statesman; and is recommended by moderate talents, and a career in Congress barely respectable, but more especially by being unknown. The latter, by the petulant childishness of old age, vanity and habitual ill temper, and by distinguished success and acknowledged ability both as a tactician and a fighting General.

Pierce is in nomination because it is supposed nothing can be said against him, and Scott because it is believed that the fame of his deeds of blood will blind the people to his total want of qualifications for the office.— We can get along very well either with or without either, and don't care the value of the ink that prints this article which is elected.

SMALL POTATOES.

H. W. GRANGER, the man who slipped out of the office of Sheriff of Mackinac Co. last winter, at the late term of the District Court at Mackinac, contrived to get himself and brother-in-law, and a few others of similar kidney, upon the Grand Jury, and then gratified their malice upon Mr. STRANG by finding a bill against him.

A warrant was issued, and Mr. S. arrested; and though only charged with a slight misdemeanor, twice the amount of bail was demanded that he gave last summer on two indictments for felony, twelve for misdemeanor, and a charge of treason hanging over him.

Well, Mr. Strang did not give bail, nor go to prison, nor escape. There is no jail in Mackinac Co., and the county had neither cash nor credit to send him to Detroit, and the officer having him in custody was under the necessity of letting him go at large, on his own undertaking to return at the next term of the Court.

What a farce the administration of justice has become. Here is a man so respectable in all the relations of life that in his own town he regularly, at all times, receives a unanimous vote for any office for which he will allow his name to go before the public; who is invariably applied to in case of disagreement as the arbitrator and peacemaker by all his neighbors for thirty miles in every direction, without regard to either political or religious distinctions; and who stands on the assessment roll of his own town for more than $2,000, and three times as much more in other places; required to give, besides his own recognizance, as much security as is usually exacted of notorious felons—merely to answer to a malicious charge of some petty misdemeanor, which the very jury who indicted him for it say he can never be convicted of, because there is no evidence against him.

And pretty jurymen these are who, after taking the grand jurymen's oath, go into the street and say, "we have stuck it to so and so." "Why? what was proved against him?" "Oh, nothing that hit him in particular, but we thought he must be in with the rest of them; at any rate he will hear of it, and be putting out for fear of an arrest." Not quite so fast, sir, perjured juror; Mr. Strang will attend Courts in Mackinac longer than you will wish to see him there.

THE LIQUOR LAW.

The Legislature of the State of Michigan at its last session passed a very stringent liquor law. Whether they intended that it should ever be enforced or not is more than we know or care. It is quite certain that all public officers are required to take an oath to faithfully do the duties of their offices. And here at least such oaths are taken to be kept. Among the duties of the Supervisor is that of prosecuting for various penalties incurred in his township, including penalties for the violations of the liquor law. And one Supervisor will not fail to do his duty in this, as in all other cases.

So far three judgments have been recovered, and one suit is pending. But so far has corruption gone that men of respectability have no shame to practice it. Numerous men of respectability have urged upon us the propriety of leaving the law a dead letter, saying that if traders here could not furnish liquor, their customers would go to Mackinac for it; as though the violation of an oath was to be winked at for the interest of traders.

Thank God, we are permitted to live in a community where perjury is not so cheap. Only a few days since a Wisconsin editor called personally on the Supervisor, and entreated him to abstain from prosecuting a friend of his, and gave as a reason that such things made the Mormons unpopular. So may they ever be, if popularity is to be purchased at that price.

STAGE OF THE WATER.

Lake Michigan is at the present time probably higher than it has been at any time in a century. Much of the Lake shore is flooded over the entire beach, to the edge of the timber, and the border trees are rapidly washing out. On high bluff shores, land slides are frequent and extensive. Low swampy grounds are overflowed from the lake. We observed on Whiskey Point a tamarack not less than one hundred years old, with 18 inches water around it. It could never have grown with the water so high by a foot, and is of itself conclusive evidence of a most extraordinary stage of water.

The building formerly occupied as a store at Whiskey Point is drowned out. The supply of water is even better than that of whiskey was, for it is over the floor and fills the yard in front, and the dock is all washed away except a little pile of brush and gravel.

THE FISHERIES.

The present season has been very unfavorable to the taking of fish. The vast amount of ice which formed last winter has kept the waters of the lakes cold probably a full month later than usual, and the fishing begins later in proportion, and the carelessness of the fishermen in throwing offal and filth into the water, has tended to drive the fish from the shores. At stations where the fishermen formerly set their nets only a half mile out, they now go out six and eight miles. So far they have taken very few fish at any place, except Gull Island; and many have left to try their fortunes at other places.

In truth, these fisheries require a little rest to recover from the consequences of the bad management and filthiness of the fishermen.

We advise all gentlemen who are under the necessity of traveling on the steamer J. D. Morton to hire some clown to go along as company for the officers. It would not be amiss for such as have anything valuable aboard, to take a few handsome boxes of—nothing valuable, for the accommodation of the thieves employed on board. Persons taking this precaution may be assured that when they get ashore they will be satisfied to keep off that boat, even though the Capt. may have gone a dozen miles out of his way to land them so far from where they wished to stop, in violation of express contract.

DENNIS CHIDESTER, Esq., has received the appointment of Post Master at Beaver Island, in place of Peter McKinley, removed. Mr. McKinley is in arrears to the department for the whole amount of funds accruing while in office, and has involved his predecessor, for whom he acted as assistant, for a small amount. We don't know as less could have been expected of him, for this office and some two or three hundred dollars cash is all the reward he received for committing perjury in the famous government prosecution of the Mormons.

Almost every boat brings a few emigrants. The settlements are extending over the entire Island. A very extensive tract of most beautiful land in the southwestern part of the Island is now attracting general attention. The emigrants from below Lake Ontario are generally selecting it for their home.

We believe it was the Clerk of the Propeller May Flower who kept watch for some eight hours over the rawest and coarsest sample of a young Dutchman, and then made a very particular personal examination to ascertain whether he was not one of Mr. Strang's wives, in disguise! Long live humbug.

The Hon. Daniel Goodwin is in the Upper Peninsula holding the first terms of the District Court in the several organized counties. If any man can maintain the dignity of an elective judiciary he can.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

An Inquest was held last Sabbath on the body of a man found floating in the harbor, which proved to be that of Peletiah Barter, a respectable citizen of this place, who fell from a foot-way and was drowned late last fall. The body has probably been fast under the timbers of the old dock, and thereby kept from rising.

PUBLIC EDUCATION AND THE INCREASE OF CRIME.

The following extract from Noah's Sunday Times merits the most serious consideration. The editor primarily refers to the State of New York; but his remarks apply generally, with greater or less force, to every State in this Union.

"If any man believes that our system of free education will of itself, in a few generations, accomplish a great moral revolution in society, he believes a fallacy.— We are frequently told that public instruction is the grand panacea for vice. Neither common sense nor experience warrants the conclusion. The number of our free schools and of the children attending has been doubled within a few years. Does crime decrease? No: on the contrary, it has been increasing for some time past with frightful rapidity. Is society in this country becoming more depraved, then, as the light of education is more freely and generally diffused? We can only answer the question by pointing to the criminal calendar.

In this State the number of murders committed during the last ten years has been more than five times greater, we are told, than during the ten years preceding. This is out of all proportion to the growth of our population, and shows clearly that there must be 'a screw loose somewhere.' Where is it? Some philosophers hold that education itself is demoralizing, and that the 'lower orders' are much happier when utterly ignorant than they have been since the seals have been taken from the fountains of knowledge, and the children of the lowly were invited to drink without money and without price.

Men who reason thus, have microscopic intellects. They see an evil, and instead of tracing it to its true source, they put it down as the result of a concomitant blessing, simply because the two exist together. Public education fails to work out its legitimate object, because it is not assisted and sustained by the action of public men and the honest administration of justice.—Vice patronized by authority, encouraged by perversion of law, bad laws, and for want of better laws, is too strong for our common school system, too strong for the church, too strong for the moral strength of the better part of the community.

The weakness, corruption, and poltroonery which overshadow the judicial, legislative, and executive departments of our city government, breed crime faster than the richest bed of compost can raise mushrooms. Give us just and competent local legislators and magistrates, a powerful, fearless, incorruptible police, and let abuse of all kinds be put down with an impartial arm. Give our glorious system of public education this aid, and let us see what it will do. Root out the tares, and afford the good seed a chance to yield its harvest."

This is precisely the view we have had of the matter for a long time. Education alone will never abolish, or even diminish vice. When the unrighteous rule the people are corrupted. The only panacea for the ills that are now praying upon society, is a righteous government. Not merely laws just of themselves, but an administration of them by men who really enter into the spirit of the system, and honestly seek to enforce the entire law as it is, and nothing short of it will prevent a growth of crime among an enlightened people. There is probably no country on earth where the law is as much despised as in the United States, where education is the most general. Certainly there is none where the criminal calendar is as large, and none where the chance of escape from just punishment is greater.

The theory of American republicanism is, that the rulers being chosen by the whole people, the governed will seek just and upright men for their own safety and security. But in practice men who are most entangled in the law do not always find safety and security in an upright administration of just laws. Quite as often vicious legislation and a lax and corrupt administration is the only security of those who can control the elections.

The democratic principle does not stop at putting good and bad men on a level. In theory they are equal before the law, because each has one vote. But in practice a vicious man may resort to many devices to obtain votes for his favorite candidate which no honest man could for a moment think of.

Consequently it has happened in several instances, particularly in the United States, that bands of blacklegs have succeeded in getting the entire control of a county and electing all the officers from among themselves.

But the more common abuse is that large bands of corrupt men, led by shrewd scamps, obtain a position where they hold the balance between political parties, and will invariably defeat any set of candidates for office, who are inimical to them. Men of respectability and ordinarily honest intentions are thus compelled to wink at their vices or retire in disgrace and defeat from public preferment.

By this means the worst offenders exercise a kind of self protecting power over the government of all the large cities. Some of their creatures are invariably quartered on the police department and become spies of thieves, burglars, counterfeiters upon the ministers of justice and keep their employers advised of all approaching danger.

An elective judiciary has aggravated those evils in many ways. Powerful interests and combinations, having interests likely to be involved in litigation, will find means of probing the intentions of judicial as well as political candidates, and the votes they control will be cast accordingly. Heretofore the stream of corruption has followed with steadily increasing volume, but the flood-gates are opened. We hate the poor and the penniless when the opulent and the unscrupulous go to law against him.

HORRID MASSACRE BY SAVAGES.

A Maulmain paper contains an account of a shocking massacre, and the destruction of vessels, at one of the Nicobar Islands, detailed in an affidavit made before the assistant-commissioner of the Tenasserim Provinces, on the 13th of February, 1852, by Malim Sahio, a merchant, and master of the brig Safreena, who had picked up, whilst lying off Noncowry, on the 20th of January last, floating on a log of wood, a Ceringee, named Soobooroyloo, who stated that he was one of a crew of forty-five men belonging to a Coringee craft.

Before her cargo could be completed, she was surrounded by a number of armed boats, whose crews boarded and carried her, and put most of her people to death; that he saved his life by swimming to the shore; but that he was taken and imprisoned by the natives upwards of two months. Soobooroyloo also states that his was not the only ship that had been attacked by the natives of Noncowry, for, after he had been a month on shore, an English barque came into the harbor formed by the Island of Noncowry, Camaratta and Trincutty, and anchored there.

For four or five days a number of boats, more and more every day, went off to her; at last one day Soobooroyloo saw her settle down and sink. Her long boat came ashore full of Noncowry men; they brought with them a European lady and her child, a little baby not two years old.—For four days the poor lady was the victim of their brutal abuse, when death put an end to her sufferings; and she was no sooner dead than they hacked the child to pieces with their knives.—Before he left the island, Soobooroyloo fell in with three men.—He found they were his countrymen, Coringees, and they proved to be the remnant of the crew of the English barque. They told him that their vessel had been carried and scuttled by the savages, who murdered the captain and his mate, and two other Englishmen (passengers, it is presumed) and after plundering the vessel, had brought the captain's wife and his infant daughter away in the long-boat. They could not tell the name of the barque, but she was from Calcutta with a Lascar crew.

FAITHFULNESS TO A SUPERSTITION.

Pecos, once a fortified town, is built on a promontory or rock, somewhat in the shape of a foot. Here burned, until within seven years, the eternal fires of Montezumas, and the remains of the architecture exhibit in a prominent manner, the engraftment of the Catholic church upon the ancient religion of the country.—At one end of the short spur forming the terminus of the promontory, are remains of estufa; (stove or furnace for preservation of the eternal fire) with all its parts distinct; at the other are the remains of the Catholic church, both showing the distinctive marks and emblems of the religions. The fires from the estufa burned and sent their incense through the same altars from which was preached the doctrine of Christ. Two religions so utterly different in theory were here, as in all Mexico, blended in harmonious practice until about a century since, when the town was sacked by a band of Indians. Amidst the havoc of plunder, the faithful Indian managed to keep his fire burning in the estufa, and it was continued till a few years since, when the tribe became almost extinct.—Their devotions rapidly diminished their numbers, until they became so few as to be unable to keep their immense estufa (forty feet in diameter) replenished, when they abandoned the place and joined a tribe of the original race over the mountains, sixty miles south. There, it is said, to this day they keep their fire, which has never yet been extinguished. The labor, of watchfulness, and exposure to heat, consequent on this practice of their faith, is fast reducing this remnant of the Montezuma race; and a few years will, in all probability, see the last of this interesting people.—Emery's Military Reconnoissance.

A SINGULAR CASE.

A most singular case was detailed to us yesterday, of a man who has been suffering under a long fit of sickness, and who was at the time partially deranged, visiting a gambling house and winning some $265. It seems that he went to bed at an early hour, and sometime during the night got up and went into a place where "faro" was being dealt. He bet $5 on a card, and then let it lay until he had won the above amount, when he took it up and returned to his hotel. A friend called on him next day to congratulate him upon his "luck" when he was informed by the person that he had no money—that he had visited no gambling house. He was told that he had, and a search was immediately made for the money, which was afterwards found secreted in a centre table, which stood in the parlor, where the person no doubt had unconsciously placed it. He would not believe it, when he was told the money belonged to him, as he had not the remotest recollection of ever having had it in his possession. The above is related as detailed to us, and if it is not correct it is no fault of ours.—O. S. Journal.

GOSPEL.

Every person in every degree acquainted with the Jewish history, as written in the scriptures, knows, that God, previous to the days of the Savior's coming in the flesh, was withdrawing from that people, and that he continued to do so until they were abandoned to destruction.

But God never withdraws from a people for adhering to the order of things he established among them; for while they all adhere to him he cleaves to them. Had the Jews, in truth and verity, continued to observe the law as God delivered it unto them, and to have believed the prophets who were sent unto them, God would have continued with them, and they would have known their Messiah when he came, and have entered into his kingdom and have found rest, and continued the people of God, even favorites of heaven, until this day. But instead of their doing so, they changed their temple from being a house of prayer, to be a house of merchandise, and a den of thieves. Matthew, 21st chap. 12th and 13th verses. Mark 11th chap. 15th, 16th and 17th verses. Luke, 19th chap. 45th verse. They made void the law by their traditions; and stoned the prophets that were sent unto them. Matthew 23d chap. 37th verse. Whatever was saving in their institutions they rejected, and defiled, until destruction came on them to the very uttermost. This was their situation when the Savior came among them, and such their condition when he commissioned the apostles to go and preach the gospel to them; and not to them only, but to every creature in all the world also.

The apostle Paul in the epistle to the Romans, gives us a minute description of both the Gentiles and the Jews in his day; in the 1st chap. commencing with the 20 verse, he thus describes the state of the Gentiles, "Because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible men, and to birds, and four footed beasts, and creeping things.—Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, through the lust of their own hearts to dishonor their own bodies between themselves: who changed the truth of God into a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Amen." The apostle continues his description of the Gentiles to the close of the chapter, which the reader may examine at his leisure, and he will see that the picture is one of no very pleasing character.

From the description here given of the Gentiles, we learn this fact, that the Gentiles had previously known God; for when they knew God, says the apostle, they worshiped him not as God, &c. This is evidence positive, that the Gentiles had turned away from the knowledge of God, and were apostates from the truth.

In the 3d chap. of this same epistle, he gives a description of the Jews also, commencing with the 9th verse to the close of the 18th, we have the following description. What then? are we better than they? No in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin, as it is written. There is none righteous, no, not one. There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable: there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips; whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. Their feet are swift to shed blood. Destruction and misery are in their ways: and the way of peace have they not known. There is no fear of God before their eyes."

In the 19th verse he says, "Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law, that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God." In so saying the apostle gives his readers to understand that the preceding quotations, taken from the Psalms, were applicable to the Jews and to the Jews only; for they were the persons to whom the law was given, and they, and they only, were under the law, "Now what things soever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law." So the apostles make a direct application of what he here said to the Jews, as they were the people, and the only people, who were under the law.

Such is the light in which God viewed the world, both Jew and Gentile, when he sent the apostles among them to bring them back to the principles of righteousness, from whence they had strayed; for God considered them all, not only under sin, but in a state of apostasy also.

Let the world have made what advances it might in literature, science or philosophy, in relation to eternal life—their case was deplorable; for instead of their being in a situation to be saved, they were in a situation to be destroyed: instead of being redeemed, they were in a situation to be condemned: for so had the whole world, both Jew and Gentile, apostatized from the living God, that there was not a sufficiency of righteousness to save one creature in all the world.

Whatever improvement, therefore, the Jews or the Gentiles might have made in worldly matters, they were in a situation in which they could make no advances towards eternal life, only by receiving the apostles, and submitting themselves to their guidance and direction, however humiliating this might have been to them. But so it was, that to the fishermen of Galilee they must come, and to them they must submit, or else they must be damned.

So closely does the God of heaven adhere to his plan of saving men, that nothing will be admitted as a substitute for his ordinance and institutions, no services but those of his own appointment will tend in the least degree to save men. The Jews might lay heavy burdens on each other's shoulders, subject themselves to many privations, make many prayers, and pay tithes of all they possessed, but when done, it would leave them short of eternal life!—to the fishermen of Galilee they must go, or be saved they could not. The Gentiles might lacerate their bodies, offer their children in sacrifice, or subject themselves to the severest scourgings, buffetings, or burnings; they might form books of morals, codes of laws, systems of government, or modes of worship, but all in vain, it would not give them eternal life; nor could they by any means obtain the salvation of God, only through and by the fishermen of Galilee: for their commission was to every creature in all the world, and he who did not believe them, should be damned; for there was no other gospel; no other scheme of things, nor no other form of worship, that had eternal life as their reward, but the gospel proclaimed by the apostles, and the forms of worship taught by them.

It is worthy of remark that while the twenty-three millions of people in the United States use 150,000,000 lbs. of coffee annually, the twenty seven millions in Great Britain and Ireland use only 32,000,000 lbs.

It is probable, if not absolutely certain, that the Universal Yankee Nation use more tea, coffee and ardent spirits, in proportion to the population, than any other people on earth. Free institution individual "goahead-iveness" and pockets full of dimes lead to excess in the luxuries of life.—The love of excitement, so peculiarly characteristic of Americans, requires stimulants, and hence sober gentlemen and venerable spinsters consume coffee and tea ad libitum, while the more jovial and reckless pour down the ardent with the freedom of a freeman.

The excessive use of these creature comforts resulting in abuse may account for the fact that Americans, as a race, are about the shortest-lived people, pretending to civilization. Pills, balsams, and all other productions of human ingenuity, intended for the benefit of individuals, have not availed to lengthen the days of Young America. But we did not intend to go into a discussion of tea, coffee and ardent spirits, but merely to show how grateful Brother Johnathan should be at the thought of being able to consume more of these luxuries than "the rest of mankind."—Utica (N. Y.) Observer.

"Many a young lady who objects to be kissed under the mistletoe, has no objection to be kissed under the rose." A stupid compositor once made an error in the above, rendering it so as to say, "has no objection to being kissed under the nose!"—How natural.

There are nineteen thousand five hundred practising lawyers in the United States.

A PETTIFOGGER BLUFFED.

At a trial of a trespass case before one of the magistrates of Rochester, a long loose jointed canal boy—whose pants were too short at both ends, one tail off, and minus both sleeves—was sworn as to what he knew in the case. His evidence spread the guilt of the defendant rather too thick for the counsel, so the latter commenced with a browbeating, consequential air, his cross-examination:

"Well, sir."

"My name ain't sur, no how."

"Boy, then."

"I'm no boy, nuther."

"It is lad, then?"

"Not egzkaly."

"Then what in thunder do they call you?"

"Ragged-tailed Bill—Hoss."

"Well Ragged-tailed Bill, Hoss, what time of day was this you speak of?"

"I don't know egzakly; about ten miles after sunrise."

"I hope the court will oblige this witness to answer my questions."

Court—"Bill, explain to the gentleman what you mean."

"Well, I had drove ten miles since sunrise, and we go about two and a half miles an hour; let him find out by his learning."

"What business does plaintiff follow?"

"I don't know anysich a man."

"What! don't know what plaintiff means!"

"No, no more nor you knows what time of day ten miles after sunrise is."

The laugh began to be against the counsel, but he brightened up and made fight again.

"Now tell me, Bill, where all this happened?"

"I've told you once on Loafer bridge."

"Who was there, besides the parties?"

"Oh, a whole parcel of loafers."

"Well, what were they doing?"

"Why, I s'pose loafing about."

"So, on Loafer Bridge, a whole parcel of loafers were loafing about. Is that all you know about it?"

Here the witness stooped down to get his hands into his pantaloons pockets, and looking up said: "That's um."

The laugh was against the counsel; he pocketed his papers and was non est.

Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment. Cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, filling it with a steady and perpetual serenity.

There is no destruction worse than to overpraise a man; for if his worth prove short of what report doth speak of him, his own actions are ever giving the lie to his own honor.

Punch's Pocket Book says, "I am tempted to compare high life to a railroad. It is very delightful while all goes on smoothly. But if you get off the rail, the smash is awful."

A TRUE STORY.

BY C. D. STUART.

Not many years ago, a young lad, the son of a poor farmer, living near Crich Church, fancied, or rather dreamed, that if he would go up to London by way of London Bridge, he would find a fortune. Now, London was a great way from Crich Church, especially to a poor lad, ignorant of geography and travel, and living in an age before railroads. So he put away the strange dream from his mind; yet again and again it returned, until the poor lad became so excited that he could no longer delay visiting London. But he had told none of his dream, nor of his intention to go to London, for he well knew every one would ridicule the dream, and his father would prohibit him from visiting London on so foolish an errand. So he kept his own secret and counsel, and, early one pleasant morning, set out on his adventure. It was a weary long way, but he footed it bravely, only resting by day to eat the simple meal of bread and cheese he had provided in his small pack, and resting by night whenever road side shelter offered.

At last he came in sight of London. Our poor lad was not a little bewildered by the great show of St. Paul's Church, the London Column and Tower, with many other marvelous sights, but uppermost in his mind was his dream; and he wondered how London Bridge could be connected with the fortune of one so humble as he. By dint of persevering inquiry, he found the bridge, determined to cross the Thames in no other way. Once on the bridge, he looked on every side, but no fortune appeared. He only saw crowds of people going to and fro, never minding him. Faint with travel and mortification, having for hours walked up and down the bridge, he was turning his face homeward, satisfied that his dream was like all dreams, a cheat, when a ragged boy, of his own size, accosted him with, "What for are you searching London Bridge all day? have you lost a bob?" meaning by "bob" a small coin.

"Nay," said the dreamer, "I have come up here, because I dreamed that if I went to London Bridge, I should find my fortune." "Oh, ha!" replied the ragged stranger, "if I were to follow all my dreams, I should have had a dozen fortunes long ago. It was only last night I dreamed that if I would go to Chuckstone Cross, and dig under it, I should find a bag of gold; but blame me if believe in dreams, besides I don't know if there is such a place as Chuckstone Cross in the world."

The dreamer caught a sudden light from this confession, and, without more ado, and bidding the stranger boy good by, strode back for Chuckstone Cross, which was near by his father's house, "for," he said to himself, "perhaps this was the fortune which I was to find on London Bridge."

Hope made his feet light, and he was soon at Chuckstone Cross. When night came, and all was still, he crept from his bed, in his father's house, and stealing out slyly to the cross, he fell to work, removing the stone, and digging up the hard earth. It was not long before he struck upon something chinky, and directly out came a fine bag of gold pieces, in all many thousand pounds.

Thus the poor lad, obeying his persistent dream, found his fortune; and beyond all doubt, all our former speculations to the contrary notwithstanding, the cross was originally erected by the person or persons who buried the gold, as they naturally conjectured a cross the last thing likely to be disturbed, while it was a good durable mark over their deposit. But, though the fortune was found, by following a dream in this instance, we doubt whether it is safe or well to trust too much in dreams, since dreams are generally shadows of our waking hours—mere phantoms of our own conjuration—still, if any of our readers do dream persistently, and think their dreams worth tracing out, let them be careful how they reveal them to others, as the ragged Londoner did to the poor country lad who found what, with more curiosity and secretiveness, might have been another's fortune, under Chuckstone Cross.—Whitney's Republic.

"You labor over-much on composition, Doctor," said a clergyman to an eminent divine. "I write a sermon in three hours, and make nothing of it."

"So your congregation say," quietly quoth the doctor.

"Here, waiter, let me have a couple of decent candles, that I may see how those others burn!"

TAHMIROO;

OR, THE STARTLED FAWN.
A TALE OF THE RED INDIANS.

Tahmiroo was the daughter of one of the most powerful chieftains of the Sioux Indians; and she was the only being ever known to turn the restless old man from a savage purpose.—Something of this influence was owing to her infantile beauty; but more to the gentleness of which that beauty was the emblem. Her's was a species of loveliness rare among Indian girls. Her figure had the flexible graces so appropriate to protected womanhood in refined countries; her ripe pouting lip and dimpled cheek wore the pleading air of aggrieved childhood; and her dark eye had such an habitual expression of timidity and fear, that the young Sioux called her the "Startled Fawn."

I know not whether her father's broad lands, or her own appealing beauty, was the most powerful cause of admiration; certain it is, Tahmiroo was the unrivalled belle of the Sioux. She was a creature all formed for love. Her downcast eye, her trembling lip, and her quiet, submissive motion, all spoke its language; yet various young chieftains had in vain sought her affections; and when her father urged her to strengthen his power by an alliance, she answered him only by her tears.

This state of things continued until 1765, when a company of French traders came to reside there, for the sake of deriving profit from the fur trade. Among them was Florimond de Rance, a young, indolent Adonis, whom pure ennui had led him from Quebec to the falls of St. Anthony. His fair, round face, and studied foppery of dress, might have done little toward gaining the heart of the gentle Sioux; but there was a deference and courtesy in his manner which the Indians never pay to degraded woman; and Tahmiroo's deep sensibilities were touched by it.

A more careful arrangement of her rude dress, an anxiety to speak his language fluently, and a close observance of European customs, soon betrayed the subtle power that was fast making her his slave. The ready vanity of the Frenchman quickly perceived it. At first he encouraged it with that sort of undefined pleasure which man always feels in awakening strong affection in the hearts of the most insignificant. Then the idea that, though the was an Indian, she was a princess, and that her father's extensive lands on the Missouri were daily becoming of more and more consequence to his ambitious nation, led him to think of marriage with her as a desirable object. His eyes and his manner had said this long before the old chief began to suspect it, and he allowed the wily Frenchman to twine himself almost as closely around his heart as he had around the more yielding soul of his darling child.

Though exceedingly indolent by nature, Florimond de Rance had acquired skill in many graceful arts which excited the wonder of the savages. He fenced well enough to foil the most expert antagonist; and in hunting, his rifle was sure to carry death to the game. These accomplishments and the facility with which his pliant nation conformed to the usages of savage life made him an universal favorite, and at his request he was formally adopted as one of the tribe. But, conscious of his power, it was long before he dared to ask for the daughter of the haughty chief. When he did make the daring proposition, it was received with a still and terrible wrath, that might well frighten him from his purpose. Rage showed itself in the swelling veins and clenched hand of the old chief.

With the boasted coolness and self-possession of an Indian, he answered—

"There are Sioux girls enough for the poor pale faces that come among us. A king's daughter weds the son of a king. Eagles must sleep in an eagle's nest."

In vain Tahmiroo knelt and supplicated. In vain she promised that Florimond de Rance would adopt all his enmities and all his friendships; that in bunting and in war he would be an invaluable treasure. The chief was inexorable. Then Tahmiroo no longer joined in the dance, and the old men noticed that her voice was silent when they passed her wigwam. The light of her beauty began to fade, and the bright vermilion current which mantled under her brown cheek became sluggish and pale. The languid glance she cast on the morning sun and the bright earth entered into her father's soul. He could not see his beautiful child thus gradually wasting away. He had long averted his glance whenever he saw Florimond de Rance; but one day, when he crossed his hunting path, he laid his hand on his shoulder, and pointed to Tahmiroo's dwelling. Not a word was spoken.—The proud man and blooming lover entered it together. Tahmiroo was seated in the darkest corner of the wigwam, her head leaning on her arm, her basket work tangled beside her, and a bunch of flowers the village maidens had brought her scattered withering at her feet. The chief looked upon her with a vehement expression of love, which none but stern countenances can wear.

"Tahmiroo," he said, in a subdued tone, "go to the wigwam of the stranger, that your father may again see you love to look at the rising sun and the opening flowers."

There was mingled joy and modesty in the upward glance of the Startled Fawn of the Sioux; and when Florimond de Rance saw the light of her mild eye suddenly and timidly veiled by its deeply fringed lid, he knew that he had lost none of his power. The marriage song was soon heard in the royal wigwam, and the young adventurer became the son of a king. Months and years passed on, and found Tahmiroo the same devoted, submissive being. Her husband no longer treated her with the uniform gallantry of a lover. He was not often harsh, but he adopted something of the coldness and indifference of the nation he had joined. Tahmiroo sometimes wept in secret; but so much of fear had lately mingled with her love, that she carefully concealed it from him who had occasioned it.—When she watched his countenance with that pleading innocent look which had always characterized her beauty, she sometimes would obtain a glance such as he had given her in former days, and then her heart would leap like a frolicsome lamb, and she would live cheerful on the remembrance of that smile, through many wearisome days of silence and neglect.

Never was a woman, in heart-breaking devotedness, satisfied with such slight testimonials of love, as this gentle Sioux girl.—If Florimond chose to fish, she would herself ply the oars, rather than he should suffer fatigue; and the gaudy canoe her father had given her, might often be seen gliding down the stream, while Tahmiroo dipped her oars in unison with her soft, rich voice, and the indolent Frenchman lay sunk in luxuriant repose. She had learned his religion; but for herself she never prayed. The cross he had given her was always raised in supplication for him; and if he looked unkindly on her, she kissed it, and invoked its aid in agony of soul. She fancied the sounds of his native land might be dear to him, and she studied his language with a patience and perseverance to which a savage has seldom been known to submit. She tried to imitate the dress she had heard him describe; and if he looked with a pleasant eye on any ornament she wore, it was always reserved to welcome his return.—Yet, for all this lavishness of love, she asked but kind, approving looks, which cost the giver nothing. Alas, for the perverseness of man, in scorning the affection he ceases to doubt. The little pittance of love for which poor Tahmiroo's heart yearned so much was seldom given. Her soul was a perpetual prey to anxiety and excitement; and the quiet certainty of domestic bliss was never her allotted portion.

There were, however, two beings on whom she could pour forth her whole flood of tenderness, without reproof or disappointment. She had given birth to a son and daughter of uncommon promise. Victoire, the eldest, had her father's beauty, save in the melting dark eye, with its plaintive expression, and the modest drooping of its silken lash. Her cheeks had just enough of the Indian to give them a warm rich coloring; and such was her early maturity, that at thirteen years of age, her tall figure combined the graceful elasticity of youth with the staid majesty of womanhood. She had sprung up at her father's feet with the sudden luxuriance of a tropical flower; and her matured loveliness aroused all the dormant tenderness and energy within him. It was with mournful interest he saw her leaping along the chase, with her mother's bounding, sylph-like joy; and he would sigh deeply when he saw her oar rapidly cutting the waters of the Missouri, while her boat flew over the river like a wild bird in sport—and the gay young creature would wind among the eddies, or dart forward, with her hair streaming on the wind, and her lips parted with eagerness.—Tahmiroo did not understand the nature of his emotions. She thought, in the simplicity of her heart, that silence and sadness were the natural expressions of a white man's love; but when he turned his restless gaze from his daughter to her, she met an expression which troubled her.—Indifference had changed into contempt; and woman's soul, whether in the drawing room or the wilderness, is painfully alive to the sting of scorn. Sometimes her placid nature was disturbed by a strange jealousy of her own child.

"I love Victoire only because she is the daughter of Florimond," thought she, "and why, Oh! why, does he not love me for being the mother of Victoire?"

It was too evident that de Rance wished his daughter to be estranged from her mother and her mother's people. With all members of the tribe out of his family he forbade any intercourse; and even there he kept her employed in taking dancing lessons from himself, and obtaining various branches of learning from an old Catholic priest, whom he had solicited to reside with him for that purpose. But that kind of life was irksome to the Indian girl, and she was perpetually escaping the vigilance of her father, to try her arrow in the woods, or guide her pretty canoe over the waters. De Rance had long thought it impossible to gratify his ambitious views for his daughter, without removing her from the attractions of her savage home, and each day's experience convinced him more and more of the truth of this conclusion.—

To favor his project he assumed an affectionate manner towards his wife; for he well knew that one look of kindness would win back all her love. When the deep sensibilities of her warm heart were aroused, he would ask for leave to sell her lands; and she, in her prodigality of tenderness, would have given him anything, even her own life, for such smiles as he then bestowed.

The old chief was dead, and there was no one to check the unfeeling rapacity of the Frenchman. Tracts after tracts of Tahmiroo's valuable land were sold, and the money remitted to Quebec, whither he had the purpose of conveying his children, on the pretence of a visit but in reality with the firm intent of never again beholding his deserted wife. A company of Canadian traders happened to visit the falls of St. Anthony just at this juncture, and Florimond took the opportunity to apprise Tahmiroo of his intention to educate Victoire at one of the convents in Quebec.—The Sioux pleaded with all the earnestness of a mother's eloquence; but she pleaded in vain. Victoire and her father joined the company of traders on their return to Canada. Tahmiroo knelt and fervently besought that she might accompany them. She would stay out of sight, she said; they should not be ashamed of her, among the great white folks of the East; and if she could but live where she could see them every day, she should die happier.

"Ashamed of you? and you the daughter of a Sioux king!" exclaimed Victoire proudly, and, with a natural impulse of tenderness, fell on her mother's neck and wept.

"Victoire, 'tis time to depart!" said her father, sternly. The sobbing girl tried to release herself; but she could not. Tahmiroo embraced her with the energy of despair; for, after all her doubts and jealousies, Victoire was the darling child of her bosom—she was so much the image of Florimond when he first said he loved her.

"Woman! let her go!" exclaimed de Rance, exasperated by the length of the parting scene.—Tahmiroo raised her eyes anxiously to his face, and she saw that his arm was raised to strike her.

"I am a poor daughter of the Sioux; Oh! why did you marry me?" exclaimed she, in a tone of passionate grief.

"For your father's lands," said the Frenchman, coldly.

This was a drop too much.—Poor Tahmiroo, with a piercing shriek, fell on the earth, and hid her face in the grass. She knew not how long she remained there. Her highly wrought feelings had brought on a dizziness of the brain, and she was conscious only of a sensation of sickness, ac-accompanied by the sound of receding voices. When she recovered, she found herself alone with Louis, her little boy, then about six years old. The child had wandered there after the traders had departed, and having in vain tried to awaken his mother, he had laid himself down at her side, and slept on his bow and arrows.

From that hour Tahmiroo was changed. Her quiet, submissive air gave place to a stern and lofty manner; and she who had always been so gentle, became as bitter and implacable as the most bloodthirsty of her tribe. In little Louis all the strong feelings of her soul were centered; but even her affection for him was characterized by a strange and unwonted fierceness. Her only care seemed to be to make him like his grand-father, and to instill a deadly hatred to white men; and the boy learned his lessons well. He was the veriest little savage that ever let fly an arrow. To his mother alone he yielded anything like submission; and the Sioux were proud to hail the haughty child as their future chieftain.

Such was the aspect of things on the shores of the Mississippi, when Florimond de Rance came among them, after an absence of three years. He was induced to make this visit partly from a lingering curiosity to see the boy, and partly from the hopes of obtaining more land from the yielding Tahmiroo. He affected much contrition for his past conduct, and promised to return Victoire before the year expired. Tahmiroo met him with the most chilling indifference, and listened to him with a vacant look, as if she heard him not. It was only when he spoke to her boy that he could arouse her from her apparent lethargy. On this subject she was all suspicion. She had a sort of undefined dread that he too would be carried away from her; and she snatched over him like a she wolf when her young are in danger. Her fears were not unfounded; for Florimond de Rance did intend, by demonstrations of fondness, and glowing descriptions of Quebec, to kindle in the mind of his son a desire to accompany him. Tahmiroo thought the hatred of white men, which she had so carefully instilled, would prove a sufficient shield; but many weeks had not elapsed before Louis was fast yielding himself up to the fascinating power which had enthralled her own youthful spirit.

With this discovery came thoughts of darkest vengeance; and more than once she had nervously ed her soul to murder the father of her own son; but she could not. Something in his features reminded her of the devoted young Frenchman who had carried her quiver through the woods, and kissed the moccasin she stooped to lace, and she could not kill him. The last cutting blow was soon given to the heart of the Indian wife. Young Louis, full of boyish curiosity, expressed a wish to go with his father, though he, at the same time, promised a speedy return. He had always been a stubborn boy; and she felt now as if her worn-out spirit would vainly contend against his willfulness. With that sort of resigned stupor which often indicates approaching insanity, she yielded to his request, exacting, however, a promise that he would sail a few miles down the Mississippi with her the day before his departure.

The day arrived. Florimond de Rance was at a distance on business. Tahmiroo decked with the garments and jewels she had worn on the day of her marriage, and selected the gaudiest wampum belts for little Louis.

"Why do you put these on?" said the boy.

"Because Tahmiroo will no more see her son in the land of the Sioux," said she mournfully; "and when her father meets her in the Spirit Land, he will know the beads he gave her." She took the wondering boy by the hand, and led him to the river side. There lay the canoe her father had given her when she left for the wigwam of the stranger. It was faded and bruised now, and so were all her hopes. She looked back on the hut where she had spent her short term of wedded happiness, and its peacefulness seemed a mockery of her misery. And was she—the lone, the wretched, the deserted one—was she the Startled Fawn of the Sioux, for whom contending chiefs had asked in vain? The remembrance of all her love and all her wrongs came up before her memory, and seemed more pleasant to her than the gay dance she loved so well. But then her eyes rested on her boy—and, O God! with what agony of love! It was the last vehement struggle of a soul formed for tenderness.

"We will go to the spirit land together," she exclaimed: "he cannot come there to rob me!" She took Louis in her arms as if he had been a feather, and springing into the boat, she guided it towards the Falls of St. Anthony.

"Mother, mother! the canoe is going over the rapids!" screamed the frightened boy.

"My father stands on the waves and beckons me!" she said.

The boy looked at the horribly fixed expression of her face, and shrieked aloud for help.—The boat went over the cataract. Louis de Rance was seen no more. He sleeps with the Startled Fawn of the Sioux, in the waves of the Mississippi. The story is well remembered by the Indians of the present day; and when a mist gathers over the Falls they often say—"Let us not hunt to-day. A storm will certainly come; for Tahmiroo and her son are going over the Falls of St. Anthony."

TEXAS.—Late advices from the Rio Grande represent the Texas frontier as being in a more deplorable condition than ever. Mexicans continue to cross the line and murder our citizens, whenever an opportunity presents itself. No less than six Americans have been recently killed, and several others have narrowly escaped with their lives—in addition to which the American steamer Camanche has been again fired into. These repeated outrages call aloud for the sending of a large military force, to redress the grievances of the Texans.

The San Francisco Herald estimates the number of Chinamen in California at 12,000, with a prospect of an increase of from 7,000 to 10,000 within the year. The miners generally regard them as one of the colored races, and appear determined to exclude them from the diggings.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, JULY 1, 1852.

Elder L. D. Hickey, with a large company of saints, arrived here on Friday last, from Potawatamie county, Iowa, where he has been laboring, in connection with Elder S. P. Bacon, during the past winter. They number forty-three persons, and are all in good spirits. It is also expected that large numbers from that and other sections of the country will arrive here during the present season.

STEAMER MICHIGAN.—We recommend this boat and officers to all who wish for good accommodations and kind and gentlemanly treatment, especially those desirous of stopping at this place. Any one entrusting business to her officers will be certain of having it done perfectly right.—She is commanded by Capt. John Stewart, and leaves Buffalo (touching at intermediate ports) every alternate Tuesday.

FIRE.—On the morning of the 21st ult., about one o'clock, a fire broke out in Detroit near the corner of Atwater and Griswold streets, which threatened to sweep everything before it. But owing to the very strenuous exertions of the fire department, it was got under, after it had consumed two wooden dwelling houses, two store houses, a stable and some sheds.

One of the houses was occupied by Mr. Walsh, who, with his sons, were out of town. On their farm, at the time the fire took place. Mrs. Walsh, who was alone with her children, was somewhat scorched in her attempts to get them safely out, and to save some of her property, and in which she did not succeed, and the whole of her household furniture was consumed.

The other dwelling was occupied by Mr. Pendagrass as a kind of grocery and boarding house, and it was on his premises that the fire was first discovered. He had no time to save anything, so rapidly did the fire spread through the old tenements.

While the loss which individual persons have suffered from the destruction of property is to be regretted, it is the general expression that there has been a good riddance of a number of old buildings which were quite out of place in that part of the city.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—We learn from the Detroit Tribune that the engine attached to the express train on the Southern Michigan Railroad, run off the track on the 11th ult. at Jonesville, in consequence of the switch being broken, instantly killing the engineer, Mr. Harvey Spalding, and a fireman. It is suspected that the switch was broken designedly, by some infamous wretch.

SPIRITUAL COLONY.—A colony of sixty persons, gathered from Northampton, Mass., Brooklyn and Auburn, N. Y., all firm believers in what is termed the Spiritual Philosophy, (announced by A. J. Davis, et al.) has purchased 9,000 acres of land in a splendid location, about 10 miles from the head of steamboat navigation, on the Kenawha, and 50 miles from Charleston, Va., upon which they have settled. They do not have a community of property, but each man is steward of his own substance—"Maintaining Unity of Faith in the Bonds of Peace." On the property are mills, a tavern stand, post office and store. Among the emigrants is Rev. T. L. Harris, of New York, who is to edit a weekly paper, soon to be established by the society.

ROMANISM.

"We gain nothing by declaiming so earnestly against the doctrine of the civil punishment of spiritual crimes. Our enemies will not believe that we are better than our Church; and—for her—her history is before them: they know what she sanctioned during the Middle Ages, what she did then, and does now—where she can; they know, too, what they would do, were they in power; they judge us by themselves. They can reason besides, and when we say two and two, they will add make four, whatever they can do to stop them.—Heresy is a mortal sin, kills the souls, sends the entire man, body and soul, to Hell; it is, besides, a contagious disease, and affects the interests of unborn millions. Christian kings, believing this, will crush it in the shell. Christian states, knowing this, will drive it from their bodies when they can.

We say that temporal punishment of heresy is a mere question of expediency; that Protestants do not persecute us here, simply because they have not the power; and that where we abstain from persecuting them, they are well aware that it is because we cannot do so, or think that, by doing so, we should injure the cause that we wish to serve."—Shepherd of the Valley.

The foregoing, from the influential Roman Catholic paper at St. Louis, indicates very clearly what Republicanism is tending to in the Great West.

REVOLUTION IN NEW MEXICO.

The Washington Telegraph publishes the following in relation to the revolution in New Mexico.

"Private dispatches were yesterday received in this city from New Mexico, via St. Louis, to the effect that a revolution was anticipated, and that Gov. Calhoun, who is convalescent, after a protracted illness, has availed himself of such military assistance as could be procured to resist and quell whatever opposition to the law that should arise.

"Dispatches from Gov. Calhoun says the threatened revolution portends serious trouble. Volunteers were being raised to subdue the revolutionists and preserve order."—The Chicago W. F.

STEAMBOAT DISASTER—THREE LIVES LOST.

We learn that a serious disaster has taken place on board of the new steamboat Forest City, which has recently been placed on the line between Detroit and Cleveland. This boat had been taken off her route and put on in place of the Caspin, for a few trips, to run between Cleveland and Dunkirk—the caspin being hailed off to get the damage repaired which she suffered in the late storm on the Lakes. On Monday evening, about six o'clock, when the Forest City was a few miles out of Cleveland harbor, on her first trip to Dunkirk, a flue of her boilers collapsed, and killed three of her firemen. No other person was hurt, nor did the boat herself receive any material damage.

The cause of this sad calamity we have not been able to learn. The boilers were manufactured in Detroit by Degraff and Kendrick, and were perfectly new. It is supposed that there had been some flaw in the iron of which they were made, and which was not discovered by the builders. The most probable cause is that the flue had burst in such a way as to let the steam out suddenly on the furnaces, and thus suffocate the firemen, who were the only sufferers.

The engineer of the Forest City is well known to every one on the lakes as a most careful man, having already suffered from a calamity of the like kind; and also as one of the most experienced and skillful persons who could be put in charge of an engine. He enjoyed the full confidence of the owners, and it cannot be laid to any indiscretion on his part.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY.

For some time past workmen have been engaged in removing the rock on the southerly side of Meeting House Hill, Dorchester. A short time since a very severe blast was made on the solid rock, throwing fragments in every direction, and dislodging pieces of two tons weight. Immediately after the explosion, among the fragments thrown out, was found a piece of thin metal, and near by another piece very similar, which, on being applied to the first, was found to fit exactly, forming a bell shaped vessel, four and a half inches high, two inches wide at the top, and six inches and a half wide at the base.

It was about one half of an inch thick, and constructed of a metallic composition, of which silver seems to form a part. On the top is a hole about an inch and a half in diameter, where, apparently, a handle has been broken off. In a line with this hole is another in the bottom, which has been covered with a plating resembling lead. The inside of the vessel is corroded, the outside is entirely free from rust. On the outer surface is carved, in a beautiful manner, several wreaths of flowers and other fanciful designs. The carving was apparently made with a graver or chisel, and is heavily inlaid with pure silver. When new it must have presented a beautiful appearance, and been highly valuable.

The whole vessel is decidedly unique, nothing of the kind ever having been seen in this part of the country. Various conjectures as to its origin are given by scientific gentlemen—to whom it has been submitted. There is little doubt that it was thrown out by the blast, and if so, it must have been embedded in solid pudding stone fifteen feet from the surface of the ground. If such is the case, it is impossible to divine its origin. Whether it was placed in the ground before the rock was formed, or thrown into its position by a volcanic eruption, is a matter of conjecture. The vessel is now in the hands of John Kettel, and will probably be submitted to the hands of persons competent to judge of such matters.—Boston Traveler.

POINT WAUBOSHANCE LIGHT.

We were much gratified by an inspection of this splendid Light and Tower. The reflector is of French manufacture, and cost some $1,200. Yet from the fact that the burners consume but one-sixth part of the oil used in other light houses, it is decidedly the cheapest as well as best light on the Lakes.

Mr. Johnson, the keeper, is a thorough practical and scientific mechanic and engineer, and wins the respect of all who become acquainted with him, by his courteous and gentlemanly deportment.

A VOYAGER ON THE LAKES.

ICE ON THE LAKE IN JUNE. The Schooner Algonquin, Cap. McKay, returned to this port yesterday from a cruise to the head of Lake Superior. She was bound for Fond du Lac, with freight and passengers for Chautau & Co's trading post on the St. Louis River. Cap. McKay found the lake so obstructed with ice, on the 5th instant, when within twenty miles of that river that it was impossible to proceed, and he was obliged to return and land his passengers and freight at La Pointe.

The ice extended along the western coast of the lake as far as the Captin could see from the mast head, and to appearance in one unbroken and solid mass, and it must have been from fifteen to twenty miles in width, and although he sailed for several miles northward along the ice, in hopes to find a passage toward the river, he saw no end. The ice was firm and hard and of immedse thickness, so much so that it seemed grounded, and it is probable it had not been moved since it first formed. To find ice of this description, and at this season of the year is very unusual circumstance and one that has not been recollected as having occurred within the memory of the oldest Indian.—Lake Superior Journal.

DROUTH IN ENGLAND.—A Liverpool paper of the 28th April says:

Until yesterday, we have not had any rain worth mentioning since the 18th of February. In the country districts water has been considered a luxury, as well as a necessary of life; and the ordinarily despised contents of roadside pits have become objects of interest and monetary worth. Many folks were obliged to abjure to some extent the virtue of cleanliness, that they might drink. Brewers have driven a capital trade in the lighter descriptions of beer; for in some places it was almost as cheap to drink intoxicating liquids as to imbibe the usually despised fluid which philosophers tell us always finds its own level. Such a long continued drought has not been known for years past. The driest year of the present century, we believe, was the year 1826; the whole quantity of rain falling in that year not exceeding 24.91 inches. The year most resembling the present was 1844, when the drought continued from the 26th of March to the 13th of June. Many persons died from the extreme heat of the weather. In the Lake district the drying up of the streams has caused the destruction of thousands of fish and their ova.

WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—The Fairmount (Va.) True Virginian says:—

"We are informed by Col. Haymond and others that a portion of a regularly Macadamized road has been discovered on the opposite side of the river from this place. We have not seen it ourselves, but learn that it extends pretty much along the bank of the river. Its width is about 16 feet, and the track well graded, the bed of stone seems to be about two inches thick, and made precisely after the plan of our Macadamized roads, the stone being broken to about the same size as that used for our roads. The discovery was made by the washing away of a hillside which partially covered the road. When and by what race of people this road was made is unknown at the present day, but it gives evidence of the existence of a population here at some former age of the world, as far advanced in civilization, or at least in the art of road making, as ourselves. There was found in the bed of the road the stump of a chestnut tree, which was ascertained to be 150 years old at the least, and how much older, our informant could not tell, as the stump was hollow."

A RECENT DISCOVERY AT NINEVAH.—The London papers by the Asia, announce a recent very curious and interesting discovery made at Ninevah, namely, a coffin containing the body of a lady of the royal house; many of whose garments were entire, also the gold studs which fastened her vest. The most singular discovery, however, was a mask of thin gold pressed upon the face, so as to assume and retain the features of the deceased.

EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.—Large numbers of Mechanics are leaving the Eastern States for Australia—induced by the glowing accounts of Gold in that section of the world. Nine left one establishment in Hartford, Conn. last week.

OREGON.—The last accounts from Oregon says that new and rich gold discoveries have been made. The Custom House and Post Office at Astoria were burned on the 16th of April.

KILLED BY LIGHTNING.—Last Friday evening there was a terrible thunder storm. A company of a dozen lumbermen were then encamped near Willow river, on the east shore of Lake St. Croix. The lightning struck their tent and killed two of their number, whose heads were resting upon the ground. Three others were seriously hurt, the fluid ripping open the skin of some of them, like the riven barks of trees, from head to foot. But none except the two whose heads were resting on the ground were killed.—St. Paul's Pioneer.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Considerable excitement was created in Honolulu, by official notification, received from the Chilean Government, of the late massacre at the Straits of Magellan, and an intimation that the pirates might pay the Island a visit.

During the month of May the emigration at New York, from foreign ports, footed up the enormous number of 159,489.—The largest number came from the British isles, of course.

Buffalo, June 10.

DISASTER ON LAKE ERIE.—The schooner Marion, Capt. Keith, bound from Cleveland for this port, with a load of coal, while lying off the breakwater, was struck by a squall, about 2 o'clock this morning, and in a few moments was a total wreck. Four of the crew were lost. The captain, mate and 1 man only, was saved. The boat is fully insured. There was a very severe gale last night, and heavy rains have raised the water in the creek, and the crops along the shore are very much injured.

FROM THE PLAINS.—A letter from Maj. Stern's command of recruits for the Army in New Mexico, dated on the 29th ultimo, at Potawatonic camp, sixty miles from Fort Leavenworth, mentions the death of fourteen of the command, by cholera, and another was not expected to survive. At the date of the letter, one-fourth of the whole number were on the sick report. This is dismal enough. The command was composed of about 300 men.—St. Louis Rep.

RISE OF LAKE ERIE.—The Ashtabula, O., Telegraph says that Lake Erie is full three feet higher than last year, overflowing the flats in the harbor.

MATERIALS OF HISTORY.—Mr. George Peabody of London, has procured through the agency of Mr. Henry Stevens of Vermont, long resident in London, from the English State Paper Office, manuscript copies of a great number of papers relating to the early colonial history of Maryland. They are contained in seven handsome Morocco and Solander cases with spring backs, and consist of abstracts of documents all dated, and chronologically arranged, extending from 1633 to 1711. It is proposed to continue the collection to the close of the revolutionary war in 1783, which will probably increase it to 13 or 14 volumes of 320 pages each, containing 1800 to 2000 titles.

ANOTHER ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The New York Commercial Advertiser states that Mr. Grinnell's ship Advance has been thoroughly overhauled in the sectional dock, and that she is now ready for sea. It is said that Mr. Geo. Peabody, the wealthy American banker of London, has expressed his readiness to co-operate with Mr. Grinnell in starting another Arctic Expedition from this port, by authorizing drafts to be made upon him for $10,000 toward that purpose; and if the Government can spare the requisite officers and men, numbers being ready to volunteer, if permitted, there is every reason to believe that the Advance and Rescue may sail once more on their voyage of peril and mercy, as there is still hope that the fate of the missing navigators may be ascertained.

MAIL ROBBERIES ARRESTED.—Sixty thousand dollars found in their possession.—Three brothers, named Campbell, have been arrested by High Constable Hague, near Beatty's Station, forty miles beyond Pittsburgh, for robbing the mails, on the 6th and 9th ult., between Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. About sixty thousand dollars in money and checks have been found in their possession, which is supposed to have been abstracted from the mails on those days. One of the brothers resides in this city, and another, Joseph Campbell, was a brakeman on the Central Railroad. Joseph had just been arrested for the robbery of Hamilton Beatty, when a portion of the contents of the mail was found in his pockets.

FIRE ON THE CENTRAL RAILROAD.—On Monday afternoon, (June 21st,) about 2 o'clock, the Freight House of the Central Railroad Company at Wayne, was discovered to be on fire. When the doors were opened, it was found that the fire had got such headway that it was too late to hope to save it. It is supposed that the fire caught from a spark of a locomotive; and as there was some bales of cotton batting and other combustible materials, it had spread very rapidly. The fire after it was discovered spread from the freight house to the passenger house, and got into some cord wood belonging to the company. Mr. Rice, from the Depot of this city, took an engine up after hearing of the fire, but he arrived too late to do much service. The loss is not considered very heavy, as the buildings were wood, and only for temporary use. There was a few small lots of flour, belonging to some country millers, stored in the freight house, which were burned up with other stuff in the Depot.—Det. Adv.

The man who was injured by a burst of applause is recovering.

Rev. Orson Hyde, who has recently been appointed a Judge of Utah Territory, was cowhided the other day in Weston, Mo., by Mr. Robb Wilson, of that place. Slanders published in the Frontier Guardian, against Mr. W., while Hyde was editor, is the charge assigned for the chastisement.

Letters have been received at Charleston by the last mail from California, giving pretty certain information that a filibuster movement is intended from California upon the Sandwich Islands.

MARRIED.

At this place, on the 28th ult., by Elder L. D. Hickey, Mr. JOHN DAVIS, to Mrs. ———— DOUGLAS, both of Iowa.

PROBATE NOTICE.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
COUNTY OF MICHILMACKINAC, ss.
A session of the Probate Court for the County of Michilimackinac, holden at the Probate Office, at Mackinac on Monday the seventh day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty two. Present, Bela Chapman, Judge of Probate. In the matter of the Estate of Ebenezer Kilbourn. On reading and filing the petition, duly verified, of Murray Seaman, praying that letters of administration might be granted him on the estate of Ebenezer Kilbourn, late of Peaine, in said County, deceased.

Thereupon it is ordained, that Monday, the fifth day of July, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, be assigned for the hearing of said petition, and that the heirs at law of said deceased, and all other persons interested in said estate, are required to appear at a session of said Probate Court, then to be holden at the Probate Office, at Mackinac, and show cause, if any there be, why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted: And it is further ordered, that said petitioner give notice to the persons interested in said estate, of the pendency of said petition and the hearing thereof, by causing a copy of this order to be published in the Northern Islander, a newspaper printed and circulating in said County of Michilimackinac, three successive weeks previous to said day of hearing.

BELA CHAPMAN,

Judge of Probate.
Dated June 16th, 1852. 9-3w.

COMMISSIONER'S NOTICE.

ESTATE OF ABRAHAM WENDELL, DECEASED.

St. James, June 23d, 1852. 10w.

These apostles, however, did not pretend that God never had, at any former period of the world, any messengers who had been authorized to bring men into a state of salvation, and to proclaim the gospel to the world; but on the contrary, Paul says, Gal. iii. 9, the gospel was preached unto Abraham. "And the scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee, shall all nations be blessed."—Observe that he says that the gospel was preached unto Abraham. But (Eph. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 12) the apostle shows that the gospel was of a much earlier date than the days of Abraham: that it was before time, being devised in eternity, before the foundation of the world. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ in himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved.—In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."

We learn the following things from the above saying of the apostle. That the scheme of things by which the Saints at Ephesus were saved was devised in eternity before the foundation of the world. "According as he hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world."

2d. That they were to be the children of God, through adoption by Jesus Christ. "Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself."

3d. And all this according to his own purpose or scheme of things, (for what is a man's purpose but his scheme of things,) by which he works all things after the counsel of his own will? That is the same as to say, that the plan of life and salvation which is called in the scriptures the gospel, was God's own scheme or purpose, and that scheme was before the world was; and that before God created man he purposed in himself that mankind should become his sons through adoption, by Jesus Christ, and in no other way.

If the apostle, in the foregoing sayings, teaches any thing, it is, that the gospel, or scheme of life and salvation which is the same, was from before the beginning, and that from the creation of the world, God had but the one way of saving men; and that all who were saved, were to be saved in the same way; and this God had decreed, purposed, and predestinated, and by this eternal scheme of things were accomplished according to the will of God, and this decree, will, and purpose, was before the foundation of the world.

Now let the truth of what the apostle here says be admitted and the result is, that the same scheme of things by which the Ephesians were saved, was the same by which all others who are to be redeemed, were saved. And if the same scheme of things, then the same ordinances were obeyed by all: for if Paul administered ordinances, that were not administered to all who are to be redeemed, then they were not saved by the same plan of salvation; for where there is a difference it matters not how small the difference is, the things thus differing are not the same, and it follows of necessity that if Paul baptized for the remission of sins, all others who are saved must have been baptized also for the same purpose, or else, they were not all saved into the same gospel or plan of salvation: and if the plan of salvation taught by Paul required men to be born of the water, and the spirit in order that they might enter into the kingdom of heaven, so the same must have been required of all since the foundation of the world, or the plan of salvation has not been the same, and if so, Paul's testimony is not true.

I conclude that there are no people on earth who believe in the plan of salvation, or gospel, as set forth in the scriptures, but who believe also, that all who will ever be saved, will be saved by virtue of the sacrifice of Jesus for this is what was taught by prophets and apostles, as far, at least, as we have knowledge of their teachings: they all testified of Jesus, and had knowledge of his coming into the world; in order that he might save it.—

Abraham saw his day and when he saw it was glad. John viii. 56, The Saviour says to the Jews "Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me." John v. 46. And the author of the epistle to the Hebrews says of Moses "that he esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt." John xi. 22-27.—By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents; because they saw that he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment. By faith Moses when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God; than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season: esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of reward."

It cannot be a matter of dispute, that these men were made acquainted with the mission of Christ into the world, and if so, they were acquainted with the gospel or plan of eternal life, which Paul says, was before the foundation of the world. But in order that we may have a clear view of this matter let us inquire, what it was that was proclaimed to the world, which is called the gospel; for be that what it may, it is God's plan of saving men: for Paul says that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all men that believe.

See Romans i. 16. "For am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth: to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." So let the proclamation be what it may that was made to the world, by divine authority, that the inspired men called the gospel, that proclamation was the only thing which could save any person of the human family, and that was the thing which existed before the foundation of the world, the purpose, or the scheme of things, which was divided in eternity, through which purpose of his own will God designed to save them that believe.

This proclamation, is set forth so clearly in the scriptures, that none need mistake it, not only in the commission given to the twelve after the resurrection of Jesus from the dead: but in different of the epistles, so that the enquirer after truth on this point, need not be mistaken. It is so manifest, that it would require a good deal of ingenuity to render it so obscure that a person could not see it at the first reading: a person must be greatly blinded by tradition, who cannot see it if he reads his bible once through with any degree of attention.

BLOODY MILK.

I noticed in your paper of the 1st inst. an inquiry for a remedy for "bloody milk." It is not an uncommon disease, and is not difficult to remedy. My plan is as follows: Take three or four pieces of the dried root of "gar-gel," as it is commonly called; pulverise it and mix with a quart or two of bran or Indian meal, and give it to the cow. If she has been used to messing, she will eat it readily. Administer the like mess to her every fourth or fifth day, till the symptoms disappear, which will be the case in two weeks, or less. If you cannot readily procure the root in a dry state, dig up the green root and cut it into pieces about four or five inches in length, and with a piece of thread confine it to the root. Cram it into the cow's mouth and hold her with her nose elevated till she chews and swallows it. In its green state it requires about double what would be required when dry. It is an infallible cure for almost every disease of the glands of either horned cattle or horses.

The same remedy, if seasonably applied to horses which have been afflicted with what is commonly called the horse ail, having the glands about the throat tumefied in consequence of a want of suppuration, would save hundreds of horses yearly from that fatal disease called the glanders. I have watched the favorable effects of that valuable root upon the diseased glands of cows, oxen and horses, with the highest gratification, for more than half a century. Mr. Upham, your correspondent, is invited to try it and give the results of the remedy in your valuable paper.—Car. N. E. Farmer.

POWER OF THE PRESS.

We extract the following sound and pithy sentiments from an able article in the New York Times.

"I were a curious history to trace the art of communicating knowledge, from the ancient manuscript duplicated only by the pen through tedious hours, to the ponderous printed tome, and thence, through the various degrees, to the nimble paper of the present day. Thousands peruse the daily issues, and are thus acquainted with the current events of the globe, who would rarely open the lids of a book. Dust is allowed to gather on the huge volume. Men prefer the newspaper easily taken up, and easily laid down, ever at hand, ever fresh, and containing all that is known, for into its column is pressed the essence of books, and much that books do not contain. They are the world's ledgers, and post their readers up each day. Men do not feel prepared to plunge into the tide of business till they have seen what has taken place during the previous day and night in their city and county, and what the last steamer has brought from California. England, or the continent. Instances of valor, great and good deeds, new ideas are collected from different countries, and reach the general mind. When roguery shows its head it is branded, and the people warned. If an earthquake rumbles, if a star is discovered, a murder perpetrated, a battle fought, a monarch dethroned, a light-house erected, a railway opened or an election concluded, the mails are immediately freighted with the intelligence, and the tables of the reading-rooms groan under its weight."

EXTRAORDINARY PHENOMENON.

An ox belonging to a Mr. BRAND in the township of Orange, last week sickened and died quite suddenly, after which he was dissected by the owner and others, and there was found ensconced in his stomach an animal or monster apparently of the lizard species, five feet in length, two legs situated about the middle of the body, forward of which very much resembled a common blood-sucker, and what is most strange he had six regular and distinct tails. There was also found near by six small ones undoubtedly the progeny of the larger, varying in length from six to eight inches. They were all dead and the larger one partially decayed. The ox it is said has been subject to sick turns for about three years more or less, but at the time he died was in excellent order, almost good enough for beef.—Iona Gazette.

The Gold regions of Australia extend over a surface of 200,000 miles. £3,000,000 will be sent from there to England this year, and the ultimate annual yields is estimated at £8,000,000. The mining operations will give active employment to 100,000.

ROTHSCHILD THE HEAD OF ISRAEL.—The Paris correspondent of the New York Evangelist writes as follows:—

Strange news reaches us from Constantinople. I should not mention these rumors, if something similar had not been announced three years ago. I quote the reports without guaranteeing their truth. "Syria has been ceded to M. Rothschild for five hundred millions of francs. It is not yet known whether he assumes the title of king or pacha; it is certain that he proposes to re-build Jerusalem and the Temple of Solomon; there are to be chapels for all religions; a line of steamers from Beyrout to Marseilles, and a railway from Alexandria to Constantinople. The new States of M. Rothschild abound in iron ore, and forests of valuable timber. It is said that M. Rothschild will appeal to his co-religionists to return to the land of their fathers, to possess the tents of Abraham and Jacob."

"We all 'look down' on somebody. The man of bullion looks down on the shop keeper, the shop keeper on his clerks, the clerks turn up their noses at mechanics, while the mechanics are above associating with hod carriers; the seamstresses won't speak to radish peddlers, while the radish girls think it low and vulgar to speak to the little huzzies what keep the crossings clean. Who the latter look down on we have not learned, although there is no doubt they consider themselves far above somebody. Queer, isn't it."

"I give it up," replied the old gentleman, expecting to hear something bright from the lad. "I give it up. How can it?"

"Let him carry a hive of bees."

"How so?"

"Kas then he'll be a beeholder."

EXCUSABLE.—Whilst a regiment of Volunteers were marching through Camargo, a Captain, (a strict disciplinarian,) observing that one of the drums did not beat, ordered a lieutenant to inquire the reason. The fellow on being interrogated, whispered to the lieutenant:—

"I have two ducks and a turkey in my drum, and the turkey is for the captain."

This being whispered to the captain, he exclaimed:—

"Why didn't the drummer say he was lame? I do not want any of my men to do their duty when they are not able."

BIBLICAL CRITICISM.—A little boy "well in his boots" for the first time, and very proud of them, said to his mother, after reading a chapter in "Scott's Family Bible," in the morning:—

"Mother, why didn't Moses wear boots?"

"Why, my son, what makes you ask that question? Perhaps he did wear boots, my dear; we don't know."

"No, mother, he didn't, because the Bible says that the voice that came out of the burning bush told him to take off his shoes!"

"There was no rejoinder to this "clinchier."

ELECTRICITY APPLIED TO WHALING.—The fisherman of New Bedford have a new idea.—They apply electricity to the taking of whales. An electro-galvanic battery is placed in a boat, which is attached by a metallic wire to a harpoon. It is capable of throwing into the body of the whale eight tremendous strokes of electricity in a second, or 480 in a minute, paralyzing in an instant the muscles of the whale, and depriving it of all power of motion, if not actually of life.

GEOLOGY.

BY PROF. HITCHCOCK.

All correct reasoning in the natural sciences is based upon the uniformity of nature's operations. Laws of nature are merely the modes in which the powers of nature act; and our belief in the constancy of these laws rests upon the observed fact, that under the same conditions nature always operates in the same way. We are hence led to seek for the causes of geological phenomena, in the agencies which we at present see in operation. Since the discussion of the Wernerian and Huttonian views, and the general reception of the latter, it has been an admitted principle in Geology, that existing rocks are, for the most part, the result of agencies still operating, and that the process of formation of nearly every class, is still going on. This principle, we propose, in the present article, briefly to illustrate.

Our winter frosts, our summer showers, our mountain rivulets, we see all actively at work, wearing away existing rocks, and converting them into the detritus which is borne along by our larger rivers, and deposited, in inundations, along their banks, or carried to their mouths, there to form new deltas or islands. As this detritus varies in quantity and mineral character at different times, according to the activity of the agencies which have produced it, and the nature of the rocks of which it has been formed, so do the successive deposits vary in thickness and mineral constitution.

In these deposits are also found enveloped great numbers of shells and skeletons of land animals.—The amount of detritus carried down by different rivers, varies greatly, as is strikingly seen on comparing the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. The waters of the former, above their junction, are comparatively clear, while those of the latter are almost opaque, in consequence of the sand and mud which they contain.

It is estimated that the Rhine, a comparatively small stream, carries down four hundred and fifty tons daily. By this means, in process of time, have the Netherlands been formed. The amount carried down by such streams as the Ganges and Amazon, is immensely greater. The latter is said to muddy the sea water three hundred miles from its mouth, and it is well known that the mouth of the Nile is several miles from where it was two thousand years ago. Another active agent in forming aqueous deposits, is seen in the tides and waves of the ocean, which are constantly making inroads upon our coasts, wearing away even the most rocky portions, and spreading them in the form of sand, pebbles and mud over the ocean's bed. The numerous ripple marks discovered in our hardest sandstones, show that they were once the sandy beach of the ocean.

All these deposits mentioned, need only to be solidified, to form rocks resembling, in mineral characteristics, the various sandstones found in the earth's crust. Strata may be solidified in various ways. Water often holds carbonate of lime and oxide of iron in chemical solution, which it deposits when passing through layers of sand and gravel, cementing them firmly together.—It has also been proved by experiment, that pressure alone is capable of making particles of dry sand adhere with considerable tenacity. When, therefore, strata of great thickness have been piled upon each other, the immense pressure to which the lower strata would be subjected, would be sufficient to form the most compact sandstones. Internal heat, whose existence is evinced by earthquakes and volcanoes, is probably the most important agent in the solidification of strata.

Examples of the formation of limestone rocks, which constitute so large a portion of the earth's crust, may be seen in the deposition of carbonate of lime at the bottoms of lakes and seas where mineral springs abound, as is the case in many parts of Italy; also in successive layers of the shells of molluscan animals in which the ocean abounds; but especially in the extensive coral formations of the Pacific and Indian oceans. The microscope has revealed the wonderful fact, that chalk and many other limestone rocks, are almost exclusively composed of innumerable shells of minute infusoria. These rocks need only to be subjected to certain degrees of heat to be converted into pure granular marble.

If, then, our present rocks have been formed at the bottom of the ocean, as would appear from what has been stated, how have they become dry land? What forces are at present in operation, at all adequate to upheave them from their ocean bed and form them into continents? The subterranean forces which can produce such earthquakes and volcanoes as have occurred within historic times, and are even yet occurring, need scarcely to be increased in intensity to be able to raise not only the bottom of the ocean to a level with existing continents, but even to elevate it to the height of our highest mountains. We have, too, decisive evidence that this elevating process is going forward at the present time. It has been observed for centuries, that the northern portion of Sweden has been gradually rising, while the southern portion has been sinking. In one part the sea has been receding, in the other it has been encroaching upon the land. There have also been successive elevations of the western coast of South America, some of which have taken place since that region was peopled.—Several district sea beaches are observable above each other.

The forces which have produced such disturbances, would also account for the lifting up, bending and dislocating of many of the stratified rocks seen especially in mountain ranges.

These few illustrations must suffice to show that most of the phenomena of the stratified rocks, may be seen to be the result of causes now in operation, and that these causes are still producing like results. With respect to the unstratified crystalline formations, which are admitted to be of igneous origin, it cannot of course be proved by actual examination, that they are still forming. But of the action of powerful igneous forces, we have abundant evidence in earthquakes and volcanoes; and we have clear proof that both trap and granite have been formed at successive epochs.

Since then the agency which has produced them is still operating, we should conclude from analogy that they are to some extent, yet forming, though their formation is concealed from our view, trap rocks being the product of submarine volcanoes, while granite has its origin deep within the earth. This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that many volcanoes have long periods of quiet, others have altogether ceased action, while in other places new ones are breaking out, showing that in some places the cooling, at others the melting process is going on at the same time.

Let it not be inferred, from what has been said to prove the identity of the past and present geological agencies, that they are believed to have operated at all times with equal intensity, for as their action even now varies from year to year, so doubtless has it varied from period to period of the earth's history.

"ADDRESS X. Y. Z."

The Commercial Journal one day chanced to contain a couple of advertisements, each for a very different purpose indeed from that of the other, to which was mutually appended a direction for the individual who should respond to them, to address X. Y. Z. through the post office. It might, and might not, have been a very singular coincidence that the replies were directed thus to be addressed in the same way; while it certainly could not have been considered at all strange or inexplicable if a very grievous or ludicrous mistake had been committed in consequence.

Jefferson Brown had himself inserted one of the advertisements in the Commercial Journal, and duly paid for it. So far so good. He had thoughtlessly advertised for a "partner with a cash capital of at least $10,000." Mr. Brown, be it known to the reader, was a man doing a somewhat extensive business in the line of hides and skins, and as his trade expanded with such steady progress, and his cares multiplied correspondingly, he deemed it no less a matter of prudence than of policy that the title of his business should become more dignified by an addition to the firm.—Hence his advertisement.

The other advertisement in question was for a wife. The required characteristics—physical, moral and intellectual—were described as much at large as an ordinary newspaper advertisement would permit: while it was insisted upon as a sine qua non, that the lady should be possessed of a comfortable fortune of her own.

Mr. Jefferson Brown dropped in at the post office one afternoon on his way to his boarding house to tea—Mr. Brown was yet a bachelor—and inquired of the clerk if there was a letter there directed to X. Y. Z. The attentive tide-waiter took from a pigeon hole quite a pile of missives, and began running over the superscription with great rapidity.

"X. Y. Z. sir, did you say?" inquired he, suddenly stopping in his search over the back of a particular letter.

"That's the direction," triumphantly replied Mr. Brown, his eyes manifestly brightening.

Taking the proffered document in his hand, he threw down the postage, and hurriedly left the office. Not until he reached his own chamber did he attempt to get at the contents of the epistle, desirous of there taking a comprehensive and uninterrupted view of the whole subject.

No sooner had he broken the seal and glanced over the page, than his suspicions were aroused that the hand was that of a female. To be sure the chirography was decidedly of a masculine cast, yet there appeared to be a running smoothness of a woman's pen through every word that found its way into his eye.

"M. S. would be glad to have an interview with 'X. Y. Z.' this evening, at No. 127 — street. Inquire for Smith."

"October 11, 18—."

"It can't be a woman's hand!" exclaimed Mr. Brown, again and again running his eyes over the manuscript. "And yet it does look a good deal like it, too. I'm fairly beat this time. I will be punctual to the engagement this evening. 'Inquire for Smith, eh?' Not so very uncommon a name, as that I shall be afraid of forgetting it, though. Let me see. How is it going to sound? Brown and Smith. At any rate, I'll manage not to miss the chance of being on the ground in full season. And not a word said about the amount of money,—either!— I rather like that now. It looks wonderfully like business to me! 'Inquire for Smith?' Well, I'll be sure to do so!" and in this style he suffered his truant tongue to run on uncharged.

At a conveniently reasonable hour after tea he emerged from his quiet place of residence, attired in a style that at once betrayed excessive care and particularity. Walking rapidly up the street, he soon reached the thoroughfare, and for a time was lost in the crowding mass of human beings.

By and by, however, he returned up again, and was to be seen ringing the bell at the door, No. 124, — street.

"Is Smith in?" inquired he, of a servant girl, who answered his ringing summons.

"Yes, sir," was the maid's response; "will you walk in this way, sir?"

Mr. Brown, with palpitating heart, followed her into the snug little hall, and was ushered into a much snugger and very cozy looking little parlor. Seating himself on the sofa that stretched its proportions out so invitingly to him, he awaited the entrance of the mysterious "M. S.," with whom he had formed an acquaintance only through the very mysterious note which he had received but a few hours before.

He had kept his position in quiet no longer than three minutes, when he heard the door open again, and looked up. Never seemed his dark and handsome eyes so full of interest before.

A lady entered the room!

Mr. Brown was evidently too much pleased to be surprised simply, and for the moment forgot the object for which he had come there.

The lady was neither short nor tall; but quite enough of both to find no difficulty in creating the desired impression. She was tall even to robustness, and her neck looked whiter and clearer than marble itself. She was attired in the very simplest, and, for that reason, the very sweetest dress, and walked across the carpet with all the grace imaginable. As soon as her expressive eyes caught sight of Mr. Brown, sitting there so cosily on the sofa, she attested her delight by approaching him as near as propriety admitted, and seated herself not far from him.

Mr. Jefferson Brown was stumped. He was a stranger to the charms of beautiful women, and felt an all-overish sensation, of which language can give no deserved description.

"Am I to see Mr.—Mr.—Smith?" he at length stammered out.

"Mrs. Smith," responded the lady, in a charming, silvery voice, that played the very duce with the heart-strings of Mr. Brown, smoothing down her hair with both of her fair hands as she spoke.

"But I thought it was Mr.

"Smith," exclaimed he, though half the effect of his surprise was lost in his fervent admiration of the lovely person who sat by his side.

"No, sir, I told you to call for Mrs. Smith!"

"But—"

"You received my note, I trust sir?" interrogated she, with an expression of the most charming modesty.

"Your note!" exclaimed he, greatly surprised, yet still more captivated with his fair companion.

"Yes."

"But I advertised for a partner—"

"I know."

"with ten thousand dollars."

"Yes, yes—I know."

"And advertised to direct a reply to X. Y. Z."

"Yes, and I have done so."

The lady was by this time quite as much smitten with Mr. Jefferson Brown as he was with her.

"I hope we may make an arrangement that shall be mutually satisfactory," continued she.

"But the dickens, madam!" exclaimed Mr. Brown, in a measure recovering from his surprise, and coming to his senses again.

"Sir?" asked the lady, in a tone that would have softened the heart of the hardest bachelor that lived.

"I advertised for a partner, madam."

"So I understood it, sir," said she.

"No, no—I—I!"

"Sir?" a second time inquired Mrs. Smith.

Mr. Brown was fast losing his senses. His eyes grew perceptibly dark and more handsome than ever, while the richest glow in the world suffused her cheeks.

"It was for a partner, madam, with ten thousand dollars!"

"I know it!" replied his companion, her fair face lighted with a radiance that was both bewitching and bedazzling. "The money is—"

"A business partner!" exclaimed the stricken Mr. Brown, grasping eagerly hold of the idea that thus accidentally offered itself to him.

"Yes, I consented to this business way of doing the thing," responded she, her countenance losing a very trifle of its archness.

"No, no madam—you fail to understand me."

"What am I to understand, then, sir?" asked she, her expression growing suddenly more blank.

"I mean a partner in the business of hides!" cried Mr. Brown, blushing quite to the roots of his hair while he said it.

"But sir—but—"

"Madam?" demanded he.

"Have I been deceived?"

"That is what I advertised for," said Mr. Brown. "and nothing else, madam."

Forthwith she drew a slip of paper from her bosom and handed it to him.

"I answered that advertisement," said she.

Mr. Brown took it tremblingly from her dainty little hand, and read it with swimming eyes.

It ran as follows.

"The subscriber, who is a single gentleman, of not more than forty years, takes this method of proposing marriage with any lady of not more than forty-five, provided, after meeting, both parties are mutually satisfied with each other. He is possessed of a considerable fortune, has had good educational advantages, and flatters himself that he is capable of making his wife happy. It will be preferred that the lady have ten thousand dollars, a good education, a refined taste, and polished manners. Should this advertisement meet the eye of any one disposed to reply to the same, an interview will be had at the earliest notice proposed. Address X. Y. Z.—Post-office."

Mr. Brown read and read on in amazement, until he came to the last sentence. This was the key that unlocked the whole mystery.

"There is some mistake here, madam," he began to say.

"I see there is—there must be," she replied.

"This is my advertisement," said he, handing it to her.

She drew still nearer to him on the sofa, and took it from his hands. She read it all carefully through, still keeping her seat near him, and when at last she finished the reading, her face was suffused with crimson.

"Really, madam," exclaimed Mr. Brown, mustering into instant service all the courage he had.

"This is very embarrassing."

"It might have been more so," naively suggested the lady.

Mr. Brown was already smitten with her, and now he recalled the fact that she was worth at least ten thousand dollars.

"Perhaps she will make the best partner after all," whispered some voice to him.

"Madam," said he—with this word he laid his hand next to hers on the sofa—"madam."

Their eyes instantly met. The lady's were liquid and melting. They were enough to melt the heart of any bachelor that ever lived.

"As I advertised for a partner," here he took her soft hand into his own, she making not the slightest show of resistance, "and this unforeseen occurrence has taken place, I am sure I can do no less than offer you a partnership though of a different character from the one I had thought of. I am not yet forty, and am worth more than twenty thousand dollars. I was never married, and never before thought seriously on the subject. But my views are changed since seeing you," and so he went on in a style and strain of gallantry, which it would be very ungallant in us to divulge.

The upshot of it all was, that the same newspaper which contained the two totally different advertisements, very soon contained the following announcement.

"Married, on Monday the 24th inst., by Rev. Mr. Hodsdon, Mr. Jefferson Brown, to Mrs. Mary Smith."

Mrs. Smith was only a blooming young widow, with an ample fortune, and the most loveable manners. She found herself an excellent husband by this very natural mistake, and both husband and wife expressed themselves admirably suited with each other.

We can only pity the poor fellow who never received the reply to his advertisement which the young widow dispatched him but which chanced to fall into the hands of the more fortunate Mr. Jefferson Brown.

Every story has its moral—so has this. Always be careful, if you advertise for a wife or husband, never to request replies directed in any such vague and dangerous way as "X. Y. Z." or "A. B. C." Two to one the reply will get into the wrong hands.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, JULY 8, 1852.

CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.

Some 20,000 Chinese have migrated to California since the annexation of that ancient province of Mexico to "the land of the brave and the home of the free," the asylum of the oppressed of all nations. But they have come only to learn that Americanism is a lie. The asylum is such as widows and orphans are wont to find amid the cold charity of the unfeeling. Had they met such a reception amid a band of robbers, as they found in the free and republican State of California, the whole world would have been agog for vengeance.

Vast mobs have gathered and drove them with violence from the mines; banished them without a days notice. All their property has been seized and confiscated. To give a color of justice—for legality is not pretended to in these outrages—to their proceedings, they are worked with a pretended sale of their property and the avails given to them.

But how is it sold? The mob gets together and seizes all the Chinamen and all their possessions. Immediately their property is set up at auction, at which only the robbers are allowed to bid, and the avails of sales so conducted are a fund to pay the expenses of the mob, and the balance is promised to the unhappy victims. The vilest highwayman would not strip his victims so bare.

For this violence what is the excuse? That they have committed any offence against the laws? It is not pretended. That they are vicious or dissolute? The charge has never been made against them. Is it that they are unprofitable or undesirable settlers? It has not been named or breathed. The highest charge yet preferred against them is that they did not spend their earnings in drinking shops and gambling houses as Americans do.

But the true causes are that they are in the way of some unprincipled Americans, and that their property is coveted. California is made up of just such materials as all the States have in the greatest abundance, lawless rascals, whose rascality is so much in fashion that they never think of its being rascality; men who are offended at being accused of letting slip a fair and handsome opportunity of cheating, and if charged with not availing themselves of a chance of licentiousness, would take it as a gross insult. When they were children they lied to their parents, and called them "old man" and "old woman," disputed the legal right of school masters to call them to account for misconduct on their way to and from school, and got mad at preachers who admonished them for stealing apples and melons, and left church in revenge, and as their peccadilloes became the subject of official notice, called constables "Charlies," and asked magistrates to kiss—what they could not.

If virtue itself is despised in the old States the new will produce a rich crop of something else. Men have defied the law when they had no interest in doing so, in every State in the Union, and no power has been found to rebuke them.

So in California the patient and industrious Celestials are not permitted to work the mines. At present they may make farms, for the mines want a better supply of agricultural productions. As soon as the competition is felt by the California farmers, another robbery will be perpetrated, and some thousand farms will be the spoilers prey. If there is one word of truth in the words of the prophets, these sins cry to God in heaven for vengeance, and he will hear the cry, and will come down and avenge the oppressed.

THE LAW OF TREASON.

There grew up last fall a new and strange feature in the jurisprudence of the United States, in the form of an attempt to make opposition to a single opprobrious statute—treason. Judge Kane led off in the Christiana case, when an attempt was made to prevent the reclamation of a runaway slave. And Judge Conkling followed in a similar case at Syracuse. We extract the following from the charge of Judge Kane to the Grand Jury in Philadelphia:—

"It is said that a citizen of the State of Maryland, who had come into Pennsylvania to reclaim a fugitive from labor, was forcibly obstructed in the attempt by a body of armed men—assaulted, beaten and murdered—that some members of his family, who had accompanied him in the pursuit, were at the same time and by the same party maltreated and grievously wounded, and that an officer of justice, constituted under the authority of this Court, who sought to arrest the fugitive, was impeded and repelled by menaces and violence, while proclaiming his character and exhibiting his warrant. It is said too, that the time and manner of these outrages, their asserted object, the denunciations by which they were preceded, and the simultaneous action of most of the guilty parties, evinced a combined purpose forcibly to resist and make nugatory a constitutional provision, and the statute enacted in pursuance of it—and it is added, in confirmation of this, that for some months back, gatherings of people, strangers as well as citizens have been held from time to time in the vicinity of the place of the recent outbreak, at which exhortations were made and pledges interchanged to hold the law for the recovery of fugitive slaves as of no validity, and to defy its execution."

If the circumstances to which I have adverted have in fact taken place, they involve the highest crime known to our laws. Treason against the United States is defined by the Constitution, Act 3, ch. 1, to consist in "levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies giving them aid and comfort." This definition is borrowed from the ancient law of England; stat. 25, Edw. 3, stat. 5, chap. 3, and its terms must be understood of course in the sense which they bore in that law; and which obtained here when the Constitution was adopted. The expression "levying war," so regarded, embraces not merely the act formal or declared war, but any combination forcibly to prevent or oppose the execution or enforcement of a provision of the Constitution or of a public Statute, if accompanied or followed by an act of forcible opposition in pursuance of such combination.

This in substance has been the interpretation given to these words by the English judges, and it has been uniformly and fully recognised and adopted in the Courts of the United States. (See Foster, Hale, and Hawkins, and the opinions of Ireland, Patterson, Chase, Marshall, and Washington, J. J., of the Supreme Court, and of Peters, D. J., in U. S. vs. Vigol, U. S. vs. Mitchell, U. S. vs. Fries, U. S. vs. Bollman and Swartwout, U. S. vs. Burr.)

The charge is too long to copy at length. Suffice to say that in pursuance of it some twenty persons were indicted for treason. Among them is a colored preacher, whose only crime is informing a man that the slave catchers were after him, that being one of a series of acts by which the law for returning fugitive slaves was to be resisted. We will not comment on this new construction of the "Law of Treason." Had such a charge been made by a Judge in an ordinary prosecution, we really believe he would have been dragged down from his bench, and the imaginary ermine trampled on by feet all too real. No one has the remotest thought that a conviction can follow. But it being well known that the blacks must in the end go clear, they are to be punished by a too violent prosecution. They are to be punished first and tried and acquitted afterwards.

Great progress liberty and equality is making, when, for informing a fellow christian that the man-stealer is after him, one is liable to be tried and hanged for treason.

SPECULATION.

The mania of speculation again runs riot in the land. Fortunes are made in a week, and lost in a day. The scenes of twenty years ago are being re-enacted on an enlarged scale. Already has it become necessary, notwithstanding the amount of bailion coming in from California to create several new and large batches of local banks, to supply the wants of speculation. Railroads built on borrowed capital are extending through all the north-west, in endless extent, and paper cities re-appear as of old.

We caution the saints to avoid the whole system, as a most foolish and reckless swindle. It will be followed by a revulsion, which in its course will swallow up nearly every fortune made in it, as well as many honestly earned.

Agriculture, commerce, manufactures and mining produce wealth. But speculation, gambling, stealing and conquest only transfer it from one hand to another. They are the blights of society; the scourges of mankind. In all production one gains another's losing. But from speculation to conquest, there are only different modes of robbing the laborer of the fruits of his toil, that others may enjoy it.

So entirely do we hate the system of speculation, that the purchase and sale of land from man to man here is prevented by the most rigid discipline. All the choice land is secured, and whoever wishes to settle can have without price whatever unimproved lot he wishes, by settling on it. Lands which would sell readily on speculation at $50,00 a lot of 50 feet by 100, is constantly offered on these terms, and cannot be purchased at any price.

The Hon. HENRY CLAY died at Washington, June 29th. He has been for a long time very low indeed, and his physicians have been making a most extraordinary effort to keep him alive till the national anniversary, the day on which most of the Presidents have died. But for these unusual efforts his spirit would have passed away weeks before.

Mr. Clay has filled a large space in the public eye for a full half century, and has exercised during that long period probably a larger influence than any other man, of the same times. His recollections went back to the establishment of the constitution, and through the second and third generation of American statesmen he ranked among the first. Earlier in his life he had great anxiety to attain to the Presidency; but of late the desire had doubtless died out. No office could add anything to his fame.

In his personal intercourse he was kind, courteous and amiable. His private character was marked deep with the stain of gross immoralities. Many years since he carried about him all the marks of a worn out rake, and during a long public career he has been an inveterate gambler, and sometimes an excessive drinker. As a public man, he came nearer the standard of uprightness than most of those who survive him.

MORMON OPPRESSION AND ROBBERY.

An old man by the name of Peter Ward is stopping at Mackinac, and making it his business to complain bitterly of the Mormons for selling out his property. To hear his tales of woe, one would suppose the Mormons had gone in a body and made a booty of a large stock of merchandise from him, and defied the power of law to punish them.

For the satisfaction of all who wish to know, we merely state that Densmore & Ward were regularly assessed for a tract of land and a store of goods, which they owned in the township of Peaine, and the taxes assessed thereon precisely as on all other persons, Mormons or Gentiles, in the township. They were legally notified of the assessment, and made no effort to get it reduced. Densmore, the senior partner, when before a Justice of the Peace to justify as bail for an appeal swore the value of the property higher than it was assessed at.

In this state of the case they left here, leaving their property in the keeping of a townsman of theirs as agent, without making any provision for the payment of the tax. In due time the Supervisor issued his tax list and warrant, and the township Treasurer collected the taxes for State, County, Township and School purposes, by distress and sale of personal property, according to law, just precisely as the same thing is done in every civilized country under the face of heaven. And this is Mormon oppression and robbery.

We are willing that Mr. Ward should understand and tell to whom he pleases that the Mormons will both tax men according to law, and collect the taxes according to law. But it is not cunning to call that robbery. The cry of "wolf" has been raised too often, when there was no wolf at hand.

The brother-in-law of H. W. Granger complains most bitterly of the intimation in a late number that some of the Grand Jury had violated their oaths. To convince Mr. Strang that such was not the fact, he informed him what vote every member of the Grand Jury gave, in his case, upon the question of bill or no bill! Very convincing.

We learn from the Saint Louis Republican that the Salt Lake Mormons have purchased machinery for a sugar refinery, which they contemplate starting at Salt Lake. The iron work of this machinery alone weighs forty tons, and cannot be carried over for less than $15,000. This is a great undertaking; but we think it must fail. It is hardly possible that the income can justify so great an expense.

The Prop. Lady of the Lake, Capt. Rossman, of the Ogdenburgh and Chicago line is becoming a favorite with travelers to and from this place. She stops here at every trip, and has brought more passengers than any other boat. Capt. Rossman recently gave the Prophet the first free passage he has ever had on a Lake boat since he was a preacher of the Gospel.

Charles Knox, late U. S. Marshal for the District of Michigan, is dead. He is well remembered here for his vindictiveness against the Mormons, and his liberal offers to suborn witnesses against them.

At the late session of the Board of Supervisors of Michilimackinac Co., Augustus Todd was appointed Sheriff, and M. M. Aldrich, Thos. Chambers and Superintendents of the Poor.

We learn from our exchanges that the Salt Lake Mormons have completed a wooden Tabernacle sufficient to accommodate some two thousand persons. They have not as yet fallen into the serious difficulties prayed for by their enemies.

CONFERENCE.

The General Conference opened the morning of the eighth at sunrise, by a most solemn sacrifice. The following persons brought victims: J. J. Strang, Benj. G. Wright, L. & A. Prindle, A. J. Porter, A. Phinn, F. Brevier, A. Kinney, J. Philmot, A. See, D. R. Whipple, R. T. Nichols, W. J. Clark, L. Tubbs, G. Watson, W. Horton, G. Brownson, E. Page, Wm. Howe, J. Howe, A. Hale, M. M. Aldrich, P. Wright, S. Field, A. Parrish, J. M. Wait, E. Rice, A. J. Parrish, U. Porter, G. Brown, R. Allcott, O. Hill, W. Post, S. P. Bacon, J. H. Brown, C. Tripp, N. Waggoner, F. Cooper, F. Fox, F. Whitney, A. C. B. Field, S. Shaw, G. T. Preston, W. Howe, H. G. Hall, S. Campbell, J. Davis, E. H. Derby, F. Derby, J. Helser, L. D. Hickey, J. Smith, R. Delong, D. M. Adams, J. Prince, J. Morrison, C. Loomis, A. & R. Field, T. McNutt, S. Page, John Small, F. Page, W. Bickle, J. Henderson, G. Campbell, Murray Seaman, S. Chambers, E. Steel, J. Lennel, G. W. Gregg, M. Chase, A. Chase, F. Longfelt, W. McLean, I. Pierce, C. W. Kendall, F. Johnson, H. D. McCulloch, J. C. Hill, Geo. Miller, D. Brown, A. Wentworth, A. Hoffman, J. Denio, Mrs. L. Barter, J. Davison, D. Heath, J. M. Greig.

Bros. D. R. Whipple, A. See, G. Brownson, D. Chidester, R. T. Nichols, Wm. Savage, S. Rogers, M. Seaman, G. Watson, G. B. Cole, J. Field, (M. M. Aldrich, G. M.) acted in the Priest's office, and slew the victims.

The Deacons, G. T. Preston, O. Hill, S. E. Hull, J. Ketcham, A. J. Porter, (A. W. Prindle, G. M.) prepared a splendid feast. Tables were spread at 1 o'clock for four hundred and eighty-eight persons, the families of those that offered. And at the end of the feasting the Priest at the head of the table said—

LORD GOD! I have come into the land which thou gavest to thy saints: I have heard thy law, and have entered into covenant with thee to keep thy commandments, and I have eaten of the sacrifice before thee as a witness forever.

Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless us this day, even all the children of thy kingdom; and the land which thou hast given us, and establish us forever.

And all the people said AMEN. Every man as he brought his victim said—

I profess this day unto the Lord God, that I am come into the kingdom which he promised by the mouth of all the prophets: praised be his name for his glorious goodness, and his great power.

And when the victim was slain said—

We were a people, few in number; scattered among our enemies: they killed our prophets, murdered our brethren, robbed us of our possessions, and banished us from among them; but God has made us a kingdom; and the fear of us is upon those who hate us.

When the gentiles evilly entreated us, and afflicted us, and thrust us out, we cried unto the Lord God of our fathers; the Lord heard our voice, and looked on our affliction, and sorrow, and homelessness; and he gave us this land for an everlasting possession; and hath made us a kingdom: and now have I brought unto him this victim for a thank-offering, and a perpetual memorial.

At 12 o'clock Prophet Strang preached a discourse on the fate of apostates, from the text, "The Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven." Law of the Lord, xxxviii. 19. Dent. xxix. 19.

In the afternoon Elders Bacon, Hickey and Brownson gave an account of their missions the last winter. A large number of persons were baptized and confirmed.

The son of a Mr. Waite, of Cincinnati, was recently seized with hydrophobia. We learn by the Cincinnati Gazette that since then, by judicious treatment, he has entirely recovered, though a running wound is intended to be kept up where the lad was bitten, in order to prevent the possibility of a return of the symptoms. The vesicles which formed under the tongue rapidly disappearing under the administration of Lachesis, a medicine prepared from the virus of the lance-headed adder, which was given as an antidote to the poison, and the spasms were prevented by the use of Belladonna and other remedies.

The N. Y. Tribune, of the 16th, says. We yesterday had the pleasure of meeting with Dr. Moritz Wagner, and his associate, Prof. Schetzer, of Vienna, who recently arrived here to commence a thorough exploration—scientific, social, political and statistical—of America. Dr. Wagner enjoys in Europe a high reputation as a traveler and a man of science. He has but lately returned from a prolonged residence in Persia Georgia, and the Caucasus, and his published travels in those countries afford a most valuable source of information in relation to their natural history, inhabitants, religion, literature, &c., &c. These gentlemen intend to spend some three years on the American Continent, extending their researches as far south as Chili. We cordially commend them and their mission to the good offices of the press and people, and especially of all friends of science and literature.

SOMETHING NEW UNDER THE SUN.—In a late number of the Cherokee Advocate, there is published an order from Col. J. Drennon, the superintendent of Indian affairs, requiring all white persons residing in the Cherokee Nation, west of the State of Arkansas, to leave within thirty days from the 28th Sept. last, "except regularly licensed traders and the employers mentioned in their licenses, granted them by the Agent of the United States; and such others as may be regularly married to Cherokees, and who maintain a fair character for sobriety, industry and morality, and deport themselves in all respects in accordance with the intercourse law of the United States." Hereafter, it is stated, no white person will be allowed to tarry in the Nation except by permission from the Cherokee Agent, at the request of a respectable citizen, and then the applicant must file evidence of his character for sobriety, industry, and good morals. Thus it would seem that government under its necessity to protect our savage brethren against civilization.

THE ACRES AND THE HANDS.

[The Hon. Mr. Florence, of Pennsylvania, in his speech in favor of the Homestead Law, when pending before the House of Representatives, introduced the following striking poem, from the pen of Duganne:]

"The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof,"

Says God's most holy word;
The water hath fish, and the land hath flesh,
And the air hath many a bird;
And the soil is teeming o'er all the earth,
And the earth hath numberless lands;
Yet millions of hands want acres,
While millions of acres want hands.

Sunlight, and music, and glad some flowers,
Are over the earth spread wide;
And God gave these gifts to men—
To men who on earth abide.
Yet thousands are toiling in poisonous gloom,
And shackled with iron bands,
And millions of hands want acres,
And millions of acres want hands.

'Tis writ that "ye shall not muzzle the ox,
That treadeth out the corn,"
But, behold, ye shackle the poor man's hand;
That have all earth's burdens borne;
The land is the gift of a bounteous God,
And to labor his word commands;
Yet millions of hands want acres,
While millions of acres want hands.

Who hath ordained that the few should hoard
Their millions of useless gold,
And rob the earth of its fruits and flowers,
While profitless soil they hold?
Who hath ordained that the parchment scroll
Should fence round miles of land,
While millions of hands want acres,
And millions of acres want hands?

'Tis a glaring lie on th' face of day—
This robbery of men's rights—
'Tis a lie that the word of the Lord disowns,
'Tis a curse that burns and blights;
And 'twill burn and blight, till the people rise
And swear, while they break their bands,
That the hands shall henceforth have acres,
And the acres henceforth have hands.

From the Times and Seasons.

GOSPEL.

When the Saviour gave commission to the apostles after his resurrection from the dead, he said unto them, as recorded by Matthew, xxviii. 19-20: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen."

Mark gives the following account of the commission given to the apostles, xvi. 15, 16, 17, 18. "And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.—He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

Luke records thus, xxiv. 45, 46, 47. "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, and said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day: and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."

In the second chapter of the Acts of the apostles, we have account of their first acting on their commission, and of their making proclamation at Jerusalem: as, according to the Savior's command they were to begin at Jerusalem, so they did, and the account of that memorable day is recorded by Luke, in the second chapter of the Acts of the apos-

ties, 37th and 38th verses. After Peter, who was the speaker on that occasion, had convinced many of the Jews that they had crucified the Lord of glory, the people cried out, and said to him, and the rest of the apostles, "men and brethren, what shall we do?" Then Peter said unto them repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of the Lord Jesus for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost: for the promise is unto you and to your children, and to all that are afar off; even as many as the Lord our God shall call." Let us put this account together, and we will have something exceedingly plain.—Matthew says that they were to go and teach all nations, baptizing them, with the promise that the Lord should be with them until the end of the world.—Mark tells what the teaching, mentioned by Matthew consisted in; that is, preaching the gospel, which he says they were to do to every creature in all the world, and to baptize them that believe, with a promise that the persons thus baptized should be saved: and also that signs should follow them that believe. Matthew says that they should go and teach all nations. Mark says that they should preach the gospel to every creature in all the world. So that there is no difference as to the extent of the commission given to the apostles. Matthew says that the Lord should be with them even to the end of the world, and Mark says that signs should follow them that believe. This doubtless was what Matthew meant by the Lord being with them till the end of the world; that is, by confirming the word with signs following. They both say that the people were to be baptized; but neither of them tell us what they were to be baptized for; only Mark says that the baptized should be saved. Luke throws some light on this subject: that is, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached among all nations. This compared with what Peter said on the day of Pentecost, makes this part of the commission very plain. He tells them to repent and be baptized every one of them in the name of the Lord Jesus, for the remission of sins, and they should receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. Mark says, that he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.—Peter says that he shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. Matthew says that the Savior promised to be with his disciples always, even unto the end of the world. Mark says that signs were to follow them that believe. These two accounts, when put together, amount to this: the Lord promised to be with them, in all confirming the word to the believers by signs. Let us now put the whole account together, and see precisely what it was, that these men proclaimed to the world.

First they were to go into all the world, and teach the gospel to every creature, in the world. Second those who believed their proclamation, and repented of their sins, they were to baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Spirit, for the remission of their sins, with this promise, that they should receive the gift of the Holy Spirit, and prophesy, see visions, and dream dreams, and that in addition to these, signs should follow them—in the name of Jesus they should speak with serpents, and if they were to drink any deadly thing, it should not hurt them: they should lay hands upon the sick and they should recover: and to finish the whole of the promises made to them, the Lord was to be with them, and they should be saved. Seven things comprise the whole of the items of command and promise which they were to deliver to the world: First, faith—Second, repentance—Third, baptism—Fourth, remission—Fifth, the gift of the Holy Spirit—Sixth, power—Seventh, salvation and eternal life.

Let the reader compare Matthew xxviii. 19, 20, with Mark, xvi. 15, 16, 17, 18,—Luke xxiv. 45, 46, 47, 48, with the second chapter of the Acts of the apostles and he will be enabled to see and understand the apostolic commission without either priest or commentator.

Let it be particularly understood, that when the apostles spake of the gospel, that it was this scheme of things to which they alluded; for this was what they proclaimed, and this was what all the ancient saints believed, and received, and by which they were distinguished from all other people. When Paul says that if we, or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel than that which we have preached, let him be accursed; or if any man preach any other gospel than that which you have received let him be accursed, it is to the above mentioned proclamation, he alludes; for this is what he preached, and this is what the Galatians had received—not a part of it, but the whole of it—not one, or two or three, or four, or five, or even six items, and the other one left; but all seven, or else they would not receive the gospel Paul preached, and which the Galatians received, but another, which would not be another, but a perversion of the gospel of Christ.

There never ought to be a dispute in the world about what the gospel is among those who profess a belief in the bible; for if it is not told in the scriptures plainly, and without leaving it a matter of contention, the bible is not a safe guide, neither could any thinking man trust his salvation on its teaching, unless they were easily understood: for if the gospel is designed for the salvation of all men, it certainly ought to be very plain; for there are a great many in the world who cannot understand any thing, unless it is very plain and easy of understanding. There is no subject ever addressed to the understanding of man, that needs to be so plain and easy of comprehension as the gospel, if we may credit the persons who have promulgated it. They profess to have had a commission to proclaim it to every creature in all the world.

In taking so wide a range, there would be many persons of very weak capacities, who are not able to understand but very little, and that little must be exceedingly plain, or else they would not be able to understand it. There is no person who suffers his mind to reflect on the nature and design of the gospel, but will be led to see that it must be the plainest of all messages; for it was to effect every creature in all the world; and if so, it must be suited to their capacities to make it a scheme of mercy and benevolence; for if they could not understand it, it would be worse than folly to present it to them. This is one reason why so few either believe or embrace it. It is too simple and foolish, according to their estimation, to be of any consequence to them.

It was so considered in the days of the apostles who immediately followed the Savior; and to such an extent did this feeling prevail, that an apostle said, if a man would be wise he must become a fool: that is, to be wise, he must believe and practise those things which the world considered the most perfect foolishness, and too simple and degrading, to be believed, by any rational being. And yet, notwithstanding its foolishness and simplicity, it had power to save them that believed; for, says the apostle, the, or, in other words, this foolishness of God, is wiser than men, and this weakness of God is stronger than men: "For when, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." 1 Cor. i.

Or, by the foolishness of the gospel which he proclaimed, to save those that the world with all its wisdom, could not save: for after all the wise men of the world had said, or could say, and all the wisdom they had or could get, with it all, they could not know God. But the apostle, with the foolishness of his preaching, could make men acquainted with God. From what is said on this subject in the New Testament, we can see that such was the contempt in which the gospel was held in that age of the world, that a man of talents or understanding to profess to believe it and to receive it, was to expose himself to the certain contempt of the wise ones, so called—to expose himself to their bitterest feelings and severest contempt; even to so great an extent did those feelings prevail, until they that killed them thought that they were doing God's service; John xvi. 16; doubtless thinking that they were knaves and rascals, and not fit to live. Such were the feelings which existed in the minds of the people, in the days of Paul, Peter, John and James, in relation to the gospel which they preached, and such are the feelings which prevail now, both concerning the gospel and those who receive it.

"Well, George," asked a friend of a young lawyer, who had been admitted about a year, "how do you like your profession?" The reply was accompanied by a deep sigh, to suit the occasion. "My profession is much better than my practice."

Dirt.—There is no harm in having one's prejudices corrected, now and then:—

Old Dr. Cooper, of South Carolina, used to say to his students, "Don't be afraid of a little dirt, young gentlemen. What is dirt? Why nothing at all offensive, when chemically viewed. Rub a little alkali upon that 'dirty grease-spot' on your coat, and it undergoes a chemical change, and becomes soap. Now rub it with a little water, and it disappears; it is neither grease, soap, water, nor dirt. That is a very odorous pile of dirt you observe there. Well, scatter a little gypsum over it, and it is no longer dirty. Every thing you call dirt is worthy of your notice as students of chemistry. Analyze it! It will all separate into very clean elements. Dirt makes corn, corn makes bread and meat, and that makes a very sweet young lady that I saw one of you kissing last night. So after all, you were kissing dirt—particularly if she whitens her skin with chalk or fuller's earth. There's no telling, gentlemen, what is dirt."

Mourning.—"Black is the sign of mourning," says Rabelais, "because it is the color of darkness, which is melancholy and the opposite of white, which is the color of joy, of light, of happiness." The early poets asserted that souls after death, went into a dark and gloomy empire. Probably it is in consonance with this idea that they imagined black was the most congenial color for mourning. The Chinese and the Siamese choose white, conceiving that the dead become beneficent genii. In Turkey, mourning is composed of blue or violet; in Ethiopia, of gray, and at the time of the invasion of Peru by the Spaniards, the inhabitants of that country wore it of mouse color. Among the Japanese, white is the sign of mourning, and black of rejoicing. In Castile, mourning vestments were formerly of white serge. The Persians clothed in brown, and their whole family and all their animals were shaven. In Lycia the men wore female habiliments during the whole time of their mourning.

A negro boy about ten years of age, belonging to Charleston, S. C., being desirous of paying Wilmington a visit, got under the guard of the steamer Gladiator, just aft the wheel, and placing his feet on the spandyle of the boat, (a large beam near the water line, designed to keep the craft upright and steady,) clasping a brace which stood conveniently near, got over safely. The distance is about one hundred and seventy miles, and the night was quite tempestuous. On being asked whether he slept during the night, he replied, "Golly! no, massa; didn't have no time."

Most young men consider it a great misfortune to be born poor or not to have capital enough to establish themselves in business. This is a mistaken notion. So far from poverty being a misfortune to them, if we may judge from what we every day behold, it is really a blessing; the chance is more than ten to one against him who is left with a fortune.

A SAILOR'S REASONING.—A sailor being about to sail for India, a citizen asked him where his father died!

"In shipwreck."
"And where did your grandfather die?"
"As he was fleeing, a storm arose, and he, with his companions, perished."
"And your great-grandfather?"
"He also perished from shipwreck."

"Then, if I were you, I would never go to sea."
"Pray, my philosopher, where did your father die?"
"My father, grandfather, and great-grandfather died in bed."

"Then, if I were you, I would never go to bed," replied the son of Neptune.

CONTINUAL persevering advertising, if the subject be at all adapted to the tastes and wants of the public, is sure to be successful. It is an indisputable fact, that there is no instance of a well sustained adherence to a continued system of advertising ever failing of success.

A BETER.—There is a man in Wisconsin by the name of Atherton, who in one week in January last, thrashed four hundred bushels of wheat, three constables, and forty deputy sheriffs. Smart man that.

Dobbs says tailors would make splendid dragoons, they charge so.

A HINT.—Make other men's shipwreck thy sea marks.

Why is a New York omnibus liable the heart of a flint? Because there is always room for another to be taken in.

A MAN OF SENSE.—A man being asked why he talked to himself, candidly answered, "Because I like to converse with a man of sense."

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.

In Denmark marriage is only regarded as a mere civil contract among the privileged orders; among the lower ranks, a priest is necessary to render the marriage binding.

In Brittany very curious custom prevailed. In the bishopric of Leon, a gallant approaches a young girl without offering a word to her; he salutes her by taking off his hat, and then laying hold of the string or braid of her apron, beginning to twirl and roll it between his fingers. If the young woman interrupts him and draws the string away, it is an unfavorable sign, and he may try his fortune elsewhere; but if, on the contrary, she permits him to roll it to the end, he may reckon himself tolerably sure of favor.

In Cornouaille, the tailor is the important personage to whom the candidate for matrimony applies for a list of eligible girls.—Having selected one, the tailor at once proceeds to the maiden's father, carrying a wand of broom, (which gives him the title of Bazvalan, the name of the plant.) He is dressed for the occasion in official stockings, one of which is of a violet color and the other red, and with him is the suitor and his nearest relatives. Whilst the family chiefs are making their arrangements, and the lovers retire to the other end of the house, and discourse their own "sweet music." It is necessary that the engaged pair should put an hand themselves to the term of the negotiation. They approach, holding each other by the hand, to the table where their mutual parents or relatives are seated, when bread, wine, and brandy are brought in.

The young man and maiden eat with the same knife, and drink out of the same cup; and the day for union is then agreed upon. The bride makes her choice of a bridesmaid, and the gallant selects his groomsman, then, accompanied by the tailor with his white wand, they all together proceed to invite their relatives to the wedding. The ceremony takes place nearly always on Tuesday, in the house of the bride. Immediately the bridegroom enters the house, the brother, on the part of the bride's family, goes on his knees, and says a pater for the living, and a de profundis for the dead. Then he asks for the young maiden the blessings of the family. Mirth and laughter is frequently interrupted by tears and sobs during this singular ritual. In some places it is customary for the mother to cut with scissors the end of the bride's sash.

After the wedding ceremony, comes the feast. At the end of each course, the music strikes up and the company distribute themselves to many amusements as wrestling, dancing, running, &c., as they tire running to the festive board. Midnight announces to the guests that it is time for retiring. The groomsman and the bridesmaid are the only strangers who remain of all who attended the wedding feast—These two are bound to put the bride and bridegroom with due solemnity to bed, and then retire singing the psalm "Veni Creator."

In some places they are often compelled to watch during the entire night in the chamber of the new married couple. In other districts they hold at the foot of the nuptial bed a lighted candle between the fingers, and do not withdraw till the flame reaches the palm of the hand, or until the servants bring a certain famous milk soup, in which crumbs of bread are sily attached together by a thread. Elsewhere the groomsman is bound during the whole of the night to throw nuts at the husband, who cracks, and gives the kernels to his bride.

In some parishes in the southern districts, as soon as the Bazvalan presents himself at a house, and stands on the threshold of the door, saluting those within, should it happen that no one invites him to enter, or the brands of the fire are standing upright when he does enter, or if the mistress takes a crepe (the species of pancake which is their ordinary food) and begins to toast it before the fire at the end of her fingers, it is a bad augury, and the Bazvalan has nothing to do but to retire as he came. He would be cautious also never to continue his journey if at setting out he meets a crow or a magpie; but should he hear the cooing of a turtle dove, and as soon as he reaches the house he is invited to enter, the match is in a fair way of success. He addresses the mother in a low tone, who communicates with her daughter; and consent being gained, the wedding is fixed to take place in a month. On the following Sunday evening, the betrothment is held at the priest's house; next morning at high mass the bans are published, after which poetical invitations are sent for the bridal. On the appointed day, at sunrise, the suitor and a joyous group assemble to conduct the bride to church. Bazvalan goes first to the door and sings verses to which another minstrel, employed by the bride, should reply. All the saints in the calendar are invoked for blessings—the bride's right hand is placed in that of her husband's—the exchange of rings is made as the Bazvalan mutters prayers, and eternal constancy is sworn.

In the province of Leon, in Spain, many persons would be frightened at the improvidence with which the peasants contract their unions. Many who leave service to be married, have not even a bed to lay their heads upon the first night, and often borrow a bed for a single day.

In Shoa, Abyssinia, a girl is reckoned according to the value of property; and if she is an heirless to a field, cow, or bedstead, is certain to add a husband to her list before many summers have passed over her head. The parties declare before witnesses, upon the life of the king, and that they intended to live happily together; and the property of both being produced, is carefully appraised. A mule, or an ass, a dollar, shield, and a sheaf of spears on the one side, are noted against the lady's stock of wheat, cotton and household gear; and the bargain being struck, the effects become joint property for a time, until some domestic difference occurs, and either, taking up their own, depart to seek a new mate.

In Switzerland, it is considered somewhat imprudent to marry without a good stock of cows, and many a wedding has been brought about by the "Kuhrehiha," or cow-song. This song is in the shape of a dialogue between a young drover, whose shoe pinches him, and a young maiden, who kindly lends him a pair of slippers to ease him.—Talking of slippers leads to a remark upon the pretty feet that had worn them, and, by an obvious train of thought, to the praise of other charms. The charms produce love, love an offer of marriage, and marriage mentioned, becomes a question of cows.

In most parts of Sweden, the fair betrothed is married about six o'clock in the evening, and immediately afterwards she is brought to the window; in which a number of lighted candles are placed, where she has to blush, (if she can,) and show herself till evening, an immense crowd being gathered below, having the privilege, according to vile custom, of demanding her to come forward, should she be absent a longer time than suits their notion of propriety.

The king of Senaar buys his wives by weight, and cares not how they look in the face, provided they are fat and solid.—With most of the Moorish tribes, corpulence and beauty are synonymous, and a woman of moderate pretensions must be one who cannot walk without a slave under each arm to support her, whilst a perfect beauty is a camel's load.

In Turkey a child between twelve or thirteen years of age is snatched from her parents, and consigned to the keeping of an insolent and ill mannered boy only a few years older. She must herself have become a mother, before the rules of eastern etiquette—not, indeed, strictly observed—allow her to enjoy again a mother's converse. In the meantime, she remains generally under the guardianship of her mother-in-law, and is exposed to all the rudeness and caprice of her boy-husband. At times, if his victim shows no immediate signs of becoming a mother, he takes it into his head to repudiate her—in which case he returns to her parent's house, when she must wait for three months to see whether her husband is pleased to repeat his precipitate conduct, and demand her back. Twice the husband may repudiate his wife, but after the third time he cannot, by the laws of Islamism, receive her again, and she may become the wife of another.

When a Turk decides upon taking a wife, his female friends inspect the pedigree and personal qualifications of the intended bride. Her hair is shaken up and combed to show that it is her own; her mouth is examined for false teeth; and her cheeks and eyebrows are well scrubbed, that any coloring matter may be removed. The day before the marriage, the bride goes to the bath, and is washed by three or four women. The ceremony is so solemn that her nearest relations walk before her with lighted torches in their hands. In the wedding procession, the bride rides with a veil over her face, accompanied by her servants, who make a great clamor, and pretend, as in the case of Jephthah's daughter, to lament her loss.—The Turks may marry their sisters, provided they begin with the eldest; for if they begin with the youngest, they cannot marry the others. He is allowed four lawful wives.

When the Persians make love, they use many stratagems to convince their mistresses that they are faithful. In the ardor of their affection, they burn themselves on some parts of the body by setting fire to their clothes, and take care that the scorching be on a part that is visible, and in this state they present themselves to the object of their affections. If they accept them, the ladies are always careful to furnish these ardent lovers with fillets and scarfs of silk to bind up the wounds which they have received in the wars of the "God of Love;" and they are most esteemed who put themselves to the greatest pain.

The Persians marry many wives, which they may part with. The nobility have as many as they please, but the commonality exceed not seven. When the day is appointed for the marriage of a great man, the relations and friends meet in his house, dressed in his livery. If they are not particular friends, they dress as they please, and always as fine as they can. When it is bed time, two men conduct him to the bride's chamber, she entering by another door. The company in the meantime continue dancing. Should the man be not satisfied with his bride, he often rejects her in the presence of the company, after he has given her a sum of money, and her relations instantly depart with her.

THE WAY SHE TURNED HIM.

The most bigotted and unreasonable party man I ever met was Jack D., now a prosperous and influential attorney in S. county, in this State.

At the hour of which I am writing, he was a red hot democrat, and his chief pleasures seemed to consist in making the fact as notorious as possible to the world. Such was Jack D. at the time of our story, acknowledged on every side as a firm and incorruptible democrat. But, alas! let us, however, not anticipate—but to our story.

One unlucky day Jack met at the house of a friend, a young lady of great personal beauty and accomplishments. Attracted by her loveliness, and captivated by her intelligence, he became assiduous in attention, forgot his "principles," and without inquiring what might be the political preferences of his "lady love," imprudently proposed, was accepted, and they were married.

The wedding was over, the guests had departed, and they had retired to their chamber, and were snugly ensconced in bed, when Jack, in the course of a quiet conversation with his wife, unwittingly alluded to his favorite subject, by casually speaking of himself as being a democrat.

"What!" exclaimed she, turning sharply and suddenly towards him, "are you a democrat?"

"Yes, madam," replied Jack, delighted with the idea of having a patient listener to his long restrained oratory. "Yes, madam, I am a democrat, attached to the principles of the great progressive party; a regular out and out, double-dyed and twisted in the wool."

"Just double and twist yourself out of this bed, then," interrupted his wife. "I am a whig, I am, and will never sleep with any man professing the abominable doctrines you do."

Jack was speechless from absolute amazement. That the very wife of his bosom should prove a traitor was horrible—she must be jesting. He remonstrated—in vain—tried persuasion—'twas useless—entreaty—'twas no go. She was in sober earnest, and the only alternative left him was a prompt renunciation of his heresy, or a separate bed in another room. Jack did not hesitate. To abjure the great and established doctrines of his party, to renounce his allegiance to that faith that had become identified with his very being, to the mere whim and caprice of a woman, was utterly ridiculous and absurd, and he threw himself from the bed and prepared to quit the room.

As he was leaving the door his wife screamed out to him, "I say, my dear, when you recant your heresy and repent your past errors, just knock at my door, and perhaps I will let you in." The door was violently slammed, and Jack proceeded wrathfully in quest of another apartment. A sense of insulted dignity, and a firm conviction that he was a martyr in the "right cause," strengthened his pride, and he resolved to hold out until he forced his wife into a capitulation.

In the morning she met him as if nothing had happened, but whenever Jack ventured to allude to the rupture of the night previous, there was a "laughing devil" in her eye, which bespoke her power and extinguished hope. A second time he repaired to his lonely couch, and a second time he called up his pride to support him in the struggle which he now found was getting desperate.

The second day was a repetition of the first—no allusion was made to the forbidden subject, on either side. There was a look of quiet happiness and cheerfulness about his wife, that puzzled Jack sorely, and he felt that all idea of forcing her into a surrender must be abandoned.

A third night he was alone with his thoughts. His reflections were more serious and composed than on the previous night. What they were, of course, were known to himself, but they seemed to result in something decided, for about midnight three distinct raps were made at his wife's door. No answer, and the signal was repeated in a louder tone; still, all was silent, and a third time the door shook with violent attacks from the outside.

"Who's there?" cried the voice of his wife, as if just aroused from a deep sleep.

"It's me, my dear, and perhaps a little the best whig you ever did see!"

The revolution in his opinions was radical and permanent. He removed to another country, became popular, offered himself as a candidate on the whig ticket for the Legislature, was elected, and for several sessions represented his adopted country as a firm and decided whig.

BEFORE AND AFTER MARRIAGE.

Here is a before-and-after-marriage anecdote that we commend to the attention of all those who are dissatisfied with their lives of "single blessedness":—

"Dearest Ellen, do you love me?" asked Dr. Beeswax of the pretty little Miss Willow, a few weeks before marriage.

"Aye, better than life, better than home; you are my very soul; parted from you, I should wither and decay, like the flowers in autumn."

Said the doctor in reply, "I swear you are to me an angel; none so peerless as you. May my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I ever crossly speak to you."

After the doctor had been married six months, the following confab might have been heard between him and Mrs. Beeswax:—

"Ellen, why don't you get up? You are decidedly the laziest woman I ever saw. There's not starch enough in my dicky, and it's no use of talking to you. I don't believe you'd wash your face, if it wasn't for shame's sake."

"There you go again, you cruel brute; always flying at me.—I lead the life of a dog, and will go home to mother."

"Go, and good riddance to bad rubbish!"

"Don't talk so to me, sir! I won't stand it; take that!" and Mrs. Beeswax, jumping out of bed, caught up a cricket to throw at the old gentleman's head.—The doctor ran down stairs at a 2:40 pace.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, JULY 15, 1852.

Our Conference the commencement of which we noticed in the last no., continued its session till Sunday evening, one day longer than was expected. The congregation was larger than anticipated, and faith and a most exemplary union prevailed. It was a most happy season, marred only by the necessity of dropping from the quorum of the Twelve three members, Graham, Blakeslee, and Savage, who have not worked a faithful ministry.

The quorum of the seventy was re-organized. A large mission was sent to Iowa, one will go soon to Illinois and another to Wisconsin. The prospects from abroad are cheering.

We advise all gentlemen who are under the necessity of travelling on the Steamer J. D. Morton to hire some clown to go along as company for the officers. It would not be amiss for such as have anything valuable aboard to take a few handsome boxes of—nothing valuable, for the accommodation of the thieves employed on board. Persons taking this precaution may be assured that when they get ashore they will be satisfied to keep off that boat, even though the Capt. may have gone a dozen miles out of his way to land them so far from where they wished to stop, in violation of express contract.—Northern Islander, June 21.

To any person who is at all acquainted with the peculiarities of the Mormons, (of which sect the Northern Islander is the organ) it were needless to make an explanation or attempt a reply to the above article. Within a few months our citizens have seen several families who have been driven from Beaver Island, in a state of destitution and misery, by the so called "Latter Day Saints," because they refused to affiliate with Mormonism, and refused to be participants in the crimes and enormities which have signalized the course of the followers of James J. Strang, and shocked the moral sense of the entire country. In addition to this, the murder of BENNETT, the abuse of the authorities of the United States, the plundering of the Fishermen upon the shores of Green Bay and Lake Michigan, and, more important than all, the investiture of that arrant hypocrite Strang, with a kingly diadem, are all too fresh in the memory to be passed over as an idle tale, or a fictitious romance.

With the officers of the Steamer Julius D. Nelson, it has been our good fortune to become intimately acquainted; and from the owner, (J. B. CLARK, Esq., of Detroit,) to the most inefficient deck hand, we have yet to hear the first cause of well founded complaint. Gentlemen, accommodating and attentive to their passengers and the public—generous and humane to the poor and destitute—it seems impossible that even the miserable Mormons should find cause of complaint. We will not particularize, in alluding to the Morton; the travelling public have experienced so much of the kind disposition of each and all, that such a course is impossible.

But, to return to the Mormons: whatever they touch seems to become defiled; whatever they land speedily receives the condemnation of the virtuous and meritorious. This cannot be without cause. We fear the atrocious acts of this band of miscreants will, ere long provoke a recurrence of the scenes of Nauvoo, where they were driven forth, by the uprising of an injured State, to seek refuge in dark and noisome places, or doomed to carnage and death.

For such open and undisguised violators of the Laws of the Land, there can be no punishment too severe—no penalty too adequate.

The time is coming when a collision will take place, unless they abandon their nefarious practices, and abominable crimes.—Green Bay Spectator, July, 13.

We presume that during the trip of the Morton next preceding the issue of the above defence of the officers of that boat, no gentleman had cause of complaint. The Swiss editor of the Spectator was aboard, and the officers had their proper associate, and of course let gentlemen alone. Mr. Strang, who happened to be aboard, (and finding the buffoon already engaged, had no occasion to hire one,) and J. B. Clark, Esq., the proprietor, whose gentlemanly conduct has never yet been questioned, at least in this quarter, found ample leisure to enjoy themselves, and were not troubled even at table with the presence of the Capt., who took umbrage at his employer for thinking he owed an apology to the Mormons for his brutality to them.

To some it may seem a little singular that since a Whig administration has taken the "land of miscreants who were DRIVEN FORTH FROM NAUVOO by the UP-RISING OF AN INJURED STATE, to seek REFUGE IN DARK and NOISOME PLACES, or doomed to CARNAGE and DEATH," and not only erected them into a territory of the United States, with full legislative and judicial powers, but appointed their very leaders to such high and honorable offices as Governor of a Territory, Judges of the U. S. District Courts, U. S. Marshals, &c., a genuine Whig editor should be quite so ready to hold them up to the HATRED and DETESTATION of mankind.

Traitor to one, traitor to all. Who will be surprised that the Democrat who publishes a Whig paper on speculation, should also give a Whig administration a most scathing rebuke, on pretence of only pandering to popular prejudice against a peculiar faith?

Thus the editor says, "within a few months our citizens have seen several families who have been driven from Beaver Island in a state of destitution and misery, by the so called 'Latter Day Saints.'" If there was one word of truth in this, it would but be the beginning of the fulfillment of that scripture which says, "reward her as she rewarded you." Rev. xviii. 6. For we have not forgotten that 10,000 of these "Latter Day Saints" were driven in destitution, poverty and want from the State of Missouri, without so much as being accused of a crime.

The public meeting at Independence, Mo., which decreed the expulsion of the Latter Day Saints, put forth their manifesto giving their reasons for doing so, in which they acknowledged that no crime against the law was laid to their charge. And this fact stands on the record of the Legislature of Missouri, and of the Senate of the United States.

And we, with the Spectator, remember full well that 25,000 of these Latter Day Saints have also been driven in destitution, poverty and want from the State of Illinois, leaving behind them the ruins of the most populous city in the State, and $5,000,000 worth of lands, of which they were robbed to enrich their spoilers.

Not satisfied with murdering, banishing and plundering, they have endeavored to palliate these crimes, which, in a country less corrupted, would have made their perpetrators dreaded and hated of all men, by accusing their victims of the crimes in which themselves are steeped.

So far as bears upon the controversy between us and the Spectator, he may have these accusations, true or false, just as suits him. If they are true, he can never get over the fact that a WHIG ADMINISTRATION gave the offices of Governor, U. S. Marshal and Judges of the U. S. District Courts to five of the ring leaders of these miscreants, and if they are false, then the Spectator is the mere, open, cool, unprovoked advocate of banishment, robbery, murder, and all the horrors of civil war, as a mere punishment for religious faith.

If there are any persons who have been driven from here in poverty and want, they came to want by drunkenness, and by spending their time and money in trying to drive off the Latter Day Saints. The pit they dug for us they have fallen into, and there has been no driving except by sending officers of the law to arrest them for their perjuries and their thefts. If this is driving men off, we intend to keep at it, and the editors of the Spectator are welcome to keep them company. Fit associates they are.

The Spectator has never yet found time and cause to deprecate the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith—men upon whom the stain of no crime has ever yet been fixed—arrested without legal authority—upon a complaint founded on open unblushing perjury; avowedly as a mere pretence to keep them till the mob could get ready for its deed of blood—thrust in prison after they had given legal bail—a guard set over them to protect them: from the mob, every one of whom was notoriously engaged in the plan for their murder; and then 250 armed men engaged in the dastardly deed of slaying two men in prison.

Had they been the vilest pirates who ever roved and crimsoned the dark blue sea, all the earth should have blanched at the thought of a deed so bloody; so dastardly cruel. Being holy men—prophets of God—the Spectator can see no crime there.

But when Thomas Bennett, a thief with a fame as broad as the Mackinac fisheries, a felon escaped from Ireland to pirate upon the French and Indians here, instead of wearing a ball and chain in the penal colony of New South Wales, sets the law of the State at defiance, and a spirited public officer is obliged for the safety of the lives and property of simple countrymen, to go fifty miles from home to prosecute him, and compels the Mormons under legal penalties to join the posse for his arrest; and they, after he has fired on them three times, and shot the officer down, return the fire and kill him,—they are cruel murderers. It is thus the Spectator judges the conduct of men. God grant, it may never speak well of us. Better all our persecutions, than the accursed praise of so foul a heart.

But the Mormons have "abused the authorities of the U. S." What we have said, we have said, and we will not abate one jot.—George C. Bates, late U. S. District Attorney for the District of Michigan, obtained twelve indictments, each against nine different individuals, for cutting timber on United States lands, and Mr. Strang held at the same time an official letter from Mr. Bates, giving permission to cut the timber, and assuring him that there would be no prosecution and that no vessels would be seized for carrying it to market. And Mr. Strang "kept the document," and had the pleasure of exhibiting it among Bates' admirers in Detroit, while the prosecution was pending.

Geo. C. Bates prosecuted 13 Mormons on a charge of mail robbery, through a trial of two weeks continuance, at the expense of many thousand dollars, sending a national vessel 500 miles for witnesses, after expressing the deliberate opinion that the accusation was founded in mere unmitigated perjury.—Not merely that no robbery was committed nor attempted, but that the men who pretended the attempt had been made on them did not so much as have a mail in custody. And that he did make such declarations we can prove by gentlemen holding commissions under the U. S. Government. Worse than that, we can prove that he suborned witnesses with government funds to commit perjury in support of such a prosecution. And this only opens the top of his budget. We will go to the bottom of it whenever and wherever he pleases.

Charles H. Knox, late U. S. Marshal for the District of Mich., not satisfied with common measures to obtain false testimony against us, went to one of the interior counties and took a prisoner charged with stealing a large amount of property, who had spent a few weeks here, and carried him to the Detroit jail, where he was confined separate from all other prisoners, and pressed from day to day to swear that he had "heard Mr. Strang say he sent men to rob the mail," with the promise that if he would do so he should be set at large, and no further prosecuted, and threatened in the alternate with the most relentless and vindictive prosecution.

Knox and Bates visited him, and labored with him from time to time; and when he finally refused Knox thrust him in the cell with violence, saying, you will go back to —, and from there to Jackson. His guilt is very doubtful. But Knox had his revenge. He is in the Jackson State Prison for the crime of refusing to commit perjury.—Knox is dead. But death cannot sanctify such deeds. We saw Knox accused of this crime in the U. S. Court room, and the witnesses named to him by whom it would be proved, and he could not answer a word. He shielded himself by the fact that he had already made the Mormons too poor to prosecute him. Public funds run like water only when the innocent are to suffer.

But the Mormons are accused of "plundering the fishermen upon the shores of Green Bay and Lake Michigan." If there was one word of truth in this accusation it would be but the law of reprisals, which prevails and has been practised by all the nations of the earth.

Is it not a little singular that just at the moment a Mormon colony landed here all the fishermen for hundreds of miles around, among whom previously thieving was a daily occurrence, reformed and became perfectly honest? There have been a multitude of cases where property has been stolen and the theft laid to the charge of the Mormons; but in every single instance, without a solitary exception, when the property was found, it was in the hands of Gentile fishermen. In a number of cases which occur vividly to our recollection, the thief himself has been among the most violent in accusing the Mormons, and has made a mantle broad enough to conceal and escape with his prey.

We will undertake to furnish to any gentleman a catalogue of 100 cases occurring in the last 3 years where stolen property has been found in the hands of fishermen. And we defy any man on the face of the broad earth to show a case within the whole region of the fisheries where it has been found in the hands of the Mormons. If the fishermen are willing to be forever plundered without redress, let them continue to lay it to the Mormons, while the spoil is laying in the houses of their neighbors. We can stand it as long as they can. When our property is stolen, we go to the fishermen for it and find it, because it is there. When theirs is stolen they go howling about the Mormons, and don't find it, because it is among their nearer neighbors.

But the Spectator has pondered on Mormonism so much that he has turned prophet, and proclaims in the name of his God that the scenes at Nauvoo will recur again; that banishment, carnage and death will be meted out to us here, as there by a band of murderous robbers, setting all law and all authority at defiance.

Well, Mr. Spectator, bring them on whenever you dare. We do not know but the blood of prophets, saints and martyrs may be upon your hands as well as others. There are many here who have been imprisoned, and possibly may be murdered for the witness of Jesus and the word of God. But if it must be so, let it be upon us, and not upon our children. We count not our lives dear unto us.

The Mormon King and nine in ten of his subjects live in houses without locks, or bolts, or bars. They have wooden latches, and the strings are not pulled in of nights. But we understand what such predictions; such apologies for lawless violence mean; and if you have the remotest idea of invoking the power of mobs against us, we say again, try it if you dare; and if you be the ninth part of a man, stop talking about it, and come and strike the blow now; and cursed be he who first shall say, enough.

We want to see the man who dare bring a mob against the Mormons, or the town or city that dare send one or suffer one to leave its portals, on such an errand. Bring all Green Bay, and join with you all the thieves in the lakes, take the Morton for your flag ship, and its Capt. for your admiral, and the widows and orphans shall ask us, when, where, and how God's justice was meted to you.

The Propeller Lady of the Lake on her last trip up took from here 20 passengers; most of them Elders going west to proclaim the Gospel of the Kingdom. Half as many more are waiting a passage by the next boat.

Mr. ———, U. S. Indian Agent, called here about a week since on a tour visiting the different bands at their homes. We think the practice, if kept up and in the hands of an honest officer, such as he seems to be, would result in much good, and the reform of many abuses.

ACCIDENT—While the Propeller Lady of the Lake was lying at the wharf of F. Johnson & Co., a deck hand fell overboard, and sunk the second time. Fortunately he was rescued.

The fisheries are beginning to produce well. The quantity of fish coming is great, and traders are making prices rule high—$7 and $8 is paid at the fisheries.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS.—The celebrated Indian Chief Shabbona, his son, and suite, were at this place last Wednesday, on his return to Illinois. Shabbona is a native of this region, an Ottawa by birth, but for many years a distinguished and influential Chief of the Indians residing in Illinois. Shabbona's influence prevented most of the Indians in central and northern Illinois joining in the Sac and Fox war. Notwithstanding this fact, at the conclusion of peace, Shabbona's band, with all the tribes in the region were compelled to sell their lands to the whites. Shabbona, as an especial mark of gratitude, was allowed to reserve a large portion of the grove that bears his name; but three years ago, without any notice to him, and without any pretence of right, the U. S. sold out his reserve, and to this day he has been unable to obtain any redress. His relatives are in this neighborhood. After an absence of 57 years, during which he has by his wisdom and the arts of peace risen among strangers to be the ruler of a powerful tribe, and lived to see them annihilated by the christian vices, we bid him welcome back here, to end his days in peace.

THE OUTCAST CHILDREN.

NEW YORK, June 24th, 1852. "The astounding facts that more than one-fourth of the entire number committed to prison, and that nearly one-half of these charged with petty offences against person and property had not attained the age of twenty-one years, call loudly for the adoption of some measure, that may stay the progress of these cadets of crime."—Report from the Warden of the City Prison, Jan. 1, 1852.

"Of the higher grades of felony, four-fifths of the complaints examined have been against minors, and full two-thirds of all the complaints for crime acted on during the term have been against persons between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one."—Presentment of the Grand Jury—New York, 1852.

Out of 16,000 criminals committed to the Tombs this last year, over 4,000 were under twenty-one years of age! And of these about 800 were between the ages of nine and fifteen!

Of the 2,400 thieves confined there, 1,100 were under twenty-one, and some 600 under fifteen.

But hear Mr. Matsell on this subject, in his report of 1850:—

"Reports have been made to me from the Captains of (11) Patrol Districts, from which it appears that the enormous number of 2,955 children are engaged in these Wards alone, as above described, [i. e. in pilfering, prostitution, begging and immoralities of the most loathsome description.] And of these two-thirds are females between eight and sixteen years of age! This estimate, I believe, to be far short of the number engaged."

Mr. Matsell then reckons up the various classes of vagrant children in this city, making the whole number about ten thousand. Mr. M. thinks the above would be a low estimate the present year.

One more text, and not without its pathos, too:—

"The bodies of two boys were found yesterday morning, in the ruins of the fire in Hammer st. The names of the deceased are unknown, and it is probable that they will not be identified, as they are thought to be lads who had no home, but wandered about the City in the daytime, and at night slept in stables, carts or elsewhere."—Tribune, June 12.

Is our most christian community aware of all this? A mighty multitude growing up among us, of child-thieves and of prostitutes who are scarce out of their leading-strings. Children, numbering by the thousands, who have no home, and "sleep in stables, or carts, or elsewhere;" who are without friends, except an occasional employer, selling them, body and soul, for gain; who were never in a school; who do not know how to read; who never heard of the Bible, and whose life is steeped in disgusting crime and pollution?

The writer of this has been engaged of late in visiting our city prisons, and in giving his aid to those gentlemen who are laboring among this class of vagrant children—and he had no conception before of the fearful extent of this evil. These young outcasts and vagabonds crowd every filthy lane and alley of the city; they infest the piers, till, though thousands of dollars are lost by their petty pilfering, neither police nor owners can do anything against them; they fill the lowest cellars with their precocious debauchery and drunkenness; the jails, station-houses and prisons are packed with them, till the Warden of the City Prison very sensibly says, in the report above quoted: "As it is now, the moral welfare of the delinquents and the interests of society would be better served by dismissing the charges against them than by placing them here under the instruction of able and experienced professors of iniquity."

We have seen girls, scarce fourteen years of age, festering with disease in the wards of the syphilitic Hospital of Blackwell's Island; and each day boys and girls are brought on criminal charges before our Police Courts, who in other grades of society would be still in the nursery.

Mr. Matsell informs us that one of the most common of the vile offenses of the city, and one which the Police regulations can seldom reach, is the employment, by old villains, of little girls, to go forth in numbers, and bring in a rich harvest of wages, by submitting to the most debasing pollution.

All this in our most Christian City of New York!

During the last two years the writer of this has had some considerable opportunity of observing the degradation of Europe, and to him it is sadly ominous of evil that our future society rests on such a basis of guilt and wretchedness. There is nothing in Europe worse than the black side of New York. The lanes of Liverpool, Westminster and St. Giles; the faubourgs of the Seine, and the suburbs of Vienna, do not any of them present an aspect of such unmingled poverty and unchecked vice as our lowest Wards.

And be it remembered with this fearful addition,—our proletariat, our outcasts and vagrants are our voters, our future citizens,—almost our legislators.

But the saddest aspect to this, is, that it should begin so with children.

Did any of your readers ever enter one of the vagrant schools now being started in the City? You would be surprised. There are no keener and shrewder faces often than those of the vagabond boys of a large city. But they are so old. The furrows of passion, the stamps of disease and want, where there should be the smooth bloom of childhood.—The eye, which should be brightened with boyish merriment, cunning, glassy, heavy.

Look at this Christian men!—We talk of labor among "Heathens," and give generously for it, but there are no Heathen like the boys of the Five Points.—Boys with the sharpness, the untiring energy of our American character, and with the tremendous passions and ungoverned vices of savages. It is easy to talk severely of "resisting temptation" and to pack these boys away to the prisons and workhouses.—Temptation! For them, it has been incessant and infinite to evil. An organization inclining to crime: the lessons of childhood—debauchery and drunkenness; home—a filthy cellar; curses and blows, hard talk and worse practice, want and filth—the influences working on the ripening mind and body. These, the vagrant's advantages for "resisting temptation!"

WORK—means of livelihood—a home, are the first things for these children. Preaching and tracts are of little use to the girl who has not where to lay her head, except in a brothel, or to the boy, who can only keep himself from starvation by stealing. No duty to the suffering or the guilty anywhere, can for a moment compete with ours to these outcast children at our doors—the children of our kinsfolk—the future citizens of our country.

"NO."

Would ye learn the bravest thing
That man can never do?
Would ye be an uncrowned king,
Absolute and true?
Would ye seek to emulate
All we learn in story,
Of the moral just and great,
Rich in real glory?
Would ye lose much bitter care
In your lot below?
Bravely speak out when and where
'Tis right to utter "No."

Learn to speak this little word
In its proper place—
Let not timid doubt be heard,
Clothed with sceptic grace.
Let thy lips, without disguise,
Boldly pour it out;
Though a thousand dulcet lies
Keep hovering about.
For be sure our hearts would lose
Future years of woe,
If our courage could refuse
The present hour with "No."

When temptation's form would lead
To some pleasant wrong—
When she tunes her hollow reed
To the ayen's song—
When she offers bribe, and smile,
And our conscience feels
There is naught but shining guile
In the gifts she deals—
Then, Oh! then let courage rise
To its strongest flow;
Show that ye are brave as wise,
And firmly answer "No."

Men with godly spirits blest,
Willing to do right,
Yet who stand with wavering breast
Beneath Persuasion's might,
When companions seek to taunt
Judgment into sin;
When the loud laugh fain would daunt
Your better voice within,
Oh! be sure you'll never meet
More insidious foe;
But strike the coward to your feet,
By Reason's watchword, "No."

Few have learnt to speak this word
When it should be spoken,
Resolution is deferred,
Vows to virtue broken.
More of virtue is required
This one word to say,
Than to stand where shots are fired
In the battle fray.
Use it fully, and ye'll see
Many a lot below,
May be schooled and nobly ruled
By power to utter "No."

From the Times and Seasons.

GOSPEL.

Since the coming forth of the everlasting gospel, contained in the book of Mormon, the very same feeling prevails among the would be wise ones. It is called a "simple and a foolish mess!" too simple to be believed or received by any person of sense. And every man of that description in the estimation of the world, must be a knave, say they; for surely they know better; for any person of a spark of sense, must know that it is an imposition. But notwithstanding all this tumult of words and great exertions, the persons who embrace it in sincerity and truth, learn, as the saints of former years, that it has power to save; and that the foolishness of God is wiser than man, and the weakness of God stronger than men: God saves them that believe: And as this last proclamation has the same effect on the enemies of God in those days, as the former proclamation had in the former days, so this last proclamation has the same effect on those who receive it, as the former had on those who received it, and the same fruit follows. They receive the same spirit, and that spirit brings forth the same fruit, at one age, that it did at another; and the same gospel will always secure the same blessings to those who receive it.

Upon this subject there appears to be something very strange to me, in the world; it is this: all men who believe, or who pro-less to believe, in the gospel, say that as far as the gospel proposes eternal blessings, they will be enjoyed by all who receive it, but as to the blessings proposed to be enjoyed by the saints in the flesh, these are limited to a few individuals, or a few individual churches. The fruits of the spirit which were brought forth in former days, notwithstanding they were the effects of receiving the gospel, were limited to a small period of the world; for though men receive the same gospel now, yet these fruits have ceased; but still the eternal blessings are the same: they will all get to the same heaven, and rejoice in the same glory. It matters not how much they may differ in this world, they will be all alike there.

The great query with me is this, how can the gospel still have power to save in the kingdom of glory, since it has lost its power on earth? Those who were saved by it in former days, and made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, were made partakers of its power on earth; and we have no account of its saving any in the heavenly kingdom, only those who were made partakers of its power on earth. But according to the opinions of the world, it has lost its power on earth, but still retains power sufficient to save men in the everlasting kingdom—this may be, but I must confess I have serious doubts about it, and should not be surprised if it should be found, that those who never receive its power on earth, should likewise fail of its glory in eternity.

There is one thing necessary to know in order to have a correct knowledge of the gospel: it is, that it was, is, and ever will be the same; that it is as immutable as God himself, or Jesus the Savior, and that the gospel is the scheme of life and salvation; and there was not nor will not be any other, it is that scheme of things by which all who are now saved were saved by it. The apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Ephesians, i. from the 3d to the 11, gives us the following account of the scheme of life and salvation, which he promulgated in his day to the generation among whom he lived, and to whom the Lord sent him. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: according as he hath chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he has made us accepted in the beloved. In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace; wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he has purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him."

In the foregoing quotation the apostle gives us the order of things, which he proclaimed to the people of his day, which he said he had not received of man, nor by man; but by revelation of Jesus Christ. Galatians i. 11, 12. "But I certify you brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man: for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ."

The account then which the apostle gives of the proclamation which he proclaimed to the world is that the same thing which he received by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ, was a scheme of things which had originated in eternity, before the world was. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world." Ephesians i. 3, 4. Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, to himself. 5v. That is, before the foundation of the world.

No language need be plainer than this, that is, that God before he framed the world, had laid the scheme of life and salvation, and before he formed Adam's dust into man, he had predestinated that the human family should be made children to himself, through Jesus Christ, and all this was fixed before the foundation of the world; and this is what Paul had revealed unto him to proclaim to the uncircumcision, as well as Peter to the circumcision. But it was in Jesus Christ that men were to be made children to God, or that God made children to himself out of the apostate race of men. "He hath chosen us in him, in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins wherein he hath abounded towards us, or in him he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence." In all these instances it is in him, not out of him, that men are to receive blessings, and to become sons of God.

This is in perfect accordance with what this same apostle says in the epistle to the Galatians, when speaking of Abraham, and the gospel proclaimed to him, iii. 8. "And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed." The promise to which the apostle alludes is found in the book of Genesis xii. 1, 2, 3. "Now the Lord had said unto Abraham, get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I shall shew thee of: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed. In xxii. 15, 16, 17, 18: the promise reads thus.—

"And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, and said, by myself I have sworn saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and has not withheld thy son, thine only son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast done this thing."

In the former of these quotations it is said, that in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed. And in the latter that in thy seed shall all nations be blessed.

In the 28th chapter we have an account of the same promise being confirmed unto Jacob; for according to the declarations of the Psalmist David this promise was made unto Abraham, and by oath unto Isaac, and confirmed unto Jacob. Psalm, cv. 8, 9, 10. "He hath remembered his covenant forever, the word which he commanded unto a thousand generations, [or the generations of the thousand years.] Which covenant he made with Abraham and his oath unto Isaac and confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant."

The account of this confirmation we have in the xxviii. Gen. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. "And Jacob went out from Beer-sheba, and went toward Haran. And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillow, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set upon the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. And behold the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

A GOOD NAME.—Always be more solicitous to preserve your innocence than concerned to prove it. It will never do to seek a good name as a primary object. Like trying to be graceful, the effort to be popular will make you contemptible. Take care of your spirit and conduct, and your reputation will take care of itself. The utmost that you are called to do, as the guardian of your reputation is to remove injurious assertions. Let not your good be evil spoken of, and follow the highest example in mild and implicit self vindication. No reputation can be permanent which does not spring from principle, and he who would maintain a good character, should be mainly solicitous to maintain a good conscience, void of offence toward God and man.

SEIZURE OF LIQUORS.—We learn that on Tuesday last, a large quantity of liquors, landed on our levee in St. Paul, by a Chicago dealer, and offered for sale here, were seized by virtue of our new liquor law. The man who will thus openly defy the public opinion, and the law of a whole territory, and himself a non-resident, attempt to thrust a cargo of rot-gut into Minnesota, in defiance of law, we want to see put through a course of sprouts, without mercy.—Pioneer

THE MODEL WIFE.

She don't know a word of French, Italian, or German; never reads anything but "Hints to Married Women," and "The Cookery Book"—don't play on the piano, don't keep but one girl, does half the washing and ironing, makes all the cakes and pies, cuts her husband's vests, her own dresses, mends all the stockings, turns all her husband's pants inside out, and hinders before when they get shabby; does all the marketing, buys the wood and coal, never goes out, except Sunday, don't know whether small or big bonnets are worn, keeps awake nights, never sleeps day times, always looks pretty; never looks tired, wears a smiling face, though every bone in her body aches, and presents Mr. Snooks with an heir once a year. Would't speak to any man but her husband for the world—likes to see him talk to all the pretty women. Rocks the cradle and darns the stockings in the forenoon, then—darns the stockings and rocks the cradle in the afternoon! stays at home in the evening and mends her husband's old trousers, while he goes to hear Jenny Lind—sits up in the rocking chair half the night nursing young snooks for fear it will disturb papa—has an inward sensation of goodness in the morning, never heedless, rise at 5 o'clock, takes out a clean shirt for Mr. Snooks, washes the faces, combs the heads of the nine little Snooks, scrubs their eighteen dirty little hands, and nurses the baby while papa is shaving, for fear its crying will make him cut his face with the razor. Helps the nine and her husband all at breakfast time, then eat a cold egg and some burnt toast when they are gone! Thinks her husband an Adonis—a Solomon—a Joseph—is perfectly willing he shall engage himself to be married coming home from her funeral, and hopes that No. 2 will be more worthy of such a treasure than ever she was.

Every man ought to pay his debts—if he can. Every man ought to help his neighbor—if he can. Every man and woman ought to get married—if they can. Every man should do his work to suit his customers—if he can. Every man should please his wife—if he can. Every woman should please her husband—if she can. Every wife should sometimes hold her tongue—if she can. Every man ought to mind his own business, and let other people's alone—if he can. Every man should take a paper, and pay for it, any how.

WANTED.—A fitter and drummer to beat time for the "march of intellect;" a pair of snuffers for the "light of other days;" a stone cutter who can drill deep enough to blast the "rock of ages;" a ring that will fit the "finger of scorn;" a loose pulley to run on the "shaft of envy;" and a new cushion for the "seat of government."

"The fire is going out, Miss Filkins."

"I know it, Mr. Green; and if you would act wisely, you'd follow its example."

It is unnecessary for us to add, that Green never axed to sit up with that gal again.

The Southern Era notices the marriage of Mr. John H. Strange to Miss Elizabeth A. Strange, all of Albemarle county, Va. An exchange thinks that is very strange, but says, no doubt, the next event in course will be a little stranger.

A certain old lady was once arguing strongly for woman's right to preach, when some one attempted to put her down with a text from St. Paul. "Ah," said she, "there is where Paul and I differ."

The editor of a down-east paper informs a lady who sent him a mince pie, with the request "please insert," that such articles are never crowded out "by a press of matter."

A distinguished preacher was once asked what he thought of a sermon which he had just heard delivered, and which had appeared to produce a great sensation among the congregation. His reply may suggest an important hint to some Christian ministers: "Very fine, sir, but a man cannot live upon flowers."

"Do you take a paper?"

"Yes."

"What one?"

"Any one I can lay my hands on."

The above, though good, is not quite so good as the original:—

"Take a wife, Tom," said Richard Brinsley Sheridan to his wild son Tom, the father of Mrs. Norton, "take a wife Tom and reform."

"With all my heart," replied Tom innocently, "whose wife shall I take?"

WHALE STORY.—Whale stories seem to be the order of the day. But we have hardly seen a better one for some time than the following which was published in the Boston Post Boy of October 14, 1771:—

"We learn from Edgartown, that a vessel lately arrived there from a whaling voyage, and in her voyage, one Marshall Jenkins, with others, being in a boat which struck a whale, she turned and bit the boat in two, took Jenkins in her mouth and went down with him; but on her rising, threw him into one part of the boat, whence he was taken on board the vessel by the crew; being much bruised—and in a fortnight after, he perfectly recovered. This account we have from undoubted authority."

DESTITUTION IN LONDON.

Does it not appear at first sight a strange result of the terrible statistics of society, that upon an average one person out of twenty of the inhabitants of the luxurious metropolis is every day destitute of food and employment, and every night without a place for shelter or repose? There are very few of us in London who know all London. Belgravia, the clubs and the parks comprise the area of one man's knowledge; another knows every nook and corner in placid Bloomsbury; a third spends his life among those mysterious wharves on the Surrey side of the great stream; a fourth may consider the misery of Bethnal-Green and Spitsfields as the normal condition of mankind—his experience can suggest no alleviation of such unceasing suffering and struggle. So it is throughout. Even in the midst of all this bustle and turmoil, each one is confined to his own narrow sphere of action, and troubles himself but little as to his neighbor's fortune.

It is not that we need remain ignorant of such subject, if we choose to be at the pains of inquiry. The police, the boards of guardians, the select committees of the Commons, the philanthropists, have all something to tell us, if we choose to open our ears to their reports. An Englishman has always something ready to his hand which must, and many things which ought, to be done. Our countrymen, at least many of them, are rich and liberal. Charity with them must be transacted, like other business, efficiently but quickly, and then its exigencies may be forgotten until next audit day.—Let us not be interpreted as casting a slur upon English charity in its manifold developments—its schools, its hospitals, and its benevolent institutions.

It may be that we are blessed with greater means, than our neighbors; but, if we judge by results, the conclusion is inevitable, that there is no charity like English charity—there is no country in the world where such strenuous efforts have been made to relieve suffering classes. Notwithstanding all these efforts, it is a lamentable fact that in this very town of London, alone, the centre and the core of British civilization, 100,000 persons are every day without food, save it to be precarious produce of a job or a crime.

Since England was England, the general prosperity of the country has never reached so high a point as the present moment. We mark with complacency the gradual rise of this swelling tide of wealth and luxury; we take no notice of the receding wave. Many schemes have been devised by politic or humane persons to remedy this acknowledged evil. The statesman erects his Poor Law Unions, and the philanthropist his houses of refuge; but still the destitution continues.—It is stated in the Registrar-General's annual report for 1849, "that nearly one human being died weekly in this wealthy metropolis from actual starvation." In the corresponding report for 1851, we find that 28 adults died from starvation, and 252 infants from want of breast milk or want of food. In the month of Dec., 1851, five adults died from starvation, and 29 infants from inanition.—London Times.

GEOLOGY.

BY DR. BAIRD.

It was at the beginning of the 15th century that geological facts first awakened attention and inquiry; and within the next two hundred years they had accumulated to a considerable number, especially in Italy, and had given rise to much speculation. During the latter part of the 17th century, a variety of theories had been proposed for the explanation of such facts as were then known—theories which serve at present only to indicate to what an extent the wonder and curiosity of inquiries had been awakened. Buffon had proposed a theory which found advocates till the close of that century.

The two Bertrands had originated others in Switzerland and France; and several theorists in England and Germany had obtained similar distinction by the same means. These theories were of a character the most visionary and capricious. The first regarded our earth as having been struck off from the sun, while in a heated state, by a comet—another, as having been originally a mass of ice—and upon each of them the few established facts were explained, by calling in any agencies which might seem adequate to such effects.

Other observers, however, as Saussure in the Alps, and Pallas in Siberia, confined themselves to the collection of facts, and accumulated materials which have proved of great value to their successors. At the close of that century, the interest of the scientific world was concentrated upon two theories which long divided the suffrages of the learned. Werner, a Professor in Saxony, contended that all rocks were deposited by water, and this was known as the Neptunian theory; while in Scotland, Hutton taught that the unstratified rocks had been deposited in a melted state, and his theory was designated accordingly as Plutonian.

The latter of these views has, with important modifications, been adopted by most subsequent geologists; yet to Werner is due the credit of having extended correct general views of the distinctions of classification of strata. In 1793, an Englishman, William Smith, achieved a great advance in geology by his classification of the strata of some portion of his country; and in 1815 he gave to the world a survey of England, in which the strata were discriminated by their organic remains.

During this period many of the most ingenious minds were devoting themselves to similar researches. In 1807, the formation of the London Geological Society took place—an association which has materially and most honorably connected its name with the subsequent progress of Geology in England.

In the mean time the study of fossils was pursued with great genius and enthusiasm in various countries. Lamarck and DeFrance determined the fossil shells in the neighborhood of Paris, and in 1811, the memorable work of Cuvier and Brogniart, "On the Environs of Paris," constituted an epoch in geological science.—Cuvier's discovery of many species of vertebrated animals in the basin of Paris, some of them of immense size, and of the most extraordinary character, stimulated naturalists throughout Europe to more extended examinations of the tertiary strata, from which they have since reaped an ample harvest of most important facts. The restoration of more than forty species of extinct quadrupeds, principally of the pachydermata, attests the extent and the success of his labors.

Another most remarkable group of animals—the Saurian—was brought to light principally by the geologists of England.—In 1816, Sir Everard Home ascertained that, among the fossil remains of England, were some which it was impossible to arrange with any known class of animals. The animals thus referred to was named the Ichthyosaurus, as intermediate between fishes and lizards.

Another still more nearly approaching the lizard, was discovered by Conybeare, in 1821, and named Plesiosaurus. These were marine genera. At a somewhat later day, Dr. Buckland designated another, and a terrestrial genus, as the Megalosaurus, and, finally, Dr. Mantell brought to light the most gigantic of them all—the Iguanodon—a herbivorous reptile of nearly one hundred feet in length. There are now at least eighty species of these fossil reptiles known, many of them of immense size, and some of extraordinary character. They have been divided by Dr. Buckland into four groups—the Marine, Terrestrial, Amphibious, and Flying Reptiles.

The curiosity and wonder excited by such a series of discoveries, greatly stimulated the ardor of inquirers, and a great number of observers now pursued investigations, which had proved so fruitful of novel and brilliant results. Many of the most acute and philosophical minds of the age have been, and still are, engaged in efforts to solve the problems which geology offers to our examination.

The investigations of Agassiz, upon the fossil fish, published in two separate works in Neuchâtel in 1834, and in England, in 1835, have resulted in a new and admirable classification of physical science. More recently the observations of the same gentleman upon the glaciers of Switzerland and in the erratic blocks, have opened a new field of investigation in the ice period.

The fossil plants were first fully investigated by Brogniart.—The number of species which he had ascertained, 1836, amounted to 527, which have since increased to about two thousand. As a large proportion of plants would disappear during the process of fossilization, fungi, mosses, &c., the aggregate, it is supposed, may have approached the existing number. One-half of the whole are contained in the carboniferous series, before the great herbivorous quadrupeds existed.

The earliest well characterized plants hitherto ascertained are coniferous trees at the base of the old red sandstone. Their discovery is due to the protracted investigations of Hugh Miller, in a field, whose fruitfulness he had the merit of discovering.

The species of fossil fish numbers about two thousand. They have grown to this number under the hand of Prof. Agassiz.—The number which Cuvier had distinguished amounted to only ninety-two.

The depth of British strata investigated and found to be fossiliferous, was estimated, in 1840, at six and a half miles. Prof. Rogers, of Pennsylvania, estimated the American strata below the coal as of much greater thickness than the European.

Many important questions, which have arisen during the course of these investigations, have been successfully solved.—Among these no single one was attended with greater difficulty than that of determining the equivalence of the strata of different regions, a work which required the most careful examination of the fossil remains of distant formations. The identity of the compact marbles of Italy and Greece, with the loose limestones which from the Oolitic series of England, was pointed out by Dr. Buckland, in 1820, and his view has since been fully confirmed.—The determination of hundreds of shells by most skilful conchologists was requisite to decide the position of some of the calcareous beds of Germany, as compared with the formation of Great Britain.

More recently, however, this effort has been so far extended that the general system of the rocks is now universally agreed upon, and is understood over the whole of Europe, and of eastern North America. In more distant countries, however, the equivalence of strata, with those already known, is more doubtful, though investigation is rapidly enlarging our knowledge in every direction. Humboldt has labored to extend the doctrine of geological equivalence, as shown in the rocks of Europe, to those of the Andes.

The equivalence of the strata of New York with those of Europe and northern Asia, was determined, in 1846, by M. de Verneuil, who determined the fact that no country offers so complete and uninterrupted a development of the Devonian system as this State.

Geological science has been greatly indebted for its progress to the accurate surveys which various governments have ordered. The surveys of the European coast, undertaken for military and commercial purposes, have furnished opportunity of geological observation also. Extended geological investigation have been accomplished of all the more important European countries.

American geology has been greatly indebted to the same aid. The several States have almost universally instituted surveys for economical as well as scientific purposes. Among the most distinguished of these, are those of Massachusetts, which were made, in 1833, by Prof. Hitchcock, and New York, which were undertaken, in 1836, by several gentlemen of scientific distinction, and contemplated a general survey of the Natural History of the State.

The United States Government has had geological surveys made of some extended regions of the interior of the country; and the Expedition, under Captain Wilkes, has made a most valuable contribution to science in this branch, in the work of Professor Dana.

There are in every department of geology questions of great interest awaiting their solution.—M. de Beaumont has suggested a theory of the contemporaneous elevation of parallel mountain-chains, which has attracted much attention. More recently, a different view has been taken, with attributes them to the contraction of the earth's crust.

Among the more interesting points which are regarded as settled, may be mentioned the very recent appearance of man upon the globe, and the termination of creation with the formation of man, as no single species can be shown to have originated since this modern period.

The highest authorities agree in denying the possibility of the transmutation of lower into higher forms of organic life, and generally in affirming the diffusion of each species from a single point through its whole range.

Two theories at present divide the geological world, in respect to the method and the agencies by which the earth's changes have been produced. One view attributes the phenomena to the violent action of causes not now equally influential; the other, represented by Lyell, to the long continued action of causes such as those which are now raising the Scandinavian peninsula. Facts at present are not sufficiently numerous to authorize any confident conclusion.

WEALTH OF GERMAN EMIGRANTS.

The emigration from Germany to this country, is increasing largely. Captains, recently at New York, state that all their passengers have brought money, in coin and bills of exchange, ranging from $250 to $400 each. The arrival of German emigrants during the last three weeks, it is said, has added $2,500,000 to the circulation. These emigrants do not remain in New York, but seem to be well informed as to the point they ought to strike for; and accordingly they proceed without any unnecessary delay, to their destination. Of late years a German rarely, if ever, starts from his own country, with the intention of settling in America, without first informing himself as to the best locations; and he is very well enabled to do this by the great pains taken by his more intelligent countrymen, who have preceded him, in furnishing information through the medium of books, often prepared for the press in this country and sent in MS. to their fatherland for publication. This is a noble feature in the German character. These sources of information are scattered broad cast, and at very low prices over the land to assist the ignorant and unwary, and to point out the shoals and quicksands that are not generally laid down in the printed maps of this country. Surely this is a labor of love, for which the emigrants cannot be too thankful. We cannot resist the pleasure of remarking that a very large majority of our German emigrants are industrious, thrifty, and orderly people. It would be an almost endless task to sum up the good they have done to this land.—The wealth they bring is but a drop compared with the wealth they produce. Their coming secures more gold than the mines of California; for while the latter may become exhausted, the results of continued labor never can be.—Cincinnati Commercial.

FOR THE LADIES.

Walking is getting quite out of fashion, and young women nowadays wriggle along as if they were moved ahead by one of Erickson's patent propellers.—Their walk is as crooked as that of a ship with all her sails and no rudder. They are as graceful in their motion as a militia colonel's horse, or a broken-down "racker." I notice they are awfully deformed, too, as a general rule, having great lumps on their backs, like dromedaries—all which are doubtless very pleasant to the traders in cotton batting and hay. This "new edition" of the shape may be a great improvement on the original, but if so the original must be "shocking bad;" for if there is an ugly looking object about it is one of these wadded and padded young women. If one of them should be furnished by nature with these humps (or heaps) she would be exhibited as a curiosity, at a sip a peep, like a double headed pig. Some months since somebody sent me through the P. O. a semicircular bag of cotton, and I was told it was a very prominent article of female apparel, used to perfect the human shape! It is a curiosity, and a few years hence I mean to send it as such to Barnum's Museum. It looks like anything except an article of dress. There is nothing to compare it to, in the heavens above, or on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. They call it—so I am told—a bishop—and if so, I certainly go in for,

"A Church without a Bishop"

as heartily as for

"A State without a King."

MRS. SWISSELM.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, JULY 23, 1852.

ROADS.

The Senate of the United States have passed a bill for the construction of a Railroad from Zilwaukie, on Saginaw river, via Grand Traverse Bay, to Mackinac, and granted towards the expense of construction alternate sections six miles in width along the line of the road.

Also for a Plankroad from Grand River to Mackinac; thence to Saut Ste. Marie; thence through the mineral region to the west line of the State, for which one mile in width is granted.

The construction of these two works is of great importance to the upper part of the State, and to the prosperity of nearly all its general interests. The mineral region, sufficient of itself for a respectable State, is secluded nearly one half the year from all the world for want of any more feasible means of travel than a dog train. And despite this drawback, it is the most growing section of the State.

A plankroad from Grand river, touching the eastern head of Grand Traverse, and crossing the straits at Mackinac to the Saut, would open all the country below lake Superior, and give it the advantage of constant intercourse. All the settlements off the route would be able by a very little local effort to open connections with the main route.

The road from Saut west to the various mines would then be constructed without delay, and open the whole country to the world with inducements to settle it.

Such a road would be passable at all times, except that there would sometimes be a detention of a few days at the straits, where there is occasionally too much ice for a boat, and yet not enough to travel on. If the bill becomes a law the road will probably be built at an early day, and give a new impetus to business in all the upper country.

The Railroad is another, and more difficult matter. The section from Zilwaukie to Grand Traverse would, doubtless, provided the bill passes, be commenced and progress slowly to completion. When the Pontiac road was extended to it, it would do a respectable business. But unless extended north further than Mackinac, there would be very little inducement to carry it to that point.

The opening of these lines of travel will tend to build up many towns in a country now desolate. Mackinac alone of all places on the route will be rather injured than benefited. The termination of a railroad, nominally at Mackinac, would in fact be at some feasible point on the south shore, probably ten miles from Mackinac. From that point passengers and freight would go to their final destination, irrespective of the little rocky islet, to which very little would go.

The plankroad also would find its real termination at a similar point on the south shore, from which a steam ferry boat would run to some feasible point on the north shore, only touching the Island of Mackinac when there were passengers for that particular place. The effect would in fact be the building up of two rivals to Mackinac, one on each shore, to take all the trade from that place. Hence no Mackinac man will interest himself in the progress of either of these works, unless with the view of changing locations, and profiting by the building up of new places of business.

NEW LAND DISTRICT.

The United States Senate have passed a bill to establish a new Land District in Michigan, to be called the Manitou District, including all the lands north of township twenty, up to the straits of Mackinac, and including the Islands in both lakes to that latitude. It is understood that the office will be established at Grand Traverse Bay. This will be a great convenience to a vast region of the State now rapidly opening to settlement. It strikes us, however, that Inverness is the true location for the land office. Inverness is on the direct and most frequented line of navigation, is easily accessible from all parts of the district, and is one of the most thriving places in the district. It must very soon be, before all others, the town of the straits.

On the last trip up of the steamer Michigan some person on board bought a few fish of some one on the wharf. On her return Mr. Patrick Sullivan went aboard and claimed five half barrels, saying they were part of seven barrels that J. T. Pierce had stolen from him last Saturday evening week.

He also claimed six half barrels more which Mr. Pierce had sold to Mr. Thayer, as part of the same lot, and had Mr. Pierce arrested for the theft. The cause was tried by a jury, but most unfortunately for poor Pat, it turned out that Pierce had had the fish some ten days, and sold and delivered them to Thayer the day before Sullivan's were stolen, and the fish were most of them herring, though all Pat's were white fish and trout.

We wonder if the purchaser has to indulge Pat's fancy about mistaken titles at his own expense? Men who take up a reproach because they love lies, ought to be willing to pay the shot. Pat swore positively to the identity of the fish, and wondered he could not have his own.

INDIAN GRAVES.

We were struck with the beauty of the neat paling enclosing a small lot on the bank immediately in front of the dock, as we passed down a few days since.—It is the ancient burial place of the Indians, and the Board of Health of the Township at their last meeting ordered it enclosed and suitably cared for. This we believe is the first instance where the graves of these ancient "lords of the soil" have been protected from the encroaching plow of the Anglo American. How much of humiliation has not their long sleep relieved them of. God grant them a glorious morning.

DIED, at Galilee, the 19th inst., of dissipation and wickedness, Peter B. Bunker, known here for three years past as one of the most bitter persecutors of the Mormons. Mr. Bunker had respectable connections in Shoharie Co., N. Y., and it is not improbable that while there maintained a better character; but, like many others, came here to spend his summers and other men's money upon the fishing grounds, in the most unrestrained debauchery. He has met the inevitable fate of such a course of life.

A judgment of $50 has recently been recovered by the State against James Cable, before Dennis Childester, Esq., for a violation of the law concerning taverns and retailers of spirituous liquors. This is the fourth judgment recovered in this place for a like cause. Three other suits are pending, and there is a most determined resolution to do up the work of enforcing the statute effectually.

Mr. Cable attempted to take an appeal on the alledged ground of the unconstitutionality of the law, but only offered straw bail.

LAKE SUPERIOR JOURNAL.

Among our exchanges none is more welcome than this ably conducted and beautifully executed sheet, from Saut Ste. Marie, away up in the woods as far above us as we are beyond "the settlements." Free from the miserable twaddle, and still more disgusting falsehood of partizan politics, it is filled with the food of mind and the speaking of intelligence.

SAUT CANAL.

We learn by the Lake Superior Journal that a party of Canadian engineers are on the ground making surveys for a canal suitable for the passage of the first class steamers around the Saut. The work seems to be undertaken in earnest by our Canadian neighbors, while the United States, who have twice, aye ten times the interest in it, are all asleep, even the southern portion of Michigan only occasionally rouses to fear that if the canal should be built it would give additional importance to the upper part of the State. None seem to look on it as national. We are not quite sure after all that the Canadians are behind in enterprise.

Last week a fishing boat, with two men in it, near Hog Island, was struck by a squall and upset. It was impossible to right up the boat, and enough of the loading remained attached to it to keep it quite under water. Notwithstanding this the men succeeded in clinging to it, and working it ashore against a most tempestuous wind. The distance to make was over a half mile, and when the boat reached shore the men were scarcely able to stand.

The Lake Superior Journal contains several notices relating to the construction of a plankroad around the falls, which it is contemplated to have completed by the first day of September. This is well, and shows a good degree of enterprise. But it is a company work, and will exact tolls of all passers by—a very convenient thing to stockholders, but burdensome to the public. Here, poor as we are, such works are paid for in the beginning, and free to the public when completed. The township has undertaken to build a plankroad twelve miles in length, to be paid for by direct taxation.

NEW ARTICLE OF TRADE.

Hemlock tanbark, of an excellent quality, is coming forward in quantities to be shipped to Racine. It can be got out here probably to better advantage than most places, where it is an article of export; for here the timber has to be cut in process of clearing land; whereas, at Traverse and other places which have hitherto sent forward great quantities, the timber was cut for the bark alone.

ANOTHER.

We to-day saw a barrel of black salts made by E. Page, the first ever produced in this region. There is no reason why it should not be made in great quantities. Many farms are being made on hard timbered land, where tons can be made at a very moderate outlay of labor.

The Chinamen are indeed remarkable for their love of their country in a domestic way. They gather together in clans in districts and neighborhoods, and in some villages there are thousands and thousands of the same surname, flocking around the original family home. They honor their parents and age generally with a respect like religion, and have the deepest anxiety to provide for their descendants. To honor his parents is the greatest duty of the son. A Chinese proverb runs somewhat in this way: "In the morning, when you rise, inquire after your parents' health, at midday be not far from them, and in the evening comfort them when they go to rest: this is to be a pious son."

violence in that city. The Express says that "the rowdies who infest the city are rapidly gaining power over the respectable portion of the inhabitants; and while rowdism is fearfully on the increase, the police seem to make fewer arrests. At no time has the city been in such need of reform. The growing evil is by many attributed to rum drinking. This, no doubt, has a great effect, but were the police what they should be we would be in the enjoyment of a quiet and peaceable city. The Police Department now consists of about 1,000 men, and if they possessed the requisite qualities of policemen, the peace of respectable citizens would seldom be disturbed.

"It is a sad fact that more than one-half of the present force are men of dissipated habits, who have been rowdies, and almost everything else, dangerous and disgusting. Many of them are of the lowest class, and very ignorant, but having in their career distinguished themselves in rioting during elections, and by their violent demonstrations, and political designs, succeeded in some instances, in sending swindling aldermen to the City Hall, the aldermen in return, have presented them to the executive officer for appointment—and hence the present inefficient and dishonest force. There are not more than fifty men in the department who are worthy of the confidence reposed in them."

Exactly so; but these rowdies are "the people," and according to all democratic rules have as much right to elect each other as honest men have. Such is democracy.

THE UNITED STATES MINT.

Since the enormous influx of gold from California, the United States Mint has become an object of more than common attention and interest, and the place is usually filled with visitors, watching the various processes which the metal goes through before it comes out a finished coin. The machinery and apparatus by which these are accomplished are of the most complete and perfect character. The rooms in which the smelting, refining and alloying are done, are spacious apartments, in which a large number of workmen are employed. Heaps of the rich ores are to be seen laying around, as they were extracted from the mines, or gathered in dust from the sands of the mountains of California. Bars of the pure metal, representing many thousands of dollars in value, are passing through hands which, like those of Midas, seem to turn what they touch into gold.

The heat of this place is insufferable, fires glow with the intensity of those in a foundry, the men are as smutched and dust begrimed as those in a smithery; there is a suffocating sensation of hot air, steam and perspiration penetrating the atmosphere which is anything but pleasant to experience when the thermometer is palpitating under a summer temperature. Crucibles are handled with iron tongs and cotton mittens, the metal is shaped into bars and then reduced to the requisite fineness.

All this takes place in one apartment. In another there is a most beautiful steam engine, which drives the rolling and stamping machinery. This engine is of the most elegant workmanship, polished like a piece of cutlery, and works without the least perceptible jar. From this room the visitor walks into that where the rolling machines are at work, turning out the metal to the proper degree of thickness which each particular denomination of coin requires. In another apartment the coins are cut with a punch the desired size and then stamped.

The coins are placed by a person seated at the machine, in a perpendicular tube, down which they descend, one at a time, being seized as they drop by a part of the machinery, which pushes the coin under the stamp, whence it falls under the machine into a glass covered box. This part of the process used in former years to be performed by a press, which still remains in the building, worked by a lever and screw, requiring eight men to laboriously labor at it; now the process requires scarcely any manual labor but handling the pieces of coin. The rapidity with which the pieces are coined is surprising. Cents, dollars, eagles, double eagles are turned out with equal facility, the process being the same in all.

Some idea of the extensiveness of these operations, and of the metalliferous fecundity of the gold possessions of the United States may be had, when it is stated that last month nearly three millions of pieces, gold, silver and copper were coined, and that nearly four millions in value are coined every month. In addition to the other attractions of the Mint, there is a most extensive cabinet of coins, ancient and modern, (Roman, Greek, Chinese, European) which is one of the greatest of curiosities, and probably to be met with nowhere else in this country. The officers of the Mint are polite and attentive to visitors, and endeavor to make their visit one of instruction as well as amusement. It is under the very effective management of Mr. Dale, the director. —Philadelphia Ledger.

NIGHT VIEW OF THE IRON HORSE.

Would you like the luxury of a new sensation? Take your stand six feet from a rail road track, in the night and await the passing of an express train. There is no wind stirring. Clouds close in the light of the stars. The hum of life has ceased. Blackness and silence brood together upon the face of the earth. Afar off the listening ear catches a drawing roar. Half heard and half felt, it grows into more distinctness partly revealed by the trembling of the solid earth, and partly felt as a shapeless horror filling the air. Every second swells its awful volume and deepens in terror. The earth now quakes under its tread; a blazing glare, as from the eyes of hell, flashes livid horror, into the surrounding air, and you see crawling along in snaky tracks, with fiery head crouched to the ground, and its long train swinging from side to side with a wavy motion, a gigantic and terror-breathing monster, instinct with life and power crushing the earth with its tread, and creating a whirlwind with its blasting breath as it sweeps along. Is there anything in the world which impresses the mind with a profounder scene of resistless power than that enormous mass, with its blazing eyes and smoky breath rushing with the speed of a cannon ball, and startling the air and earth with the overwhelming horror of its flight? What would the savage think, seeing it for the first time? Imagine such a flight across the country fifty years ago, unheralded by any rumor of its coming, revealing its existence by its presence and rushing suddenly into oblivion, as it now rushes into the darkness, while you gaze upon the spot where it disappeared, and hear only a faint echo of its distant tread. —Times.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY IN VIRGINIA.

A letter in the Richmond Times states that a few days ago, while several men were engaged in blasting out limestone near Buchanan, Botetourt county, they discovered a cave, with an entrance some six or eight feet in height, and upwards of one hundred long, with two apartments. In the first they found some earthen ware and a large stone cross; on the cross there was some carving, but was so much defaced by the hand of time that it was scarcely discernable. A number of citizens, with a lantern, subsequently entered the second apartment, where they found a skeleton seated on a huge iron chest, with his back resting against the wall. On opening this chest they found it to contain gold coin, perfectly smooth on one side and a cross with some characters on it on the other. The gold in the chest by weight is worth seven hundred and eighty-three dollars.

GENIUS MISTAKEN FOR INSANITY.

We hope that the long vexed question of who first suggested the application of steam as a motive power, is set at rest by the following letter, which we copy from Sharpe's Magazine. It is well worth reading. The statement contained in it, made at the time by an eye witness, furnishes another example of the fatal error committed by many men, in being born centuries before their time. It would be an exceedingly interesting letter if written by a person no way famous, but the interest is greatly enhanced when we think that the words are regarding once fell warm from the pen of Marion Delorme, and were perused by the unfortunate Cinque Mars. It is further interesting as furnishing evidence of the arbitrary proceedings of Cardinal Richelieu, and as having suggested to Dumas one of the best scenes in one of his wonderful romances: —

PARIS, Feb. 1641.

MY DEAR EFFIANT—While you were forgetting me at Narbonne, and giving yourself up to the pleasures of the court, and the delight of thwarting M. le Cardinal de Richelieu, I, according to your express desire, am doing the honors of Paris to your English lord, the Marquis of Worcester; and I carry him about, or rather, he carries me, from curiosity to curiosity, choosing always the most grave and serious, speaking very little, listening with great attention, and fixing on those whom he interrogates, two large blue eyes, which seem to pierce to the very center of their thoughts. He is remarkable for never being satisfied with any explanations which are given him; and never sees things in the light in which they are shown to him. You may judge of this by a visit we made together to Bicetre, where he imagined he had discovered a genius in a madman. It is a madman had not been actually raving, I verily believe your Marquis would actually have entreated his liberty, and have carried him off to London, in order to hear his extravagances from morning to night at his ease.

We were crossing the court of the madhouse, and I, more dead than alive with fright, kept close to my companion's side, when a frightful face appeared behind some immense bars, and a hoarse voice exclaimed, "I'm not mad! I'm not mad! I have made a discovery which would enrich the country that adopted it." "What has he discovered?" I asked the guide. "Oh," he answered, shrugging his shoulders, "something trifling enough, you would never guess it: IT IS THE USE OF THE STREAM OF BOILING WATER." I began to laugh, "This man," continued the speaker, "is named SALMON DE CAUS; he came from Normandy four years ago, to present to the king a statement of the wonderful effects that might be produced from this invention. To listen to him you would imagine, that with steam you could navigate ships, move carriages, in fact, there is no end to the miracles which he insists upon it, could be performed. The Cardinal sent the madman away without listening to him. Salmon de Caus, far from being discouraged, followed the Cardinal, wherever he went, with the most determined perseverance, who, tired of finding him forever in his path, and annoyed to death with his folly, ordered him to be shut up in the Bicetre, where he has now been for three years and a half, as you hear, he calls out to every visitor, that he is not mad, but that he has made a valuable discovery. He has even written a book upon the subject which I have here."

Lord Worcester, who had listened to this account with much interest, after reflecting a time, asked for the book, of which, after reading several pages, he said, "this man is not mad. In my country, instead of shutting him up, he would have been rewarded. Take me to him, for I should like to ask him some questions."

He was, accordingly, conducted to his cell, but, after a time, he came back, sad and thoughtful. "He is mad now," he said, "misfortune and captivity have alienated his reason, but it is you who have to answer for his madness. When you cast him in that cell, you confined the GREATEST GENIUS OF THE AGE!" After this we went away, and since that time he has done nothing but talk of Salmon de Caus. Adieu my dear and faithful Henry. Make haste and come back, and pray do not be so happy where you are, as not to keep a little love for me.

MARION DELORME.

A RATTLESNAKE STORY.

Last fall, a woman residing in the vicinity of Worcester, was picking blackberries in a field near her house, having with her an only child, a bright-eyed little fellow of less than a year old. The babe sat upon the ground in an open space, amusing himself with grasping at a clump of yellow weed that grew within reach, and eating berries brought him from time to time by his mother.

The latter, at length, intent upon gathering the fine fruit, passed around a rock which hid her child from view. She was about to return to him, when hearing him laughing and crowing in great glee, and thinking he must be safe as long as he was so happy, she remained a little longer where she was.

Suddenly the little voice ceased, and after another minute's delay, the young mother stepped upon the rock and looked over, expecting to see her babe asleep; and instead of which, he was sitting perfectly motionless, his lips parted, and his wide open eyes fixed with singular expression upon some object which at first she was unable to discern.

Yet who can judge of her horror when on closer scrutiny she perceived, some four feet from the infant, a rattlesnake, with his glittering eyes fastened on his, and nearing him by an almost imperceptible motion.

The sight of her darling's peril so nearly paralyzed her, that for an instant she half believed the dreadful fascination had extended to herself; but the certainty, that, unless she was the instrument of salvation to her child, he was inevitably lost, in some degree restored her powers. She glanced wildly around for something that might be used as a weapon, but nothing appeared, and already the venomous reptile had passed over half the space which divided him from his victim. Another moment, and all would be lost! What could be done?

In her hand she held a broad tin pan, and springing from the rock, quick as thought she covered the snake with it, and stood upon it to prevent his escape.

The charm was broken; the child moved, away to one side, and began to sob. At the same time the mother recovered her voice, and screamed for aid, retaining her position till it arrived, when the cause of her terrible fright was dispatched. —Ex.

From the Times and Seasons.
GOSPEL.
(Concluded.)

Here it is said to Jacob that in him and his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, and putting both the former quotations together and it would read the same way to Abraham; for one says in thee, and the other says in thy seed, so that the promise to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was, that in them, and in their seed, should all the families; or nations of the earth be blessed, and this is what is called the gospel, which Paul says was preached before to Abraham: Gal. iii. 8. It is necessary that the reader should notice particularly that it is in Abraham, and in his seed that all the families of the earth should be blessed, and not out of them; for here lays the mistake with many; they do not notice that little preposition in, and they fancy to themselves that they will be blessed, whether they are in Abraham and his seed, or out of them; not thinking that there is a difference between in and out.

Concerning this promise made to Abraham the New Testament writers have said many things.—In Gal. iii. 16, Paul settles the question, who the seed was, concerning whom it was said, that in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed.—“Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ.” According to this explanation, the promise to Abraham and his seed stands thus. That in thee, and in Christ thy seed, shall all the families of earth be blessed.—We can see by this that it was not enough that a person should be a regular descendant from Abraham to entitle them to the blessings of heaven, but they must be in his seed also, which is Christ, so that to obtain eternal life, a person must be both in Abraham and in Christ.

What is here said about Abraham and his seed, so directly corresponds with what the apostle has said in the epistle to the Ephesians, as before quoted, concerning the scheme of things which he proclaimed to the world, or the plan of life and salvation, which is called the gospel, that even a careless reader cannot avoid seeing how completely they harmonize. Mark reader that the apostles said that God had chosen us in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world.—Eph. i. 4. Again in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins wherein (or in whom) he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence. So then we are chosen to be sons of God in Christ and it is in him we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins, and it is in him that God abounds unto us in all wisdom and prudence. And the promise to Abraham was, that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed, or that in Christ all the nations of the earth should be blessed, and that, says the apostle, is what God purposed in himself before the foundation of the world, and agreeably to that plan, men should be blessed: in Christ Jesus they should get the remission of sins; in Christ Jesus they should get redemption: and in Christ Jesus God would abound towards them in all wisdom and prudence; and says the promise to Abraham, (or the gospel as before preached to Abraham) in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed; whether they are descendants of Shem, Ham, or Japheth, in Christ they should be blessed; for God will abound to all who are in Christ Jesus, in wisdom and prudence: they will have redemption, and the forgiveness of sins.

It is in view of this promise made to Abraham and his seed, that the apostle says, Rom. ix. 6, 7: “For they are not all Israel which are of Israel; neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they children: but in Isaac shall thy seed be called.”

And in Rom. iv. 11, 12, 13, the apostle says: “And he (Abraham) received the sign of circumcision a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had, yet being uncircumcised; that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed to them also; and the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had, being yet uncircumcised.” For the promise that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith.

The careful reader of the New Testament will find that the allusions to the promise made to Abraham and his seed are very numerous, but would not be to our purpose to quote at present.

It is necessary to remark here, that the apostle has pronounced a curse on any person, or even on an angel from heaven, if they preach any other gospel, than the one which he had proclaimed. Gal. i. 8, 9. And he says as quoted above, that the gospel which he proclaimed, had been before preached to Abraham, telling him that in his seed, that is, in Christ Jesus, all the families of the earth should be blessed; and from what he said to the Romans it is evident that the apostle excludes the fleshly seed of Abraham from being the children of Abraham according to this promise, only such as had faith like faithful Abraham, and that all others who had this faith, were equally entitled to the blessings of Abraham whether they were his fleshly seed or not; it mattered not from whom they descended; for if through faith they were enabled to get into Christ Jesus, they would be considered Abraham's children, and heirs according to the promise.

In the third chapter to the Galatians (26, 27 and 28 verses) the mystery is solved, how it is that we are put into Christ, and become Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise: “For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.”

This carries the promise made to Abraham to its legitimate issue, and shows what it was that was preached to Abraham; that it was not only in his seed that all the families of the earth were to be blessed, but that they were to be put in his seed, that is Christ, by baptism; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. We could hardly admit the thought that the Lord had told Abraham that in him and in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, and yet not tell him how it was that they were to become his children, or, in other words, how they were to be put into Christ, Abraham's seed.

No doubt, therefore, can exist but that Abraham knew all about it; for if he did not, could it be said that he had the gospel preached unto him? It could not, unless he had that thing preached unto him which Paul afterwards preached, and concerning which he said that any man, or an angel from heaven should be accursed if he preached any other. Neither can we with safety admit it, having the testimony which we have on this subject before us, that God had at any period of the world any other way of making sons and daughters but the one; for Paul says that the gospel was before the world was, and the thing which he received by revelation was the same which had existed from eternity.

But to have the whole subject fairly before us, we will attend to the proclamation of him in whom God had wrought effectually to the apostleship of the circumcision—we mean Peter. We have his proclamation to the circumcision in Acts ii. 37, 38, 39; it reads thus: “Now when the Jews heard this, they were pricked in their hearts, and said unto Peter and the rest of the apostles, men and brethren, what shall we do? Then Peter said unto them, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.”

The reader may see very easily, that all these men understood the subject alike; for the specimens which we have of their preaching are alike. Paul says, as quoted above, that in Christ we have the forgiveness of sins, and redemption through his blood, and that in him, we are made partakers of the blessings of Abraham; and he also says, that it is by baptism that we are put into Christ.

Peter says, repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. Why be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins? Because that by baptism

Paul says that you put on Christ, “as many of you as are baptized into Christ have put on Christ;” and being in Christ you have remission of sins, and redemption through his blood; and in him God will abound to you in all wisdom and prudence. Therefore, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; or, in other words, God will abound towards you in all wisdom and prudence, through the gift of the Holy Ghost.

These two apostles then surely had the same views on the subject of the gospel; and let it not be forgotten that Paul says that this gospel was preached to Abraham, and not only to Abraham, but that it originated in eternity, before the world was, and that it was not some new thing which has sprang into existence with him and his contemporaries, and was not known till then.

WHAT WORK MAY A GENTLEMAN DO?

In an address before an agricultural society, Dr. Tuthill thus touches on this delicate subject:

The day has already come in our cities, that if a man stout as Milo of old, has a load of wood brought to his door, and he really aches for the pleasure of handling it, yet he must hire a man to pitch it into the cellar, while he stands idly by, nor so much as touches a stick of it, on pain of losing caste. If a stout and vigorous citizen, whose muscles swell with an excess of strength, has a load of wood lying on the sidewalk, he may as well hang himself at once as be foolish enough to save a dollar and saw it up himself. Yet if the man has pitched it in, and the grate is down so that he shall not be seen, we are not sure but he may saw until doom's day, and no one esteem him less a man and a gentleman.

If he curry and tackle his own horse, or lead him to the stable when he has done with him, he is unpardonably vulgar. He would no sooner be caught carrying a trunk the length of a block to an omnibus, than stealing a body from a grave yard; yet he will boast among his friends of the enormous weight he carries in the gymnasium, having paid a fee of thirty dollars a year for the privilege. And his friends applaud his gymnastic expenditure as wise and exceedingly judicious; for sure, say they, “how can a man live without exercise?” In short, labor which promotes the ends of economy, is an abominable thing; that which advertises their imbecility is a source of pride. These soft handed gentry may be our sons and brothers; but we fancy they must at times feel ashamed of our common father, old Adam, who fanned it in Paradise.

LAKE SUPERIOR.—There are few persons in this country, and still fewer in the Old World, who have anything like an adequate conception of the immense extent of this “big drink,” as they say out west. To the Lakes of Europe, it bears the same relation in size, which the Mississippi and Missouri bear to European rivers—the Lakes of England, Scotland and Switzerland are mere puddles in comparison with this great levitation. The length of Lake Superior, says an exchange, is about five hundred miles. Its greatest breadth one hundred and ninety. Its circumference is about 1,700 miles, or about half the distance from New York to Liverpool. Lake Superior is the most western of the great lakes which discharge their waters in the St. Lawrence. Its depth is nine hundred feet, while its height above the Atlantic is put down at nearly seven hundred feet. To show still farther the magnitude of this glorious lake, we would state that it contains a single island almost as large as Scotland—while it has several as large as the States of Rhode Island and Delaware. Lake Superior is the recipient of some thirty rivers. —Buffalo Notes.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY.—We learn from a gentleman who came down on the Nominee a few days since, as Mr. L. W. Lowe, of Columbus Ia. was leveling down a small mound in his garden, he exhumed the skeleton of what was supposed to be an Indian, buried in a canoe. There were found with him a small looking glass, a bead bag and thirty one silver dollars, wrapped up in a silk handkerchief. The latest date of the coin was 1836. There was a hole in the skull through the forehead, resembling that made by a bullet.—Advertiser.

SINGULAR GEOLOGICAL FACT.—At Noriena, in Italy, within a circle of four miles around the city, whenever the earth is dug, and the workmen arrive at the distance of sixty-three feet they come to a bed of chalk, which they bore with an auger, five feet deep. They then withdraw from the pit before the auger is removed and upon its retraction the water bursts up with great violence and quickly fills the well thus made, the supply of water being affected neither by rains nor droughts. At the depth of fourteen feet are found the ruins of an ancient city, houses, paved streets, and mosaic work. Below this again is a layer of earth, and at twenty-six feet walnut trees are found entire, and with leaves and walnuts still upon them. At twenty-eight feet soft chalk is found and below this vegetables and trees.—Mining Register.

THE OYSTER TRADE OF NEW HAVEN, CT.—We are informed on reliable authority that the quantity of oysters now planted in the waters of New Haven harbor is 500,000 bushels.—Estimating 200 oysters to the bushel, would give one hundred millions of oysters. These oysters are for the early fall trade, and are aside from the enormous quantities imported and opened there during the winter months.

A VALUABLE BANK BILL.—What would be the sensation of an individual accustomed to handling one dollar relief notes, to receive a bank bill of one million sterling? The Bank of England, it appears, issued four notes of that denomination, and after these four were engraved, the plates were destroyed. Of these impressions, the Rothschilds have one, the late Mr. Coutts had another, the Bank of England a third, and Mr. Samuel Rogers, the poet and banker, now decorates his parlor with the fourth, suspended in a gold frame.

MEANING OF ONTONAGON.—The Indians have a tradition about the name of Ontonagon, as about almost everything else, and say it is truly “Nin-di-na-gan.” That an old woman, long ago, was cooking on the shore at the mouth, and her dish slipped into the current, and was carried out into the lake. She exclaimed, “Oh! there goes my dish,” the Indian of which is said to be Nin-di-na-gan.—Lake Sup. Jour.

“MAY I MARRY MY AUNT?”—A young man applied to Mr. Corrie, at Clerkenwell Police Court, lately, and coolly said:—Please your worship, I wish to know whether it is lawful for a man to marry his aunt? (A laugh.)

Mr. Corrie (smiling).—It is a most extraordinary question. Have you married your aunt?

Applicant.—Yes! my mother's sister.
Mr. Corrie.—How old are you?
Applicant.—Nineteen.
Mr. Corrie.—And what age is your wife?
Applicant.—Twenty.
Mr. Corrie said that such a marriage was certainly illegal according to Scriptures, and he referred to Leviticus and the Common Prayer Book.

The aunt-wife, a good looking young woman here said: He is a fool; I am willing to do every thing to make him comfortable.

Applicant.—I can't live with her, she has got such a bad temper.

Aunt.—If the marriage is illegal, and he leaves me, is he not bound to support me?

Mr. Corrie.—Oh, no.

Aunt.—Then can he marry again?

Mr. Corrie.—Yes.

Aunt.—And can I do so?

Mr. Corrie.—Yes.

Aunt.—Oh! then that's all right. (Laughter.)

Applicant.—I'll take good care I'll not get married again; I have had enough of it for the last six months. (Loud Laughter.)

The applicant then left the court followed by his aunt-wife, who continued abusing her nephew until they got out of sight.—London Leader.

The slang phrase, “I won't do anything else,” is now politely rendered, “Under the most incomprehensible conditions of sublimity disarrangement, I will not be compelled to have recourse to any dissimilar course of procedure.”

Abundance is a trouble, want a misery, honor a burden, advancement dangerous, but competency a happiness.

THE DRUNKARD'S BIBLE.

"Mr. President," said a short, stout man, with a good humored countenance, and a florid complexion, rising, as the last speaker took his seat, "I have been a grog seller."

At this announcement there was a movement through the whole room, and an expression of increased interest.

"Yes, Mr. President," he went on, "I have been a grog seller, and many a glass I have sold to you, and to the Secretary there, and to a dozen of others that I see here"—glancing around upon the company.

"That's a fact," broke in the President, "many a gin toddy and brandy punch have I taken at your bar. But times are changed now, and we have begun to carry the war into the enemy's camp. And our war has not been altogether unsuccessful, for we have taken prisoner one of the rum-seller's bravest Generals! But, go on, friend W—, let us have your experience."

"As to my experience, Mr. President," the ex-barkeeper resumed, "in rum-selling and drinking, for I have done a great deal of both in my time, that would be rather too long to tell to-night, and one that I would much rather forget than relate. It makes me tremble and sick at heart, whenever I look back upon the evil I have done. I, therefore, usually look ahead with the hope of doing some good to my fellow men."

"But there is one incident I will relate. For the last five years, a hard working mechanic, with a wife and seven small children, came regularly, almost every night, to my place, and spent the evening in my barroom. He came to drink, of course, and many a dollar of his hard earnings went into my till. At last he became a perfect sot, working scarcely one-fourth of the time, and spending all he earned in liquor. His poor wife had to take in washing to support herself and children, while he spent his time, and the little he could earn, at my bar. But his appetite for liquor was so strong, that his week's earnings were usually gone by Tuesday or Wednesday, and then I had to chalk up a score against him, to be paid off when Saturday night came."

This score gradually increased, until it amounted to three or four dollars over his Saturday night's pay, when I refused to sell him any more liquor until it was settled. On the day I had thus refused him, he came in with a neat mourning breastpin, enclosing some hair, I thought, of a deceased relative. This he offered in payment for what he owed. I accepted it, for the pin, I saw at once, was worth double the amount of my bill. I did not think, nor indeed care, about the question, whether he was the owner or not; I wanted my own, and in my selfish eagerness to get it, I hesitated not to take a little more than my own.

I laid the breastpin away, and all things went on smoothly for a while. But he gradually got behind hand again, and again I cut off his supply of liquor. This time he brought me a pair of brass andirons, and a pair of brass candlesticks, and I took them, and wiped off the old score against him. At last he brought a large family Bible, and I took that, too—thinking, no doubt, I could sell it for something.

On the Sunday afterwards, having nothing to do, for I used to shut up my bar on Sundays, thinking it was not respectable to sell liquor, I opened this poor drunkard's family Bible, scarcely thinking of what I was doing. The first place I turned to was the family record. There it was stated that, upon a certain day, he had been married to Emily—. I had known Emily—, when I was a young man, very well, and had once thought seriously of offering myself to her in marriage. I remembered her happy young face, and seemed suddenly to hear a tone of her merry laughter.

"Poor creature!" I sighed involuntarily, as a thought of her present condition crossed my mind, and then with no pleasant feelings, I turned over another leaf. There was the record of the birth of her four children; the last had been made recently, and was in the mother's hand.

I never felt such strange feelings as now came over me. I felt that I had no business with this book; but I tried to stifle my feelings, and turned over several leaves quickly. As I suffered my eyes to rest upon an open page, these words arrested my attention:—

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; whoso is deceived thereby is not wise."

This was the subject, under the feelings I then had, I wished to avoid, and so I referred to another place. There I read:—

"Who hath wo? Who hath wounds? Who hath babbling? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine. At last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

I felt like throwing the book from me; but once more I turned the leaves, and my eyes rested upon these words:—

"Wo unto him that giveth his neighbor drink; that putteth thy bottle to him and makest him drunk."

I closed the book suddenly, and threw it down. Then, for half an hour, I paced the room. It was about nine o'clock, I think, on the same evening that I opened the drunkard's Bible again, with a kind of despairing hope that I should meet there with something to direct me.

I opened at the Psalms, and read two or three chapters. As I read on, without finding anything directly to my case, I felt an increasing desire to abandon my calling, because it was injurious to my fellow men.

After I had read the Bible, I retired to bed, but could not sleep. I am sure that during that night I thought of every drunken man to whom I had sold liquor, and of all their beggared families. In the brief sleep that I obtained, I dreamed that I saw a long line of tottering drunkards, with their wives and children in rags. And a loud voice said:—

"Who hath done this?"

The answer, in a still louder voice, directly I felt to me, smote upon my ear like a peal of thunder:—

"Thou art the man!"

From this troubled slumber I awoke to sleep no more that night. In the morning the last and most powerful conflict came. The question to be decided, was:—

"Shall I close my bar, or at once turn my bar into a place of traffic in liquid poison?"

Happily, I decided never to put to any man's lips the cup of confusion. My next step was to turn the spigot of every keg or barrel of spirits, wine, beer or cider, and let the contents escape on the floor. My bottles and decanters were likewise emptied. Then I came and signed your Total Abstinence Pledge; and what is better, never rested until I had persuaded the man whose Bible had been of so much use to me, to sign the pledge likewise.

And now, Mr. President, I am keeping a temperance grocery, and am making restitution as fast as possible. There are at least half a dozen families, to whom I furnish a small quantity of groceries every week, in many cases equal to the amount that used to be spent at my bar for liquor. Four of my oldest and best customers have already signed the pledge by my persuasion, and I am not going to rest until every man I helped to ruin, is restored to himself, his family, and society."

POMPEII

Thurlow Weed, Esq., of the Albany Evening Journal, in one of his letters from Europe, gives the following very interesting description of a visit to Pompeii:—

There are about fifty laborers engaged now in excavations. We were allowed to use the pick, but not to take away any of the spoils, though, like other visitors, we did obtain a few specimens, among which were fragments of stucco and Etruscan ware. Whenever a sovereign visits Naples, the event is signalized by developing, in his presence, the contents of a house, and these are given by the King to his royal guest. Everything valuable found at Pompeii has been carefully preserved here in the Museum, to which, as well as Pompeii, strangers have free admission.

The excavations display streets, institutions, dwellings, shops, etc., in a much more perfect condition than I had supposed. These are all satisfactorily identified. There is neither doubt nor obscurity as to the Pantheon, the Tribunal, the temples of Iris, Bacchus, Jupiter, Hercules; the Theatres, the Baths, the houses of Diomedes, Panza, etc. Not only the walls of these buildings, but their different compartments, with, in some instances, elaborate Fresco paintings, are seen.

Entire streets have been excavated and renumbered. Wine and oil stores were identified, by the jars and other vessels in which these liquids were kept, and which are still in use here. In a large bake house, the ovens of which are perfect, bread, with the name of the baker stamped, on each loaf, was found. In Diomedes' wine vault, the wine jars are still standing against the wall, close to which several skeletons were found, one of which is supposed to be either the wife or daughter, from the rich necklace, bracelet and ear rings that adorned the person of the sufferer. Near the gate of the city leading to Herculaneum, the skeleton of a soldier who perished on duty, with his armor on and his arms by his side, was found. The sentry-box in which this soldier was found is perfect.

The amphitheatre was a noble structure. The seats were of marble. Near the arena are dens and cells in which the wild beasts, with which the gladiators contended, were caged. In one of these the skeleton of a lion was found. In this amphitheatre, it is said that 30,000 spectators could be seated.

The streets were paved with large stones, of irregular shape and size, but with a flat surface, in which were cavities evidently caused by the wheels of vehicles. The side walks are raised like ours, and handsomely paved with pebbles, and around temples, etc., with Mosaic. In front of the House of the Vestals there is a fine Mosaic pavement, with the word "salve" (welcome) on the sill of its entrance. In one of the largest and most elegant houses were marble dining tables.

The King keeps intelligent guides at Pompeii, for the two fold purpose of showing visitors through the city and protecting its treasures. We were fortunate, in addition to the information given by the guide, in having Mr. Morris, our representative to this government, who knows Pompeii as he knows his own city of Philadelphia, with us. Having wandered for three hours, which took us two-thirds through the city, we sat down upon the broken wall of the Tribunal, in view of the Pantheon, the Theatre, etc., to our lunch, moistening our bread with Falernian wine; distilled from vineyards growing over a city whose inhabitants, eighteen centuries ago, held this beverage as fit for their gods.

Having discussed our viands, we resumed and completed our pilgrimage, passing out of the city at a gate which opened upon an Appian Way that led to Rome, on either side of which, for some distance were Tombs. I wish it were possible to impart to friends even a faint idea of the solemnity and impressiveness of Pompeii. Though walking literally among the Tombs, all the aspects of Pompeii are cheerful. The streets are clean, and all around you is a stillness in harmony with the scene and its associations. You look up on smoking Vesuvius, down which the burning lava ran, making for itself channels which still remains.

Having thus explored Pompeii, we repaired to the Museum where its recovered treasures are deposited; and here again, mingled amazement and admiration, with increased intensity, are awakened. These treasures (belonging in part to Herculaneum) fill eight spacious halls, each devoted to classified articles. The room we visited first contains kitchen furniture of every conceivable description, mostly in bronze, and bearing strong resemblance to articles now in use. In this department of domestic life the Pompeians were not behind those of our day. An adjoining room is devoted to Etruscan vases of beautiful form. In this room are several magnificent Mosaics. Then comes a room devoted to glass in various colors, and for nearly all the purposes for which it is now used. And yet, while this knowledge belonged to the buried inhabitants of Pompeii nearly 2,000 years ago, its uses and existence was comparatively unknown in England a thousand years afterward!

Another room is devoted to sacrificial vases and other appendages of heathen worship, among which are vessels for incense, idols, deities, etc. Then comes a room devoted to weights, measures, scales, lamps, candelabras, among which are steelyards with the name of Augustus inscribed under figures of Romulus and Remus. The articles show a higher state of civilization in this respect than existed in England during the reign of Elizabeth; and proves that the ages which succeeded were indeed dark ones.

Two rooms are devoted to miscellaneous articles, including iron stocks found in front of a prison, agricultural implements, vases, essence bottles found in the bath-house; a helmet with bas relief representing the conflagration of Troy; bells of various descriptions, and those for cattle precisely such as are used now; with flat-irons similar to our own; letter for stamping bread, so like type that the art of printing ought not to have been a comparatively modern discovery; mirrors, opera tickets, numbers to correspond with the seats, musical instruments, dice, pins, nails, locks, keys; bits, found in the mouths of skeleton horses, paints, including rouge, etc. In another room is a vast collection of memorials belonging to the amusements, revels, etc., of the Pompeians. These indicate a very great fondness for festival masquerades, and kindred amusements. Among the divinities to which they sacrificed, it is quite evident that Bacchus and Venus were most popular.

ENGLISH EMIGRATION MANIA.

The London correspondent of the North American writes:—

The emigration mania amongst Englishmen is equal, just now, to the mania amongst Americans when gold was first discovered in California. We have heard for many years of an "Irish exodus," but there is now an English exodus. Englishmen are leaving their native land by every vessel bound for Australia. Fifty large ships are taking in cargoes in the London docks alone, for Australia. Numerous vessels are about to leave Liverpool, Glasgow, Bristol, and other ports, for the same destination.

The applications for passenger berths are far beyond the ability of ship owners to supply; and the consequence is that, so eager are persons possessing a little capital to get away to the new El Dorado, large premiums have been paid to those emigrants who had pre-engaged berths. It is said that one ship left England last week with eight hundred emigrants on board, and a crew of sixty persons!

So numerous are the applications for berths in Liverpool, that Messrs. Gibbs, Bright & Co., the present owners of the steamer Great Britain, have withdrawn that vessel from the American route, and they intend to send her to Australia. She will leave Liverpool on the 21st of August, for Port Philip, and she will take one thousand passengers. These will be arranged under three classes. First class tickets will be seventy guineas each—second class forty guineas; and the third class, twenty-five guineas. The Great Britain can, however, easily make another voyage to New York before she leaves for Australia.

Most of the persons who are emigrating belong to the middle classes of English society, who take with them small stocks of British manufactures, intending to commence business on their own account when they arrive. An immense number of clerks in wholesale and retail shops in London and the country, and merchants', bankers', and government clerks have given the usual notice of their intention to leave their situations.

Their present salaries range from seventy-five pounds up to five hundred pounds per annum, and yet permanent situations are suddenly given up for an uncertain position in Australia. I am informed that merchants and bankers find it a difficult matter to supply the places made vacant in their establishments by clerks who have already left. The manufacturing, mercantile, and other large establishments throughout the country are feeling sensibly the effects of this wholesale emigration. The vacancies thus created will not be easily filled at the present very low scale of salaries.

CANADIAN POLITICS.

After the late Canadian rebellion, the home government in order to give a majority against the French population in Lower Canada sufficient to control them, without departing from the principles of representative government united the two provinces.

The effect has been to give great weight to the province of Canada. Old jealousies and prejudice are measurably obliterated. In place of it, a general spirit of enterprise and a feeling of nationality have sprung up, which will not be satisfied with colonial dependence.

The Canadians begin to think themselves an empire, and will not be satisfied till they are so.—Filled with this feeling, they have sought for and obtained what among Englishmen is called responsible government; that is, a government in which the ministers are responsible to the representatives of the people for the acts of the Governor.

This is a singular anomaly in Colonial Government; for by means of it the Governor ceases to be the creature of the crown, and becomes a mere bailiff of the commons. For the Governor can do no act but by the advice of his ministers. And if they are obliged to answer to the Commons for the advice they give, the Commons may control them and him. The Commons become in the colony what they are in the home government—the ruling estate of the Province, not liable to be restrained by the exercise of legal authority, but only by usurpations.

It is evident that many Canadians of great talent and influence, feel the force of their position, and are determined to profit by it. Throughout the British Empire, a legal position is a strong one, and it is very difficult to array force against it. All the agitators who have had any degree of success, have at least pretended with some speciousness to have the Law on their side. And an attempt to curtail the lawful prerogatives of the representative branch of the Colonial government would produce distrust of the administrator who undertook it throughout the Empire.

The Canadians, beginning to feel themselves an empire, are projecting some very expensive Railroads of a character evidently National; among which the most prominent is one from Quebec to Halifax, or St. Johns. But this scheme the home government oppose with a pertinacity which few have been able to comprehend. Mr. Hincks, who went out as the representative of Canada in the matter, was treated at the Colonial office with entire and most marked contempt. Not satisfied with coldness, reserve, and an utter disregard of the wants of the Colonies, no answer was vouchsafed to him in any manner of the intentions of the home government, and he was left to learn their intentions weeks after their decision was made by a casual remark in a letter to the agent of one of the Canadian land companies.

Mr. Hincks is a man of wealth, talent, energy, and a very extended influence. There is nothing of bustle about him. His answer was cool and dignified. The London Times regards the issue taken by him with the Colonial office as quite as important as that of the American revolution.

Simultaneous with this movement in Canada, Australia has denied the right of Great Britain to tax the colonies. The Australian gold mania may for a time overwhelm this question, but it will give strength to the colonies.—Who can say that two empires, possessing all the elements of power and greatness, (except a righteous administration,) are not at this moment springing into existence, children of Great Britain? Such are the present portents. Thus four great nations, the commercial nations of the earth, will speak the English language. In its time the Cape of Good Hope may make the fifth, and the British West Indies the sixth. After this British colonies, the German colonies, spring up in countenance and sound. The times are portentous. The language of the revelations of this dispensation will be the language of all the earth.

We discover by our exchanges that the Phonetic system of spelling has been introduced into fifty-three of the public schools of Massachusetts. This very difficult improvement in the written English is likely eventually to prevail. It has been introduced to a limited extent here. Professor Hadley has taken much interest in it, and we hope will see his efforts crowned with entire success. In no place can such an improvement be introduced with better prospect of success.

NEW LINES OF OCEAN STEAM PACKETS.

The steamer Great Britain is to run hereafter from some English port to New South Wales, instead of New York. The Australian gold excitement has caused this change. Cunard is about to extend his line of steamers to the Isthmus of Darien, and put on another line from there to Australia, touching at the most important Islands of the Pacific. It is not impossible that the India mail may reach Great Britain across the Pacific and the American continent.

How long will it be before we hear that a railroad is to be opened from London to Calcutta, ferrying the straits of Dover, and bridging with wires the Hellespont?

Elder Phineas Wright is authorized to collect tithing, and to take up subscriptions for the construction of the Tabernacle, the work on which has stopped by our persecutions.

Elder Murray Seaman is authorized to receive books, maps, charts, pictures, specimens in geology and mineralogy, &c., &c., for the public library, at Saint James, Beaver Island.

Some friend has sent us an old number of the Frontier Guardian, in which Orson Hyde gives as a reason for not entering into a discussion with us, "that the relation existing between the Strangites and the Brighamites is precisely the same as that between God and the angels, and the Devil and the fallen spirits." Mr. Hyde is perfectly right. Every just man will approve his judgment.

It appears that the nomination of Orson Hyde as one of the Judges of the United States District Court for the Territory of Utah, has been rejected by the Senate. Mr. Hyde goes west without office.

The Musical World and New York Musical Times, published by Oliver Dyer, 257, Broadway, N. Y. We have received a number of this highly valuable semi-monthly paper, published in quarto form. It contains a chaste and beautiful selection of original music, articles on music, literature and the fine arts; it also embraces musical instructions for the million. We cordially welcome it to our table, and recommend it to our musical friends. Music and the fine arts, like beautiful women and sweet flowers, cannot be too highly eulogized or cultivated. We hope to see the "Musical World" patronized according to its merit by all lovers of music. It contains advertisements of new music, musical instruments, &c. We place it on our exchange list with pleasure. It can be examined at this office.

The engineers are on the ground making a survey for the Iron Mountain and Lake Superior Railroad, fourteen miles in length, to bring forward the iron manufactured in the Lake Superior region. The Iron Mountains are about midway between Lakes Superior and Michigan. Why does not some enterprising company open a communication this way, and thus save the land carriage and two transshipments at the Sault?

The United States War Steamer Michigan is expected here in two or three weeks.—Many of the citizens here have received numerous kindnesses, from both officers and men. We bid them welcome.

One of the Lunatic Asylums of the State of Ohio is to be located at Cleveland. We rejoice to hear it, and hope the editor of the Plaindealer may thereby be furnished a proper home without being called from his chair editorial.

The familiar spirits which by the Mosaic law are condemned to death, are quite the rage of the good christians of our time.

Spirit rappings have spread over the land. The spirits are also making a great stir in Prussia, but do not rap there. Their usual familiarity is there in somnambulism. Among the Indians it is in shaking and frothing.

MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS OF DIET.

The city and town councils are prohibiting the sale of vegetables, fish, &c., in many of the large towns and cities. This is unwise. Salt meat is far more unwholesome than green vegetables. Fish is preferable to salt meat in warm summer weather, and vegetables preferable to either.

The family which is furnished three times a day with green corn, potatoes, beans, peas, cucumbers, &c., is least liable to diseases of the bowels during the warm season.

MORE OF THE LIQUOR LAW.

Two more judgments have been recovered before Mr. Justice Chidester, for violations of the liquor law. We believe that no resident will hereafter, for some time at least, undertake to defy the law. The Supervisor desires us to say that unless traders on the small sail vessels desist from the sale of spirituous liquors he shall send processes, and try the virtue of the law on them.

By the way, we see by our exchanges that the quiet and sober citizens of Boston have contrived to violate the liquor law with impunity. No officer but the city Marshal was found authorized to serve the processes, and the Council have abolished the office of Marshal.

The white men fishing in this vicinity are rapidly departing, and Indians are coming on to fill their places. We have Indians not only from north and east shores in this vicinity, but from Green Bay and Canada.—The change is favorable. There is less of vice and dissipation among the Indians than among the whites of the borders. Separate from the influence of vicious white men, the Indians are moral, industrious, honest and peaceable. We wish they might be permitted to congregate about this part of the lakes to the exclusion of the vicious population who are pressing them into the Pacific.

We have just received from the author, Francis W. Shearman, Esq., Superintendent of Public Instruction, the "System of Instruction and Primary School Law of the State of Michigan." This is a valuable work, and we believe provision has been made by the Legislature for furnishing it to all the townships of the State. But by some means the township of Peaine has failed as yet to receive its quota.

Not only those who are supplied at the expense of the State, but all attorneys, magistrates and gentlemen connected with the conducting of the public schools should possess this work.

affairs in that quarter portends a storm near at hand. We hope it may be a light one, and especially that the right may prevail.

The Salt Lake Mormons are unfriendly to us, and take every convenient opportunity to abuse us, but we sympathize with them, because we know they are persecuted not as schismatics, nor as our enemies, but as Mormons.

R. Packard has just opened a considerable stock of goods. As we have not seen his card, and the boxes and bales were not half opened when we were in, we cannot vouch for the extent of his assortment. We observed a fine lot of hardware, which we should be inclined to say was excellent, only that he gave us a shovel on the sole condition that we would not say they were good.

The Omaha Indians are very hostile to the Mormons.—Last summer they stripped Orson Hyde quite naked, and gave him a severe whipping. They have robbed the Mormons passing through of $100,000 worth of live stock, and are yet pursuing the same policy.

It is said, however, that the Indians in the Valley are devoted to the Mormon interests.

CHOLERA.—We hear of Cholera in almost every place from Chicago, south, east, and west. On the Missouri Plains Cholera, Small Pox, and Measles are carrying off the emigrants in an unprecedented manner.

There has been several cases of Cholera among the Fishermen in this vicinity, induced by vicious habits and filthy living. All the SETTLEMENTS in this region are remarkably healthy.

MRS. STOWE, daughter of Dr. Beecher, has realized more money out of her copy right of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," a little anti-slavery Novel, than has been realized by any other American Author.

Well, she has deserved it. If we could get more than a few hours loan of the work, we would put it in the School Library for all the children. The children's fathers, and grand-fathers, have few of them read a better book.

WHEN you go into the Editor's Sanctum, keep your hands off the papers, never look upon the manuscript, and if you see a gold pen lying on the table—look, but touch not.

DESTRUCTIVE INUNDATION IN GERMANY.

The districts of Mulhausen and Heiligenstadt have been visited by a great calamity. The bursting of a waterspout caused such a sudden rise in the waters of the Ustrut and other streams, that not only is the whole harvest of the present year destroyed, but the fields are covered with stones and sand to such an extent that it will be impossible to bring them into cultivation for years to come. In a quarter of an hour the Unstrut rose 18 feet above its usual level. The loss of life is not yet known, but it is feared it is considerable.—In Doingelstadt 11 bodies have been found, and nineteen persons are missing. In the district of Mulhausen above twenty persons are reported as having been drowned, and between twenty and thirty more suspected to have shared the same fate. The roads are every where destroyed, whole herds of cattle and sheep have been lost and buildings have been so completely swept away that scarcely a stone of them remains. The full extent of the loss of life and damage to property has not yet been ascertained. The Provincial Government in Erfurt has despatched commissioners to the locality to make the necessary investigations.—Appeals are already made to the public for subscriptions in aid of the population of the district.—English Paper.

INDIAN CAMP MEETING.

A Protracted Meeting of the Indian Methodist Missions from this neighborhood and the conference of Canada West, is to be holden at the camping ground near White Fish Point, L. S. about forty-five miles above this village, commencing on Thursday of this week and continuing until next Monday. Nearly three hundred Indians are expected to attend, from the several missions. The Rev. S. M. McDougall from Garden River with his interpreter Mr. Blaker, and a large bateau full of Indians left this place on Tuesday for the encampment. The Rev. Mr. Sallust from the Bruce Mine, the Rev. Mr. Warner, Chairman of the Barrie District, Canada Conference, and Peter Jones a native preacher of long and regular standing as a missionary among the Indians are to attend.

The Rev. J. H. Pitzell of this place accompanies them with a large supply of provisions for the occasion.—Lake Superior Journal.

DARK HOURS.

There are hours, dark hours, that mark the history of the brightest year. For not a whole month perhaps, of the millions of the past, has the sun shone brilliant all the time. And there will be cold stormy days in every year, where will be seen or heard nothing to cheer the spirit, or gratify our desire for the beautiful. And yet the mists and shadows of the darkest hours have dissipated and melted away. The cruellest of icy fetters have been broken and dissolved, and the most furious storm loses its power to harm.

And what a parable is all this of our outside world of human life, where the heart works at its inside labors. Here too we have the overshadowing of the dark hours, and many a cold blast chills the heart to its very core. But what matters it?—Man is born a hero, and it is only by darkness and storm that heroism gains its full development and illustration—then it kindles the dark cloud into a blaze of glory, and the storm bears it more rapidly to its destiny. Despair not then. Never give up while one good point is yours.—Use it. Disappointment and mortifying failure, may accompany this effort, and that one—be honest and struggle on, and it will all work right.

YOUTHFUL NEGLECT.

Walter Scott, in a narrative of his personal history, gives the following caution to youth:—

"If it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages, let such readers remember that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhood the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth; that through every part of my literary career I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance, and I would this moment give half the reputation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if, by doing so, I could rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learning and science."

LIVE FOR SOMETHING.

Thousands of men breathe, move, and live—pass off the stage of life, and are heard of no more. Why? They did not partake of good in the world, and none were blessed by them; none could point to them as the means of their redemption. Not a line they wrote not a word they spoke, could be recalled, and so they perished; their light went out in darkness, and they were not remembered more than insects of yesterday. Live, then for something. Do good, and leave behind you a monument of virtue that the storms of time can never destroy. Write your name by kindness, love, and mercy, on the hearts of thousands you come in contact with year by year, and they will not be forgotten. No, your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind, as the stars on the brow of the evening. Good deeds will shine as brightly on the earth as the stars in heaven.

MUSIC IN THE WILDERNESS.

Among the articles sent over the Erie Railroad a few days ago, was a piano for Salt Lake, Utah Territory. The distance is about 4000 miles; the place where it is destined to go a few years ago was inhabited only by the Indians; and a wilderness peopled with the red race and a few trappers only, has to be crossed before it is reached. The axe is the pioneer civilizer, but how closely upon its tracks, in our day, follow the luxuries and refinement of civilized life. Who says the condition of humanity has not improved?—Minnesota Democrat.

WRITING FOR NEWS-PAPERS.

The following advice, from the Home Journal to those who write for newspapers, is worthy of their profound consideration:

"The sum of all is, dear, dear contributor, when you would write for the public eye, select a subject upon which you have good reason to think you know more than the public in general, and a subject upon which the public desires or needs information. Choose a form of composition—prose or verse—that is best adapted to your subject and to yourself. Waste no words, but come to the point at once, and stop when you have done. Reperuse and re-write your poem as often, and keep it in your possession as long as it is in your power to improve or shorten it. Last of all, consider, before you dispatch it, whether it is fitter for the fire than the press; and, as you determine, send it to the Postoffice, or thrust it into the stove."

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

The more true merit a man has, the more does he applaud it in others.

The defects of the mind, like those of the face, grow worse as we grow old.

The worst education which teaches selfdenial, is better than the best which teaches everything but that.

Good qualities, like great abilities, are incomprehensible and inconceivable to such as are deprived of them.

Those habits which dignify, or dishonor manhood, obtain their shape and complexion during our earlier years. The fruits of summer and autumn vegetate in the spring, and the harvest of old age germinates in youth.

The more we accomplish, the more we have to accomplish.—All things are full of labor; and therefore the more we acquire, the more we care, and the more we toil, to secure our acquisitions. Good men can never retire from their works of benevolence.—Their fortune is never made.

POETRY.

Go, ye heralds of salvation,
Load the gospel news proclaim;
Tell this wicked Gentile nation,
Jesus soon will come to reign.

Now the little stone is rolling,
Breaking kingdoms—nations all—
Soon o'er all the earth controlling,
Jew and Gentile, great and small.

Priestcraft now is tottering—trembling,
And her hope of gain is gone;
Her protracted meetings ending,
Scarce a thread to hang upon.

Hypocrites are horror stricken,
For their craft in danger lies;
All their future prospects smitten—
See them gaze in sad surprise.

THE CALORIC SHIP ERICSSON.

Steam has revolutionized the world. It has quadrupled the power of man. It has changed the face of nature. It has wrought miracles upon earth.—But its day is nearly over. Its glory is departing and a few years hence it will be numbered among the things that were. A new and overshadowing rival has taken the field, and steam must go to the wall. But to the recital.

The editor of the Boston Evening Transcript gives the following account of this enterprise in his journal of the 5th ultimo, after a personal visit to the Works in New York, where the machinery for the Caloric ship is being built, and where also a sixty-horse power trial engine is in operation on this new principle for production of motive power.

"The idea of substituting a new and superior motive power for steam will no doubt strike many minds as extravagant, if not chimerical. We have been accustomed to regard steam power as the plus ultra of human ingenuity in subjecting the modifying forces of nature to the service of man, that a discovery which promises to supersede this agency will have to contend with the most formidable preconceptions as well as gigantic interests. Nevertheless, it may now be predicted with confidence that we are on the eve of another great revolution, produced by the application of an agent more economical and incalculably safer than steam.

On Saturday I visited the manufactory, and had the privilege of inspecting Ericsson's engine of sixty-horse power while it was in operation. It consists of two pairs of cylinders, the working pistons of which are 72 inches in diameter. Its great peculiarities consist in its very large cylinders and pistons, working with low pressure, and in the absence of boilers or heaters, there being no other fires employed than those in small grates under the bottom of the working cylinders. During the 8 months that this test engine has been in operation, not a cent has been expended for repairs or accidents. It is a beautiful and imposing object, and conveys the idea of power and symmetry much more impressively than the largest steam engine I have ever seen.

The leading principle of the Caloric engine consists in producing motive power by the employment of the expansive force of atmospheric air instead of that of steam; the force being produced by the compression of the air in one part of the machine, and by its dilation by the application of heat in another part. This dilation, however, is not effected by continuous application of combustibles, but by a peculiar process of transfer, by which the Caloric is made to operate over and over again, viz. the heat of the air escaping from the working cylinder at each successive stroke of the engine is transferred to the cold compressed air entering the same; so that in fact, a continued application of fuel is only necessary in order to make good the losses of heat occasioned by the unavoidable radiation of the heated parts of the machine.

The obvious advantages of this great improvement are the great saving of fuel and labor in the management of the engine, and its perfect safety. A ship carrying the amount of coal that the Atlantic steamers now take for a single trip, could cross and recross the Atlantic twice without taking in coal; and the voyage to China or to California could be easily accomplished by a Caloric ship without the necessity of stopping at any port to take fuel.—There being no smoke, a short pipe to carry off the carbonic acid gas and other products of combustion is all that is needed. But the great advantage of this improvement, and that which, in the absence of other advantages, would commend it to adoption, is the entire safety to the engine; an explosion being impossible.

In steam engines, if the water gets low, or if there is an excess of pressure, or any defect in the materials of which the boiler is composed, or an overheating of the furnace tops, occasioned by incrustation formed by salt, in marine boilers, &c., an explosion is inevitable. But in the Caloric engine the only result from neglect, will be the stoppage of the engine. The present test engine, shows that there must be a neglect to put in fuel for the space of three hours before the speed is even slackened. Thus you have nothing to fear from a sleepy engineer or an ambitious captain; and all the while not one-quarter the amount of attendance and labor required to keep a steam engine in motion will be needed.

A Caloric ship of 2,200 tons, to be called the Ericsson, is now in process of construction, and is in such a state of forwardness that she will be in frames by the end of next week. She is a very beautiful model, and is the admiration of all ship-builders for her remarkable strength, being admitted to have the strongest bottom of any ship built in New York. The machinery is more than half completed. I saw three out of the four working cylinders, the paddle wheels, all the valves and valve-chests, the main links and connecting rods, the bed plates, and main pillar blocks, and various other parts of the engine, all of them massive forms of metal, cast with the utmost precision and smoothness. The cylinders are 168 inches in diameter—72 inches larger than those in the Collins' steamers.—The Ericsson will be ready for sea by October next; and the owners intend to take passengers at a reduced price in consequence of the reduced expenses under the new principle. The ship belongs to Mr. John B. Kitching and a few other wealthy men.—The Ericsson will be commanded by Capt. Lowber."

ATTENTION ESSENTIAL TO GENIUS.

Attention it is, though other qualities belong to this transcendent power—attention it is, that is the very soul of genius; not the fixed eye, nor the poring over a book, but the fixed thought. It is in fact an action of the mind, which is steadily concentrated upon one idea, or one series of ideas, which collect in one point the rays of the soul, till they search, penetrate, and fire the whole train of its thoughts. And while the fire burns within, the outside may indeed be cold, indifferent, negligent, absent in appearance; he may be an idler, or a wanderer; apparently without aim or intent; but still the fire burns within. And what though "it burst forth," at length, as has been said, "like volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force?" It only shows the intense action of the elements beneath. What, though it breaks forth like lightning, from the cloud? The electric fire had been collecting in the firmament through many a silent, clear and calm day. What though the might of genius appears in one decisive blow, struck in some moment of high debate, or at the crisis of a nation's peril! That mighty energy, though it may heaved in the bosom of Demosthenes, was but a feeble thought. A mother's eye watched over its dawns. A father's care guarded its early youth.—It soon trod, with youthful steps, the halls of learning, and found other fathers to wake and to watch for it even as it finds them here. It went on; but silence was upon its path, and the deep struggling of the inward soul silently ministered to it. The elements around breathed upon it, and "touched it to finer issue." The rays of heaven fell upon it, and ripened its expanding faculties. The slow revolutions of years slowly added to its collected energies and treasures; till in the hour of its glory, it stood forth embodied in the form of living, commanding, irresistible eloquence.—Dewey.

CORRUPTION IN ARISTOCRATIC CIRCLES.

Respectable German papers contain obscure allusions to a gigantic criminal trial lately concluded at Berlin in the greatest secrecy. The nature of the crime seems to be such as to forbid precise details, but it appears that a large number of persons, of high birth and station, in civil and military life, were organized in a sort of fraternity with signs and pass words.

The police had long been aware of the existence of this organization, but had refrained from acting on account of the protection of an aged man in the most eminent official position. His death and the accidental discovery of the diary of another member, rendered it impossible longer to permit the society to exist, and all the members were arrested and tried.—The person whose diary has been found expressed the greatest surprise that the law should interfere with men of such rank, but this was by no means the general opinion in those circles; the more intelligent portion of the aristocracy admitted that vice must be treated with impartial severity, whatever the position of the guilty parties.

How many persons have suffered the sentence of the Court is not known, but it is understood that many highly distinguished men are condemned to rigorous imprisonment for from one to ten years. All military officers implicated have also had their names stricken from the rolls of the army, by the express order of the King.

RYE FLOUR.—When made into good light bread and allowed a day or two to ripen, is very nutritious and wholesome. Rye flour more nearly resembles wheaten flour in its composition than any other; it has, however, more of certain gummy and sugary substances, which make it tenacious, and also impart a sweetish taste. All grain and roots which have much starch in them, undergo a great change in their chemical composition by baking—flour becomes more nutritious, and more easily digestible, because more soluble. This is also the case with flour; that is, the starch, gluten and sugar of potatoes, when baked or what is still better, when roasted in the hot embers of an old fashioned farm house fire.—American Agriculturist.

Col. Colt, a British officer, stationed in Egypt, has made a communication to one of the Oriental societies in London, stating that he has ascertained the principal ingredient used by the ancient Egyptians in the preservation of mummies. It is only the vegetable tar of those countries, called by the natives katron. He has made trial and forwarded to England animal substances, and a human hand, prepared about forty years ago with this substance.—The best informed among the Arabs think that large quantities of camphor, myrrh, aloes, frankincense, &c., were used in the preparation of the mummies; but these specimens prove that such additions are by no means necessary, as the tar applied alone penetrates and discolors the bone. The tar is obtained from the branches of a small tree or shrub exposed to a considerable degree of heat, and it is found in most parts of Syria and Arabia Felix.

The census of France, of 1851, gives one curious result. The number of women is greater than that of men! The difference is extraordinary, nearly a million and a half.—Ex. paper.

Polygamy is the only remedy. For want of it, in keeping the commandment to be fruitful and multiply, a half million bastards are born yearly.

"GOOD AS THE WHEAT," OR, "SEVEN UP" FOR A WIFE.

In the State of Tennessee there is a certain village, boasting of its tavern, three stores, and four groceries, where, from morning till night, and from night till morning, a person entering the town may find, in the tavern, stores, or groceries aforesaid, one or more groups of persons playing cards. Gambling there is reduced to a science—the history of four kings is thoroughly studied, and from the school boy to the grey headed veteran, from the miss in her teens to the mother of a large family, they are initiated into the mysteries of high, low, jack, game; right and left bowers; the honors and the odd trick. One of the best players in the village was Major Smith, the tavern keeper; or, as he expressed it, the proprietor of the hotel; a widower, who, like

"Jephtha, Judge in Israel, Had a daughter passing fair."
Fanny, the daughter, was one of the prettiest girls in Tennessee, and therefore, one of the prettiest in the world; for here we digress, in order to lay down, as our ipse dixit, that Tennessee women in point of beauty, are matchless. The sweetheart of Miss Fanny was a young farmer, residing in the neighborhood, whom we shall designate by the name of Bob.

It happened that one day before harvest, the young man was detained in the village, and found him, as usual, at the hotel, seated between the Major and his daughter. After a desultory conversation between the two gentlemen, on the state of the weather, the prospect of the approaching harvest, and such important staples of conversation, the Major asked Robert how his wheat crop promised to yield. In reply, he was told that the young man expected to make at least one hundred bushels. The Major appeared to study for a moment, then abruptly proposed a game of old sledge, or "seven up," the stakes to be his daughter Fanny against the crop of wheat. This, of course, the young man indignantly refused, because he could not bear the idea that the hand of her he loved should be made the subject of a bet, or that he should win a wife by gambling for her, and, perhaps, because he knew the old man was "hard to beat," and that there was a strong probability of his losing both wheat and wife.

It was not until the Major, with his usual pertinacity, had sworn that unless he won her, he should never have her, that the young man was forced reluctantly to play.

The table was placed, the candles lit, the cards produced, and the players took their seats, with Miss Fanny between them to watch the game. The cards were regularly shuffled and cut, and it fell to the Major's lot to deal. The first hand was played to his opponent's high, low, game. Robert then dealt, the Major begged; it was given, and the Major again made three to his opponent's one.

"Six to two," said Miss Fanny with a sigh. "The Major as he dealt the cards, winked knowingly, and said—

"I am good for that wheat, Master Bob."

The old man turned up a trump—it was a spade. Fanny glanced at her father's hand—her heart sunk; he held the three and eight spot, and the king! She then looked at Robert's hand and lo! he held the ace, queen, deuce, and jack or knave. She whispered to Robert to beg; he did so.

"Take it, said the Major."

"Three to six," said Miss Fanny, aloud.

Robert led his deuce, which the Major took with the three spot, and followed by playing the king; Robert put his queen upon it. The Major, supposing it was the young man's last trump, leant over the table, and tapping the last trick with his finger, said—

"That's good as wheat."

"Is it?" asked Robert, as he displayed to the eyes of the astonished Major, the ace and jack yet in his hand.

"High, low, jack, and the game," shouted Robert.

"Out," sentimentally ejaculated Miss Fanny.

"Good as wheat," added Robert, as he flung his arms around her neck and kissed her.

In due time they were married, and ever after that, when any thing occurred of a pleasant nature to the happy couple, they would express their emphatic approbation of it, by the phrase "good as wheat."

TO YOUNG MEN.—Don't rely upon friends. Don't rely upon the good name of your ancestors. Thousands have spent the prime of life in vain hopes of aid from those whom they call friends—and thousands have starved because they had a rich father. Rely only upon the good name which is made by your own exertions, and know that the best friend you can have is an unconquerable determination, united with decision of character.

THE GLOBE WE LIVE IN.—It is known as a fact in Geology, that below the depth of thirty feet the earth becomes regularly warmer as we descend. On an average the increase is at the rate of one degree of Fahrenheit for every fifth foot. At the bottom of the mines in Cornwall, a depth one thousand two hundred feet, the thermometers stand at eighty-eight, equal to high summer heat. At this rate rocks and metals would be melted twenty miles below the surface, and down in the bowels of the earth, several hundred miles, the heat would be twenty thousand times hotter than melted iron. Who is there that can wonder at earthquakes when all things rest on a molten sea of fire?

THE WRECK OF THE PRESIDENT.—Portions of a large steamer has been washed ashore on the coast of Scotland, which are supposed to have belonged to the ill-fated steamer President. The wreck has been taken in charge by the coast guard.

DEBT.—I have always observed that he who owes a man a dollar, is sure to owe him also a grudge, and he is always more ready to pay compound interest on the latter, than the former.

THE MOONLIGHT RIDE.

A number of years ago, a gentleman in Clydesdale offered me a situation as head groom, which I accepted. He had one horse which was kept in a stable by himself, and was, without exception, the ugliest and most savage of his kind I had ever seen. There was not a single point of a strong or fast horse about him. He was as black as charcoal; he was named Satan, and richly did he deserve the name. He would fly at you like a dog, with his teeth; attempt to beat you down with his fore feet; and strike around a corner at you with his hind ones. He had beaten all the rough riders, grooms and jockeys in that part of the country.

After being in the place for a few days, I was asked by the gentleman, if I thought I could make anything of Satan. I replied that if he beat me, he would be the only horse which had ever done so; but still I considered him to be by far the most savage I had ever seen. "Try him to-morrow at one o'clock," said he, as he turned to go away: "I will have a few friends with me to see how you succeed."

I determined, however, to try him that night, and without any witness to see whether I succeeded or not. My room was over the stables, and as the moon did not rise till eleven o'clock, I threw myself upon the bedclothes, and, contrary to my intention, fell asleep. When I awoke, it was twelve, the moon was shining brightly, and rendering everything as visible as if it were day.

I went down to the stable with a bridle prepared for the purpose, and a heavily loaded whip in my hand. I knew that it would be impossible to saddle him; and, indeed, I should be safer on his bare back, in the event of throwing himself down. I opened the stable door gently, and there he was prone on his side, his legs and neck stretched out, as I have often seen horses lying after sore fatigue. I clapped my knee upon his head, loosed the collar that bound him, slipped the bit into his mouth, buckled the throat band, raised him to his feet, backed him out and leaped upon his back before he had time to get his eyes right opened.

But open them now he did, and that with a vengeance; he pawed, and struck the walls with his fore feet, till the fire flashed from the stones; and then he reared till he fell right back upon the pavement. I was prepared for this, and slipped off him as he went down, and then leaped on him again as he rose. I had not as yet touched him with whip, bridle or spur; but now I gave him the curb and the spurs at the same instant. He gave one mad bound, and then went off at a rate that completely eclipsed the speed of the fleetest horse I had ever ridden. He could not trot, but his gallop was unapproachable, and consisted in a succession of leaps, performed with a precision, velocity, and strength, absolutely bewildering.

He fairly overturned all my preconceived notions of a fast horse. On he thundered, till we came under the shadow of a fir wood, and then, whether out of mischief or dread of the darkness, he halted instantaneously, his fore feet so close together that you might have put them into a bucket. Owing to the depression of his shoulders—for he had no more withers than an ass—the way that he jerked down his head, and the suddenness of the stop, a monkey, although he had been holding on with his teeth, must have been unseated. For me, I was pitched a long way over his head, but alighted upon a spot so soft and mossy, that it looked as if some kind hand had purposely prepared for me.

Had I been in the slightest degree stunned, or unable to regain my feet, that instant he would have torn me to pieces, with his teeth, and beaten my mangled body into the earth with his hoofs. But I at once sprang to my feet, and faced him. I could have escaped by leaping into the wood, but my blood was up, my brain clear, and my heart gave me not one extra pulsation. There he stood upon his hind legs nearly upright, beating the air with his fore feet, his mouth open, his upper lip curled, his under one drawn down, his large white teeth glancing like ivory in the moonlight. As soon as he saw me upon my feet, he gave a yell such as I had never heard from a horse before, save once, and which I believe is never elicited from that animal, except when under the domination of frantic rage or fear.

This unearthly cry roused every living thing within hearing. An army of rooks, startled from their encampment in the wood, circled and wheeled between us and the moon, shading her light, and filling the midnight air with their discordant screams. This attracted the attention of Satan, and bringing his fore feet to the ground, he pricked up his ears, and listened. I sprang forward, seized him by the mane, and vaulted upon his back; as I stooped forward to gather up the reins, which were dangling from his head, he caught me by the cuff of the jacket, luckily it was the cuff!—and tore it up to the shoulder.

Instantly he seized me again; but this time he succeeded rather better, having a small portion of the skin and flesh between his teeth. The intense pain occasioned by the bite, or rather bruise of a horse's mouth, can only be properly judged by those who have felt it. I was the madder of the two now; and of all animals, an enraged man is the most dangerous and most fearless. I gave him a blow between the ears with the end of the whip; and he went down at once, stunned and senseless, with his legs doubled up under him, and his nose buried in the ground. I drew his fore legs from under him, that he might rise the more readily, and then lashed him into life. He turned his head slowly round, and looked at me, and then I saw that the savage glare of his eyes was nearly quenched, and that, if I could follow up the advantage that I had gained, I should ultimately be the conqueror.

I now assisted him to rise, mounted him, and struck at once with whip and spur. He gave a few bounds forward, a stagger or two, and then fell heavily upon his side. I was nearly under him; however, I did save my distance, although that was all. I now began to feel sorry for him; his wonderful speed had won my respect, and I was far from being naturally cruel; whip or spur I never used, except in cases of necessity; so I thought I would allow him to lie for a few minutes, if he did not incline to get up of himself.

However, as I had no faith in the creature, I sat down upon him, and watched him intently. He lay motionless, with his eyes shut; and had it not been for the firm and fast beat of his heart, I should have considered him dying from the effects of the blow; but the strong pulsation told me that there was plenty of life in him; and I suspected that he was lying quiet, meditating mischief. I was right. Every muscle began to quiver with suppressed rage. He opened his eyes, and gave me a look, in which fear and fury were strangely blended. I am not without superstition, and for an instant I quailed under that look, as the thought struck me that the black, unshapely brute before me might actually be the spirit indicated by his name.

With a muttered growl at my folly, I threw the idea from me—leaped up—seized the reins—with a lash and a cry made him spring to his feet—mounted him as he rose, and struck the spurs into his side. He reared and wheeled; but finding that he could not get rid of me, and being unable to stand the torture of the spurs, which I used freely, (it was no time for mercy!) he gave two or three plunges, and then bounded away at that dreadful leaping gallop—that pace which seemed peculiarly his own.

I tried to moderate his speed with the bridle, but found to my surprise that I had no command over him. I knew at once that something was wrong, as, with the bit I had in his mouth, I ought to have had the power to have broken his jawbone. I stooped forward to ascertain the cause; the loose curb dangling at the side of his head gave a satisfactory explanation.

He had it all his own way now; he was fairly off with me; and all I could do was to bear his head as well up as I could, to prevent him from stumbling. However, as it would have been bad policy to let him know how much he was master, I gave him an occasional touch with the spur, as if wishing him to accelerate his pace; and when he made an extra bound, I patted him on the neck, as if pleased with his performance.

A watery cloud was passing over the face of the moon, which rendered everything dim and indistinct, as we tore away down a grassy slope; the view terminating in a grove of tall trees, situated upon a rising ground. Beyond the dark outline of the trees I saw nothing.

As we neared the grove, Satan slackened his speed; this I thought he did with a view to crush me against the trunks of the trees. To prevent him from having time to do this, I struck him with the spurs, and away he went again like fury. As he burst through the trees, I flung my head forward upon his neck, to prevent myself from being swept off by the lower branches.

In doing this, the spurs accidentally came in contact with his sides. He gave one tremendous leap forward—the ground sank under his feet—the horse was thrown over his own head—I was jerked into the air—and, amid an avalanche of earth and stones, we were hurled down a perpendicular bank into the brown, swollen waters of the Clyde.

Owing to a bend in the river, the force of the current was directed against this particular spot, and had undermined it; and although strong enough to bear a man or a horse, under ordinary circumstances, yet down at once it thundered under the desperate leap of Satan. However, it did not signify, as nothing could have prevented us from surging into the water at the next bound.

A large quantity of rain had fallen in the upper part of the shire; and, in consequence, the river was full from bank to brae. I was nearly a stranger to the place; indeed, so much so, that I had supposed we were running from the river. This, combined with the suddenness of the shock, and the appearance of a turbid, rapid river—sweeping down trees, brushwood, branches, hay, corn, and straw before it, with resistless force—was so foreign to my idea of the calm, peaceful Clyde, that when I rose to the surface, I was quite bewildered, and had very serious doubts as to my own identity.

I was roused from this state of bewilderment by the snorting and splashing of the horse; he was making a bold attempt to scale the perpendicular bank. Had I been thrown into the body of the stream, I should have been swept away, and the animal must have perished; but in all heavy rapid runs of water, salt or fresh, there is what is termed an eddy stream, running close in shore, in a contrary direction to the main body of the water. I have seen Highlanders in their boats catching fish in the eddy stream of the gulf of Corrievreckin, within a short distance of the main tide, which, had it not got the slightest hold on their boat, would have swept them with fearful velocity into the jaws of the roaring gulf. I was caught by this eddy, which kept me stationary, and enabled me by a few strokes to reach the horse's side.

To cross the river, or to land here, was alike impossible; so I took the reins in my right hand, wheeled the horse from the bank, and dashed at once with him into the strength of the current. Away we went, Satan and I, in capital spirits both; not a doubt of our effecting a safe landing ever crossing my mind. And the horse evinced his certainty upon that subject, by snatching a bite out of a heap of hay that floated at his side, and eating it as composedly as if he had been in a stable.

We soon swept round the high bank that had caused our misfortune, and came to a level part of the country, which was flooded far up into the fields. I then struck strongly out in a slanting direction for the shore, and soon had the satisfaction of finding myself once more upon the green turf. Satan shook himself, pricked up his ears, and gave a low neigh. I then stroked him, and spoke kindly to him. He returned the caress by licking my hand. Poor fellow! he had contracted a friendship for me in the water—a friendship which terminated only with his life; and which was rendered the more valuable by his never extending it to another living thing.—Chambers.

OREGON.

Oregon contains a population of about 20,000, the great majority of whom are settled in the Lower Columbia, the Willamette, and the Umpqua rivers. By far the greater proportion is within the Willamette valley, between the cascade and coast range of mountains, and which valley is about one hundred and fifty miles in length, and from twenty to forty miles in width.

Portland, the first town in importance and population, containing about 1,200 souls, is situated on the west bank of the Willamette, twelve miles from its mouth. This river flows into the great Columbia on the south, about ninety miles from the Pacific. Ocean steamers and sail vessels ascend these rivers as far as Portland, and sometimes the smaller class go as far as Oregon City, twelve miles above Portland.

Oregon City, a place of about 700 inhabitants, is situated at the great falls of the Willamette, where a perpendicular fall of about forty feet affords one of the finest water powers for mills and factories in the world. About forty miles south from the latter place, upon the east bank of the Willamette, is built the town of Salem, containing about 600 souls. Here the Territorial Legislature has located the capital of Oregon, and here they held their latest session. But from a defect in the form of the location law, whereby it is claimed by some to be null and void, the Governor has refused to expend or disburse the moneys appropriated by Congress for the erection of public buildings.

The climate of Oregon is one of the finest in the world; the winter just past has been as mild and pleasant as an October in Ohio. During the winter months the prevailing winds are from the south, and often bring rain; indeed, at times it rains for weeks, almost without cessation. In the summer the winds are from the month of April till November.

Oregon, though unquestionably a healthy country, is not devoid of those intermittent fevers and agues which prevail to so great an extent in some of the Western States. There have been fewer deaths here than among an equal population in the States.

Business at the present time here is dull. The mines in the southern part of the territory are paying well, and many of the young men are going there.

Almost all the choice lands in the Willamette valley have been taken up by settlers, under the provisions of the donation land bill. The country is sparsely settled, the good lands running their lines in the worst of gerrymandering forms; in some cases a single claim extending for miles.—The distance between claimants thus being so great, a barrier to schools, good roads and social intercourse, is presented, which will render the land bill a curse, instead of a blessing to Oregon, its rapid growth, and future prosperity.

This valley, which alone is capable of supporting a dense population, and which, if divided into farms of 80 to 160 acres, in regular sectional form, would soon become a perfect garden from one extremity to the other, has been, unfortunately for the rapid growth and prosperity of the same, appropriated in large tracts among a few emigrants, who have arrived here in the early stage of this privilege. No blame can attach to the settler, for if the general government should have passed a law donating a whole township of land to each, and to be taken in any form which should suit the occupant, he would have been justified in selecting his claim along a river bank one mile in width and thirty-six miles in length, adapting the courses of his claim lines to the indentations of the river on one side, or to the nature of the soil upon the other.

The soil of this portion of Oregon is well adapted to the growth of the staple grains, and products of the North Atlantic States.—

The nights of summer are too cool for the successful cultivation of Indian corn, but for wheat, rye, oats, barley, and most vegetables and fruits of this latitude, no better lands can be found beneath the sun. And for grazing purposes, its equal cannot be found upon the whole Atlantic side of the Rocky Mountain range. Admirably adapted to the growth of the most excellent grasses, the fine undulating prairies which intersperse the great forests of Oregon, afford good pasture during the entire year.

Society in this territory is very meagre. The isolated condition of families that are living upon land claims, the smallness of the towns, the necessity of constant labor to the mechanics who are gathered in the towns, owing to the high price of living, and withal, the absence or rarity of the sine qua non of true social intercourse, the ministering angel of life's joys and embellishments, WOMAN, renders society a mere speculative, stoical automaton rule.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, AUGUST 5, 1852.

ANXIOUS TO BE NOTICED.

The Green Bay Advocate, of July 22d, has in its "items" column the following, which the publishers deemed of sufficient consequence to put the mark of a pen around, and carefully wrap up and send to us:—

"MORE PIRATING.—The pirating in Lake Michigan, Huron and Green Bay, which was so much complained of last year, still goes on. We learn that at Presque Isle, a short time since, a large quantity of fish, an anchor, seine, pier lamp, and many other valuables were taken off in the night; and other robberies have been perpetrated elsewhere on the coast. It is generally attributed to desperadoes from the Beaver Islands."

We know nothing of the editor of the Advocate beyond what appears in this article, and must decline giving him a notice by guess.

We heard of the theft at Presque Isle, some two months since; but occurring 125 miles from here, on the fishing grounds, where similar acts are every day occurrences, we did not deem it worthy of a notice. That it was attributed to desperadoes from this place, is news to us, as it doubtless will also be to the people of Presque Isle.

It is easy to attribute such acts to whomsoever you please. But the Advocate ought to know that the officers of the law have hunted out the desperadoes from this place, and that such acts of peculation originate elsewhere. The whole list of articles stolen from Presque Isle would not pay the desperadoes for a trip from here to that place. Hence when they lived here they preyed upon us nearer by.

For your benefit, Mr. Advocate, we will give you a little history of the desperadoes, though we cannot give you the personal notice you seem so anxious for.

Two years ago last April some desperadoes entered a store at this place and stole eighteen or twenty barrels of pork and lard. We have no doubt they were desperadoes from Beaver Island, for the pork and lard was found buried in the sand at the front door of one George Kauffman, resident on the backside of Whiskey Point. Kauffman has gone below Presque Isle to get a little further beyond the law than here, and possibly is no less a desperado now than then. But he does not hail from Beaver Island.

Some time last summer Peter McKinley lost several barrels of salt, the taking of which was charged on Mormon desperadoes from Beaver Island, but it turns out that one David M. Moan, a fisherman now resident on Gull Island, took and used it on the pretense that McKinley owed him, and unjustly refused to furnish him with salt.

Two years ago some desperadoes stole a boat, a lot of nets and several half barrels of fish from some fishermen at Big Sand Bay, which were never found.—But two or three weeks after the occurrence the casks were found standing in a storehouse, to which everybody had access, on the wharf, in this harbor, with all the marks on, and well filled—with lake water. When discovered the storehouse door was standing open, and both citizens and strangers going out and in ad libitem—a steamboat laying at the front. The barrels were standing with the marked head up, and the owner of the fish and the Clerk of the boat made the discovery, quite unlooked for, of course. But whether desperadoes from Beaver Island stole the property and put it in that public position, on their own premises, for the purpose of being detected, or some other desperadoes stole the property, and after emptying the barrels placed them there to get the theft laid to the Mormons, the Advocate may judge. We shall not waste an argument on it.

A year ago last April some desperadoes called on Deacon Dame at Grand Traverse Bay, and passed on him some forty or fifty dollars of counterfeit money. An account of this affair was sent by the Deacon and his friend, the Rev. Isaac Whicher, to the Chicago Tribune and published, with the statement that nothing whatever was known of the guilty parties, and no clue to their identity, or whence they hailed. This article was re-published in the New York Police Gazette.

But a short time after, when the Rev. Isaac Whicher learned that a foray was set on foot against the Mormons in real earnest, all at once he discovered that these desperadoes hailed from Beaver Island, and were personal acquaintances of his, whom he had recognized from the beginning. The boat he also recognized as that stolen at Big Sand Bay, which he had never seen.

A little after this occurrence a band of desperadoes were discovered between Mackinac and Birch Point, going up the north shore of Lake Michigan, in a long, low, black boat with three masts, and all armed with double barreled guns, revolvers and bowie knives. The fishermen chased them up into Green Bay, but failed to overhaul them.

Many thefts were committed along the shore about the time of their passing, and the boldness, the utter temerity of their movements produced universal alarm among the French, half breed and Indian fishermen. The desperadoes (supposed to be from Beaver Island) who filled this boat, filled also their dreams, and the dread of them drove them from the fishing grounds.

Some time after the long, low, black boat, with several double barreled fowling pieces, camp knives, &c., &c., as well as compasses and portfolios were found in the possession of a party of surveyors up on the north-west shore of Green Bay, surveying U. S. lands. The inference is that the brave surveyors had fallen in with the desperadoes from Beaver Island, and slaughtered them all, making their boat and armament a prize of war. But some wicked and incredulous persons have really tried to deceive the public mind with the suggestion that there were no desperadoes in the premises; that the surveyors made their entire trip in the "long, low, black boat," and that all the stealing was done among the fishermen in the usual way, and by the usual hands. Very wicked and incredulous men these are, and ought not to receive the slightest countenance in society. We suggest the propriety of delivering them over to Judge Lynch.

While these desperadoes were spreading terror along the north shore, another band appeared among the Islands that stretch across the entrance of Green Bay, stealing nets, flour, fish, salt, &c.; indeed, almost anything they could lay their hands on.

Among other operations, they took a boat from Capt. —, with oars, sails and everything aboard. The 18th of May the Capt. discovered his boat well manned, passing the head of Beaver Island, and the day after a government employee resident at Mackinac saw boat and crew in Little Traverse Bay, and distinctly recognized J. T. and I. Pierce, from Beaver Island, among the crew.

Like a true and law abiding man, Capt. — went before Judge Greig, who was then holding Court in Mackinac, and made his complaint on oath, identifying the same J. T. and I. Pierce among the crew.

Capt. — was a lucky man. Just four weeks from the day his boat was stolen, it drifted back, with sails, oars, compass and all aboard just as he had left it.—The lunch that he had taken with him, was yet lying in the same spot, sundried, and the bit of newspaper wrapped around it pattered to pieces with the rain that had fallen, and the bottom of the boat a little bruised and worn by beating on a rocky shore.

The same wicked and incredulous persons suggested in this case that possibly the boat had floated off by a little rise of the water, and fortunately lodged on some shore nearly in the narrow channels of that vicinity, and returned by the fortune of favorable wind and high water. These wicked persons even went so far as to say they could prove that I. Pierce was at Nauvoo, in the State of Illinois, and J. T. Pierce near Potosi, in Wisconsin, at the same time that the Capt. and the government employee pretended to have seen them at the head of Beaver and at Little Traverse; and finally that the government employee was not at Little Traverse nor within twenty miles of there at the time he pretended to have seen them there, nor for a month before or after.

Now, Mr. Advocate, all this puzzles us, and we are not far from a lurking suspicion that Master Humbug, Master Bugbear, and Master Blarney, surnamed the Light Fingered, were the only desperadoes engaged in these piracies.

But there is one little incident connected with this history which we are quite satisfied that several other persons were engaged in. There is a cooper on the Island of Saint Martin, from whose lips we have the history, and we write it in kindness to the Advocate. This cooper (we have forgotten his name, but he carries on the only shop on Saint Martin, and is known to all the fishermen in that country,) says he was living last summer on another Island, a little further north, where numerous thefts were committed within a very few days, all supposed to be the work of desperadoes from Beaver Island.

One night seven of the gang came into his cabin, but fortunately he awoke, and they decamped, but not till after a short struggle, during which he identified a portion of them as his near neighbors. The next day there was a turn-out of the neighborhood to search for the goods recently stolen, and a large quantity of stolen nets, &c., were found in the hands of desperadoes from the SUMMER ISLANDS. Several decamped before officers of the law could come one hundred miles to prosecute and punish the guilty.

Among the persons figuring in these transactions, was one person whose name was once quite familiar on the fishing grounds about the Middle Channel and Thessalon. There is a very snug little bay up there, called after him, "Pirate Harbor," where he practiced gathering and repacking fish which were caught ready salted, long before Beaver Island had an inhabitant. There he had the advantage of a national boundary to dodge over, and all legal power on both sides hundreds of miles away. But he ought to be thankful to you, Mr. Advocate, that now he can pirate ad libitem, and unless caught in the act it will all be laid to desperadoes from Beaver Island.

Would it not be well, in case a street lamp, a plow, or any article of old iron should be missed from the streets of Green Bay, to lay it to the account of desperadoes from Beaver Island? Establish that rule, and any of your neighbors can steal with impunity. Nobody ought to suspect them, when there were plenty of desperadoes 100 or 200 miles off to whom so sound a man as you thought fit to charge it. We think the thieves themselves could afford to make up a purse for you, or present you a set of plate, for one of your very best articles showing that desperadoes from Beaver Island are more likely to go to Presque Isle to steal old lamps, old nets and old iron than is some vagabonds in the neighborhood to lay them by. We have a mass of material similar to the foregoing, which we will be happy to furnish you for so useful a purpose. Vive le humbug, Advocate forever.—We give you our vote for Chief of Police.

ROUGH NOTES.

The very polite editor of this Daily, issued from the Buffalo press, has sent us a number containing important information to the people in this region, which we handed to the compositors for this No. But the inside forms were nearly closed, and we unwillingly defer it till next week.

Notwithstanding the politeness of the Rough Notes, he is some times in too much hurry to be perfect in the details. The paper intended for our August Sovereign was addressed, "James J. Strang, Mormon King, by God, sir." He evidently intended to have said, "by grace of God, sir." A leading editor in the party which has "all the decency and all the virtue," would not be profane. To entertain such a suspicion is uncharitable.

SPECK OF WAR.

A most serious difficulty has sprung up between the United States and Great Britain, concerning American fishing on the Banks about New Foundland.—The British have fitted out armed vessels to drive off and seize American vessels, where they have usually fished without molestation.

The difficulty, though serious, and involving valuable rights and privileges, will doubtless be adjusted by negotiation.

LAW AND ORDER.

Throughout California, bands of REGULATORS roam about, hanging and robbing whomsoever they will, on the pretense that law and the courts are not sufficiently prompt and reliable. The courts are despised.

On the Rio Grande frontier, numerous bands of robbers roam about subsisting by plunder; and neither Mexican or American authority is sufficient to suppress them.

The Schooner Dolphin, owned in this place, which went ashore on Patmos in May, has been got off, and will soon be in the trade again. She is not materially injured, and will be quite as good a sailer as ever.

We have seen a letter from Chicago, saying that information has reached there that Brigham Young has left Salt Lake with a strong guard, and an immense amount of treasure. His destination is said to be California. We know nothing as to the reliability of the information.

But Brigham is decidedly a corrupt man, as well as a coward; and we doubt not, is capable of such treachery to his followers. By his folly and wickedness he has blown up a storm that he cannot ride out. He cannot find a resting place in California.

LARGE PLATES OF GLASS.

The large glass now so common in the show windows of stores constitute one of the most costly as well as beautiful of ornaments. These immense panes are made in France, and the process of their manufacture is thus described by the New Mirror:

The large plates are cast.—They come from the mould rough, and they must be polished.—What a work! It seems an impossible one. But no—fasten down the plate upon a firm table, and go to work just as the marble men do with their slabs; draw the heavy polisher backward and forward, hour after hour, with inexhaustible patience, and the sharp friction after a while prevails. As the work advances, finer and finer polishing powders are used, until at length you find the workmen engaged with soft rolls of cotton fabric, wet with some nice polished mixture, which gives the highest perfection of surface.

It is not strange that these plates should cost something.—Perhaps few are aware how fast the price rises with increase of size. Those large plates which are occasionally seen in shop windows, as in Stewart's great marble store, are thought a little noticeable indeed, but how few know what one of them cost.—We do not know how much Mr. Stewart paid for this, but we know that such plates range at frightful prices—three, four, and five hundred dollars! We think that one importer in this city has plates for sale, which are as high as eight hundred dollars.

Now these are great prices for a single pane of glass. The glass is thick, indeed, but after all, it is fragile. What a chance for damage on a large scale! How much mischief a careless boy may do in a moment. We saw a costly pane yesterday, which had been cracked by the warping of the window frame.

Mirrors have attained a monstrous size. Ten feet is now an extra length; twelve is often attained. When the plates reach these great lengths, a little increase in width adds astonishingly to the price. A large mirror is so beautiful a thing, that we can hardly have the heart to reproach a man for buying it, who has the means. It is durable, and always useful. It fulfills that oft-quoted desire of Burns—"to see ourselves as others see."

THE EFFECT OF THE CALIFORNIA AND AUSTRALIA GOLD DISCOVERIES ON THE CURRENCY AND VALUE OF PROPERTY.

The considerations which, three years ago, were almost derided as to the probable effects of the increased supply of gold, are now assuming a preponderance over all other subjects. The anxious pause of curiosity is latent, but it is nevertheless felt by every one, and it is easy to understand why it has not hitherto been more decidedly expressed. The land owners do not care to avow the full extent of their hopes, and to stimulate a cry from the annuitant class for preventive meddling. That class on the other hand, together with the much larger body who dislike everything that upsets routine and necessitates thought, endeavor to persuade themselves into indifference. Their original disbelief having been forcibly overcome, they seek new refuge in the conclusion that fresh uses for the precious metals will prevent any alteration in value. The remaining class, consisting of ordinary men of business, who are not affected by the bias of either the landlords or the annuitants, hesitate to discuss a subject which they have no time to work out, and on which, nevertheless they are expected to be perfectly clear. Under these circumstances, although it may involve a repetition of former statements, it will be useful to review once more the general bearings of the whole question.

To arrive at an exact solution it would be necessary to ascertain the amount of gold and silver in the world, and the present annual consumption for coinage and the arts. This is impossible, and conjectural quantities must consequently be taken. The total of coin has been guessed at £100,000,000. Of this £450,000,000 may be assumed to be gold, and £250,000,000 silver. The annual consumption of gold is believed to be under £6,000,000.

Starting with these figures, if the demand for gold were likely to continue limited to its ordinary amount, an estimate of the effect of the surprise now pouring upon us could easily be formed. Those supplies within the few years since the discovery of California have probably in the aggregate left us an excess of upwards of £30,000,000 over what has hitherto been sufficient for current wants, and to maintain an equilibrium in the general relations of property. The increase therefore, has been equal to twenty per cent on the whole sum in existence; in other words, the measure of the value would appear to have been extended one-fifth (just as if a twenty-five inch measure were extended to thirty inches), and hence the effect to be looked for is obvious. Where gold is the standard, the price of every article adjusts itself to the relation it bears to that metal. If sovereigns were twice as numerous, a man would demand two where he now takes one. An increase of twenty per cent in the supply should, therefore, have been followed by a proportionate advance in the nominal value of all things.

But signs are wanting of any such general advance. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire—first, whether any absolute test is available by which the change can be shown to have taken place in some one instance, although it may have been counteracted in others; and next, if this be impossible, whether the apparent anomaly can be explained on different grounds.

The most direct test would be sought in the price of silver, next to gold, having hitherto been the least liable to variation. But it was long ago pointed out that in those countries where gold and silver constituted equally a legal tender, one metal, as it became more abundant, would displace the other, and that the surplus of gold would thus be reduced, and a large amount of disengaged silver be thrown upon the bullion market in its stead. Previous to the Californian discoveries, silver was the circulating medium, in both France and the United States, because since the periods when the periods when double standard was fixed in those countries, it had increased rather more rapidly than gold, all persons having payments to make selected it, therefore, as the best medium. Its relative cheapness in France, however, as compared with gold, was less than two per cent, while in America it was merely fractional. When the California supplies came forward, the difference soon disappeared, and silver would have become relatively much the dearest but for the displacement which then, of course, occurred. When 100 francs in gold, instead of being worth 120 francs in silver, fell in value to a fraction below 100 francs in the latter metal, it became forthwith more profitable to make payments in gold, and to sell silver at the market price for exportation. In this way a large infusion of gold took place in France, while in the United States it absolutely became the most common circulating medium. Thus, the effect of the new supplies of gold has not been limited to that metal, but has been diffused over gold and silver, and hence, instead of being equal to twenty per cent which would have been the case if the £150,000,000 of gold had alone been in question, it has been only seven and a half per cent, from being spread over the entire £100,000,000 of gold and silver.

By a recognition of this fact, all surprise at the absence of any very striking disturbances up to the present time is removed. There is quite enough to warrant the assumption that an influence operating on one side to the extent of seven and a half per cent has been partially rendered imperceptible by the force of circumstances in an opposite direction. In the first place there have been the effects of increased production from free trade and free navigation, the latter of which, combined with railroads, have caused a large amount of goods that would otherwise have been in store or in transit to find its way to market. Next, it is impossible to estimate what may have been the extent of hoarding in Germany and Italy; and, lastly, there remains to be taken into account the uniform tendency to a fall in prices consequent upon the march of invention and the simplification of labor.

We have now, however, to consider the future. So long as there is any silver, to be supplanted in countries where, owing to the existence of a double standard, it is optional for the debtor to pay either in gold or in silver, the effects of the increased production will continue to be extended to both metals, and consequently, if the surplus of gold this year should be, as has been estimated, £5,000,000, its influence on prices could be but six of seven per cent. But the period must rapidly approach when the displacement of silver will have ended, and when the changes brought about will be upon gold alone. In France the existing amount of silver is still doubtless very large, but this is not the case in the United States, and the proposed law by which the coins below a dollar are to be deteriorated 6.91 per cent will prevent for the present any action upon that portion of the stock. In Germany the de-based state of the silver coinage will likewise for a long time preserve it from displacement. In Holland silver has been already established as a standard, and cannot therefore be driven out. With regard to Eastern nations it is difficult to form any estimate. On the whole, however, we may infer the possibility of the displacement process still occupying three or four years, and that during that time, therefore, the effects to be produced will be spread, as they have thus far been, over both metals.

At the end of that period the consequences will be felt by gold alone, and the relations of property measures by a gold standard, will proportionably exhibit a more rapid disturbance. At the same time it must not be overlooked that the increase of gold each year will have meanwhile diminished the per centage of alteration which would otherwise take place.

For instance, the total amount of gold in the world, which is now assumed at £150,000,000, would then possibly be £250,000,000, and a production which, operating upon the first sum, would cause a rise in prices of ten per cent, would, under those circumstances, cause only an additional rise of six per cent. This is a feature of great importance in the whole question, because it will constantly tend to counteract that increasing ratio of disturbance which might be anticipated, if the supply of each succeeding year should prove larger and larger. It is likewise to be borne in mind that, with a diminution in the purchasing power of gold, there will be a proportionate diminution in the inducement to seek it. If the quantity of gold were doubled to-morrow, a man who is at present content to work for one ounce a week, would then not be satisfied with less than two ounces.

In fact, however, of these qualifying circumstances, and of the uncertainty of all the assumed totals that have been dealt with, it will be plain to most persons that there is enough to suggest some very decided ideas as to the main results that are coming on. A mistake of a hundred millions in the figures, one way or the other, would only make a difference of three or four years (where the annual supply is at the rate of £30,000,000) in the date of fulfilment. Even if we were to take the whole £100,000,000 of assumed money as liable to be acted upon, it would require little more than fifteen years of the existing production to cause an alteration in the relations of property, of fifty per cent.

But it is urged that the extraordinary impulse given to trade and luxury by these discoveries, and the greater prosperity of the whole world, will cause an increased demand for coin for circulation, and a vast consumption both of gold and silver in manufactures and the arts. It is difficult to see how these conclusions are arrived at. In California and Oregon new communities have risen up, numbering two or three hundred thousand souls, among whom commerce has shown an activity never before witnessed, and yet a few millions of bullion have sufficed to establish an abundant circulation, although all the means of economizing it which are usual in older States have yet to be introduced. We have here, therefore a specimen of the demand that would be created even by the founding of the mightiest societies, while as regards more settled countries, it is certainly a mistake to suppose that the requirements for coin to increase with the growth of commercial intelligence. Where a German peasant would hoard a few dollars, an Englishman would put the like amount into a savings bank; and in the same manner even our pettiest tradesmen, instead of keeping money in a safe, resort now universally to some establishment that affords them the convenience of a drawing account. Cheques, bills of exchange, postage stamps, clearing houses, circular notes, money orders, railroad and steamboat season tickets—all show the rapid tendency of civilization to supersede the necessity of a constant hoard of the precious metals; and it may even be questioned whether, with the growth of morality and detective skill, the danger of forgery, which was the sole objection to notes below £5, has not also disappeared.

As regards an increased consumption in the arts, owing to an abundant supply, the very form of the supposition assumes a large alteration in value to have previously taken place. A reduction of five or ten per cent in such things as gold and silver would make little difference in the number of purchases of wrought articles, in which, after all, the manipulation constitutes one of the chief elements of expense. It is moreover, against all experience to suppose that a large demand would be coincident with a falling market.—With a possibility of gold and silver steadily declining in value, people would be much more likely to diminish than to increase their purchases. This ground of calculation seems, therefore, to have no better foundation than the other. Any increase of consumption that may possibly take place is consequently likely to be altogether of an unimportant kind as regards the great question at issue, and even if anything of the sort should be observable, it will probably be more owing to electro-plating than to anything else—an invention which, it was first thought, would lessen the demand, but which has increased it by superseding all inferior materials.—London Times.

LIFE'S SEASON.

There is a spring-time of the heart—
'Tis found in infancy—
When on its mother's breast the babe
First smiles in dimpled glee:
When, like the bud upon the stem,
Its life is but begun,
And pearly tear-drops flee the eyes,
As shadows flee the sun.

There is a summer of the heart—
'Tis found in early youth—
When life is full of joyousness,
Of innocence and truth:
When clouds but seldom intervene
To mar the sky so bright,
And all is but a fairy scene
Of exquisite delight!

There is an autumn of the heart—
'Tis found of riper age—
When sorrow's a familiar thing,
And grief a heritage:
When shadows thick and dark come o'er
The beauty of the sky,
And by their dim obscurity
Foretell some danger nigh!

There is a winter of the heart—
'Tis found in later years—
When life is full of bitterness,
Of vain, regretful tears;
When stormy winds and chilling blasts
Blow with so fierce a breath,
That we would fain seek shelter in
The anchorage of death!

When'er the autumn of the heart
Shall cloud our lives with gloom,
And winter's cold and chilling blasts
Remind us of the tomb:
Let us but act our parts aright
On time's uncertain shore,
Our souls will know in purer climes
A summer evermore.

ON ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

WHEN we offer up our petitions to our Heavenly Father, we may expect to be heard if we ask in faith. As the Lord says, Mark xi. 24, "what things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." This plain declaration of our Lord may be received as sufficient testimony to establish this fact, that God will hear and answer prayer.

But not forgetting that we are to offer up our prayers in faith as he says, "believe that ye receive them, and ye shall receive them." And as he also says Matt. xxi. 32, "and all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing ye shall receive." Observe, he says: "whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing." And so the promise is not without believing.

And the apostle James says of him who wavers when asking: "let not that man think that he shall receive anything from the Lord." If he that doubts or wavers is not to receive, surely he that disbelieves, and denies, may not expect to receive. And so it is, when men disbelieve and deny the possibility of receiving favors from heaven, they do not ask for them in faith nothing wavering. But they reject them; and use their influence to hinder others from receiving them.

If we inquire what favors they are, that we may receive by asking for them in faith nothing wavering, the Lord says in the first verse quoted: "what things soever ye desire when ye pray." And in the other: "all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing." And we have no right to limit the Lord in his plan of dealing favors to men. Neither have we any right to deny facts, or make assertions calculated if possible to cause others to waver from an unshaken faith, and thereby hinder their blessings. Whatsoever a man may find to be his privilege with his God, we have no right to dishearten him, or to hinder his faith through unbelief.

"Why could we not cast him out," said the disciples to the Lord on a certain occasion; and he answered them, "because of your unbelief." See Matt. xvii. 19, 20. Now they were not so established in their own opinion, as to deny the faith he taught, and he went on to teach them saying: "for verily I say unto you, if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, remove to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible to you." Observe he says, "and nothing shall be impossible to you."

Here, again he makes the promise unlimited, as also in two other cases. In the first he says: what things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall receive them. And in the other: "all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing ye shall receive," and in this: "and nothing shall be impossible to you." This is the Lord's teaching, and if we reject his teaching, it is to receive the unbelieving notions of men who do away the teachings and promises of the Lord, through their unbelief.

But after all that men can say, it is the Lord's promise, and as to the faith, it was the Lord that taught it; and if we reject it, we reject his teachings. Now let the Lord be true, and let his teachings be for our belief, and then we cannot deny the faith because the Lord taught it; and we cannot disbelieve the promise because it is the Lord's own word; for we cannot reject the Lord's teaching, or disbelieve his words. And if we cannot deny the faith or disbelieve the promise, we must confess that it is nothing but unbelief that hinders men from enjoying the same privileges now, that the ancient saints enjoyed. For we find that those privileges have not been sought in faith nothing wavering, but rather have been disbelieved, and denied.

The promise is too plain to be misunderstood; and if we put it to the test, we shall find that it is of the Lord. If we prove the promise, and find that it is of the Lord; for if it is of the Lord it is truth. "And all things whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." For this is the promise; and if we prove it and find that we do receive all things whatsoever we ask in prayer, believing, then we find that we have the same privileges that the ancient saints enjoyed; that we have the glorious privilege of receiving communications from heaven; and knowing the truth of our holy religion; of knowing God and things of eternity. This doctrine so confidentially received by the ancient saints, and upon which rests all the certainty of the truth of our holy religion, is a glorious truth.

C. BIDDLECOME.

THE ARMIES OF EUROPE.—A London paper says that it has good authority for the statement that in 1851 there were not less than 2,773,883 men under arms in Europe as regular soldiers. And if to this number be added the corps of volunteers, &c., the aggregate would swell up to 3,000,000—the population of Europe was then estimated at 227,403,000. According to the usual ratio of calculation, one person out of every twenty of the adult and able male population of Europe was at that time a soldier. Besides this immense army, there was an aggregate fleet of 3,763 vessels, carrying 44,105 guns, and manned by at least 150,000 seamen. Never, since the commencement of the peace movement, did the face of Europe present so belligerent an appearance.

JEWISH APOSTACY.

When the Jewish church were in a state of apostacy, and were about to be broken off because of their unbelief, (as is the condition of the Gentiles,) they supposed themselves to be a wise people, to have great understanding in spiritual things; and therefore they could not receive the light that came immediately from heaven, because they were too much blinded by their own superstition and bigotry, having all confidence in the imagined light and wisdom of their age and nation. But instead of so great light and wisdom as they imagined, how dark and benighted was their minds while they received not a ray of light from heaven to interrupt their darkness!

They were called blind pharisees, and their leaders "blind leaders of the blind." Indeed, nothing was now wanting to render impossible their escape from this dilemma, but an established opinion that there could be no revelations from heaven in their days. They erred from the truth because they were not dictated by the spirit of truth, but formed opinions of their own according to the depravity of the human heart; and disagreeing in their opinions, they split into sects and parties: but still supposed themselves to be an enlightened people, that they had a perfect knowledge of their scriptures, and that their scriptures were sufficient for their instructions. Yet they did not understand their scriptures, because they had not the teaching of the holy Spirit. Their scriptures had taught them "that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and, out of the town of Bethlehem where David was," John's gospel 7. 21, therefore they rejected him that came out of Gallilee. For they stumbled at the stumbling stone because there was no light in themselves, for where there is no light from heaven, the darkness is total. And although the Lord sent them apostles, evangelists, prophets, and teachers, men inspired of God, yet, this people knowing that they received no revelations from heaven, immediately to themselves, and disbelieving others who did, might have concluded like the present day Gentiles, that there was no revelations from heaven in their days.

SOLD, AT HALF PRICE.

A shop-keeper in a small town in Massachusetts one day marked some handkerchiefs in his window with the tempting words—"Selling at half price!" Shortly after, a lady who had traded with him before entered his establishment, and having examined the handkerchiefs, inquired the price. "Fifty cents a piece," politely replied the shopkeeper. "Very well" said the lady, "you may do me up a dozen." The handkerchiefs were cut off and delivered to the lady, who gave the shopkeeper a three dollar bill. "Beg pardon, ma'am but I—ah—told the handkerchiefs were fifty cents a piece—that is—ah—six dollars per dozen." "To be sure, sir. I understand as much arithmetic as that. Six dollars is the price; half of six is three—that is, half price. I think they are cheap enough. Good day, sir." The lady shut the door. The shopkeeper opened his eyes. For five minutes he stood still as a stump, gazing vacantly at the window; then biting his lips and coloring very red, he gently removed the card pinned to the handkerchiefs, and resolved to announce no more goods "selling at half price."

FALL OF CAPE DIAMOND.

Another portion of Cape Diamond rock, Quebec, has given way, and we regret to say that several houses were destroyed, and nine persons killed. There were three distinct falls; one at 4 o'clock, killing eight persons; another at 7, killing one; and still another, without loss of life, however. This is the third fall within a very few years, yet persons will continue to build and occupy houses immediately under the dangerous portions, notwithstanding the warnings they have received.—Ec.

RHEUMATISM.

The Indians on the Western coast of North America are very successful in their treatment of this disease. When it has been recently contracted, they cure it by immersing the patient thro' a hole in the ice, where he undergoes a friction of the shoulders, back and loins; the temperature being sometimes so severe that the water congeals on the upper parts of his body. He is then wrapt in a blanket, placed before a good fire, and soon feels a warm glow throughout his whole system. The repetition of the process generally effects a radical cure. Chronic rheumatism, where the patient is advanced in life, is treated in a different manner.—He is placed in a hut of deer skins, shaped like a bee hive, about four feet high and three feet broad. Some hot stones are then introduced, and water thrown upon them, and the entrance being quickly closed, the patient is almost suffocated by the heat and steam. When taken out, in a state of profuse perspiration, he is covered with blankets, and conveyed to bed. This operation greatly alleviates the complaint.

CHARACTER.

A misstep may destroy life.—One sin may ruin your character. Did you ever reflect on the consequences of a single indulgence in vice? The best men have fallen, through the suggestion of another. How careful you should be while in the freshness of your days, lest a blight fall on your character, and ruin you forever. If invited to places of resort, where it is difficult to decide, take the safe course, stay away, and save your reputation. This is a jewel of inestimable value—too precious to be put in jeopardy. No man ever regrets that he kept aloof from temptation, and to the close of life he expresses his joy that he was saved from the path of shame, by giving a decided negative, when the voice of pleasure beckoned him on.—Be decided, and you are safe.—Yield, and you may be lost.—Watch with diligence, and guard every avenue through which sin may reach you. In no other way will you be sure to overcome the evil of the world.

CURIOSITY.

A letter to the Hon. Truman Smith from the Lake Superior mines says—"We have put in the box a piece of wood or of a skid that was twenty feet under the surface of the earth, and a mass of copper resting thereon, mine-out of the vein, weighing five tons and 1,54 pounds. Every particle of the rock was hammered off from it, and immediately about the mass were found two copper tools that showed copper to have been welded and hardened.—A large number of hammers made from stone, were lying around it, and also coal and ashes to all appearance, as fresh as though they had been made last year. Vegetable soil to the depth of four or six feet, overlaid the whole, on which and immediately over this mass of copper, was standing a tree which proved on being cut down, to be over five hundred years old."

—Ec. We saw at the Washington Hotel yesterday, a most singular specimen of a double human being, much more curious and interesting than the far famed Siamese twins. The latter are united by a ligament in front—the singular little creatures we saw yesterday are firmly and indissolubly connected by a common rear. In all other respects they are separately and distinctly organized. These negro children were born in Columbus county, North Carolina, and are about twelve months old. They have happy faces which strongly resemble each other, and are healthy and sprightly. The mother, who accompanies them, is a very large woman.

MORALITY.—This is a very moral city, but rather Turkish. I know several gentlemen, who are not Mormons, that carry into practical evidence their belief in a plurality of wives. I think some of them, who now hold high heads in this town, would feel a little "down in the mouth," were their moral perfections mirrored forth to the gaze of those whom they have sworn to "love, cherish, and protect." The mysteries of St. Louis are not half written, but they shall be! I have a duty to perform, and will do it or die. I have seen enough, learned enough, to convince me that more depravity in high life exists here than in any other city in the Union.—Baltimore.

JOHN C. RIVES says:—"I have seen the manuscript writings of most of the great men of this country during the last twenty years, and I may safely say, that no twenty of them could stand the test of scrutiny of one half the journeyman printers employed in my office."

True hope is based on energy of character. A strong mind always hopes, and has always cause to hope, because it knows the mutability of human affairs, and how slight a circumstance may change the whole course of events. Such a spirit, rests upon itself; it is not confined to partial views or to one particular object. And if, at last all should be lost, it has saved itself—its own integrity and worth.

The Eastern Steamship Navigation Company of London have proposed a plan to their shareholders of building two steamers, 700 feet long, and 14,000 tons burthen, each vessel to have two sets of paddle wheels, and a screw propeller of an aggregate of 3,000 horse power. These vessels are to run from Milford Haven to Alexandria, and from Suez to Calcutta. These ships it is expected will go at the rate of 20 miles an hour, and are to cost $1,750,000.—Ec. Paper.

The Deficiency Appropriation Bill as now before the Senate, contains appropriations to the amount of $5,000,000. As it went to the House from the Senate, it amounted to $3,000,000. The following are some of the additions; for interest on a State Chukotaw claim, $872,000; for extra clerks, $70,000; Mexican Boundary Commission, $80,000; contingent expenses of the Senate, $137,000; books and printing, $49,000; Collins steamers, $236,000; extraordinary expenses of Courts, &c., for sending colored men into Slavery, Filibusters' trials, &c., $90,000; Custom Houses, 300,000.

An Irishman, who was very near-sighted, being about to fight a duel, insisted that he should stand six paces nearer his antagonist, than the other did to him and that they were to fire at the same time. This beats Sheridan's telling a fat man who was going to fight a thin one, that the latter's slim figure ought to be chalked on the other's portly person and if the bullet hit him outside of the mark, it was to go for nothing.

The most western point of the Pictured Rocks rises suddenly into a high wall of sandstone, with no strikingly interesting feature for a short distance, until soon, the rocks become more regular at their base from the action of the waters, wearing them into low columns and oven-like arches, into some of which we ran our boat and examined the perforations made by the waves. At the top of one of these vaulted roofs we discovered a party of swallows which had taken up their residence in these cavities, where they are undisturbed in calm weather, and during low water they have a safe abode. The waves of the lake were breaking slowly but heavily against the shore, the effects of a recent storm, as the equilibrium of this great body of fresh water was not quite restored after a severe agitation.

The whole extent of this high wall of rocks from one abrupt termination to the other, is twelve miles with only four landing places which are each about three miles apart, affording the only security to boats in a storm, while the intermediate spaces are bold and precipitous, against which it is certain destruction to be driven.

The Indians, aware of this danger, while making their coasting tours, provide themselves with a variety of offerings to propitiate the Great Spirit, such as rice, tobacco, and bright colored cloth; these they roll together carefully and deposit upon the surface of the water, below the emblems or image stones of their deity, which are arranged singly or in small heaps at intervals upon the top of this great wall.

An imagination which a poet would scorn for its dull flights of fancy, is quite sufficient to enable one to discern at a glance the picturesqueness of these rocks, and to define a variety of forms in the changing outlines which constantly succeed each as the boat passes beneath them.

Huge round towers; castellated walls falling into ruins; vertical columns; antique urns or drinking cups of a size such as the Scandinavian deity might be supposed to have drank the sea from; a couching lion with one enormous paw extended into the lake; pillars and statuary interspersed among the trees; Giant Despair from his castle walls surveying his premises, and overlooking the broad lake; beautiful and innumerable cascades gushing out of the bare rocks here and there foaming and leaping over their sides.

To all these striking forms, fancy may add much that is more poetical and romantic, while the brilliant coloring upon the perpendicular cliffs one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet high, attracts the attention of the beholder with quite as much surprise. It is from this peculiarity that the term Pictured Rocks is derived, and it is said that early travelers were more impressed by this than by the peculiar formation of the walls. These colors appear in vertical stripes, extending from the waters' edge to about one third of the height of the walls, and are in regular shades, brown, orange, green and grey predominating, while one portion of the rocks is covered with black lines, as in mezzotint engravings.

Nothing can surpass the wonderful brilliancy of these hues in a clear sunlight, as from the constant trickling of the water over their surface they are always fresh, much resembling the touches of fine oil paints on canvas; if however a long drought exhausts the usual supply of moisture, these colors fade, and it is supposed by some that they would finally disappear.

Foster and Whitney in their late report on the geological character of these rocks, thus account for the variety of these vivid colors:—

"Between the bands or strata of thick bedded sandstone, there are thin seams of shaly materials which are more or less charged with the metallic oxides, iron largely predominating, with here and there a trace of copper. As the surface water permeates through the porous strata, it comes in contact with these shaly bands, and oozing out from the exposed edges, trickles down the face of the cliffs, and leaves behind a sediment, colored according to the oxide which is contained in the band in which it originated. It cannot however be denied that there are some peculiarities which it is difficult to explain by any hypothesis."

Five miles from our starting point, we reached a small shallow stream called Miners river. Here the wall of rock suddenly terminates to give place to a low level sand beach, half a mile in length, which forms the first landing place or harbor. Here we left our boat and strolled over the pebbly shore, amusing ourselves with picking the bright red berry of the wintergreen, which grows here in great profusion. Nothing animated in nature greeted us, but an occasional butterfly or gnat, though we were encouraged by the tracks of deer and bear to hope that one or the other were not far off, but we were obliged to depart without the satisfaction of seeing anything more tangible than their foot prints on the sands. The cliffs commencing from this new point assume a more regularly elevated form, being on an average one hundred and seventy-five feet in height.

Detached masses of a very large size lie scattered about the shore in admirable confusion, and it would seem that avalanches of rock, earth and trees are not infrequent, some which we passed appearing to have recently fallen, the foliage on the broken and uprooted birch trees being still fresh and green.

Sail Rock is the name given to one of these triangular shaped masses, from the resemblance in its form to the sail of a vessel making for port.

Three miles beyond Miners river, the rocks again terminate in a sand beach, which forms the second harbor, a wild, romantic spot with a deep forest in the back ground, a never to be forgotten locality for musquitos and sand flies.

Rising more gradually the cliffs present a ledge or pathway around their base which can be followed for some distance, nearly to a great arch, fifty feet high, which we were at first led to believe was the Grand Portal, but which after a comparison with the true Arched Rock, sank into insignificance. The base of the wall here seemed to be a coarse conglomerate contained in irregular, wavy strata for some distance.

And now having reached the most interesting prominent points of this rocky range, we may first notice the general aspect of the wall here, which is so bold and perpendicular, that no trees or shrubs of any considerable size are visible, except a fringe of firs upon its summit; mosses however fill up the interstices upon its sides and light trailing plants form a delicate veil, through which peep at intervals bright blue and purple bell-shaped blossoms.

On high overhanging cliffs again occur the vivid green shades, which are not generally as predominant as those of the other mentioned colors: and here are seen the most rare engravings of the black and grey oxyds, to be met with in the entire range, strongly resembling the hieroglyphics of the Indians, to whom they are doubtless full of meaning, and may represent to them the will of their Manitou, whose residence is within half a mile of these cabalistic characters.

The action of the waves against this bluff wall is plainly visible in the numerous grand arches they have formed in dashing and rebounding here for centuries.—Several of a very large size occur before reaching the Grand Portal—two of which well represent the enormous gateways of a castle wall.

Sail Rock, which we have previously mentioned, lies off this part of the shore.

Manitou's Wigwam is divided into three apartments, which form an ample abode for the Great Spirit, and has three entrances or portals, the principal and largest of which opens towards the north; through this great door we passed, and seated in our boat, surveyed the magnificent dome over our heads.

It is impossible to give in such a description—a perfect idea of this wonder in nature.

A vast chamber, with a vaulted roof one hundred feet high, has on either side another apartment, separated from it by low columns, between which there is space sufficient to run a Mackinac boat were it not for the loose rocks which having fallen from the roof obstruct the passage during low water; we were able, however, to pass out into the east chamber, and from that point we obtained a view of the lake through the west arch or doorway, looking from end to end of the three arches. In the rear of the great central apartment is a broad bed of detritus and large fragmentary rocks, on which we landed and collected specimens of the sandstone and conglomerate, some of which were very curious.

Above this elevated bed of detritus, arches within arches are to be seen separated by beautifully formed pillars, and into some of them a man might easily crawl, and make his way through the entire suite but for the danger from the dashing of the waves which reverberated through them like the muttering of thunder.

A feeling of awe possesses one in listening to the sounds produced by the elements within and around this cave; the light patterings of water constantly dripping from the vaulted roof; the low murmur of the wind through the hollow arches; the intermediate rumblings of pent up waves within the walls, and the hoarse thunder of the lake around the huge cavern; all are distinctly heard, as though each by itself were performing a separate part in one grand symphony, without the least confusion or interruption in the complete harmony. Added to this is the effect produced by the grandeur of the triple arch, which may be compared to the form of a cross; the cathedral-like columns supporting the walls of the two transepts; the ample rounded dome of light yellow sandstone, stained by the constantly falling waters; the varied light through the three portals, and the deep emerald color of the lake without.

From the eastern portal there is a fine view of the rocks which curve towards the south from this point, and are much less worn away by the waters.

Leaving Manitou's cave to solitude and the elements, we rowed on to Beaver or Chapel River, the third landing place. The mouth of this river or cascade is wide and beautiful as it falls over a rocky ledge into the lake. The first name is given it from the Beavers, who build their habitations on its banks; the last, from the Grand Chapel, a lone square rock, a few feet to the left of its mouth, having the appearance at a distance of a table monument or tomb with a small door in the front wall.

The ascent from the lake is steep and difficult, but the uniqueness of the formation repays for the trouble of mounting to the interior. When there, you are at once struck with the resemblance to a chapel; the apartment being according to accurate measurement forty feet square and the same in height, with a heavy roof twenty feet thick, supported by four huge columns; there is one large window in front, a door on each side, and two reading desks appropriately arranged for the convenience of a speaker.

Foster remarks, "It is hardly possible to describe the singular and unique effect of this extraordinary structure; it is truly a temple of nature—an house not made with hands."

This is the last feature of importance to be noticed with the exception of the cascade which is near the end of the rocks, and dashes out so boldly into the lakes as to allow a boat to pass between it and the shore; it must be nearly one hundred feet high, and pours down in a narrow stream as if from a spout, presenting a beautiful appearance in the sun, which at certain hours form a rainbow in the spray and surf.—L. S. Journal.

ELECTRICITY IN WHALING.

We learned from the New Bedford Mercury that Mr. Heiniken has recently received intelligence from Bremen, which is of much interest, relating to the success of his invention for stunning whales by electricity, as practically tested on board the Bremen whaleship Averick Heiniken, Captain Georken. In a letter dated New Zealand, December 13, 1851, Captain G. writes:—

"The first experiment we made with the new invention was upon a shark, applying the electricity from the machine with one magnet. The fish, after being struck, instantly turned over on its side, and after we had poured in upon him a stream of electricity for a few moments by turning the handle of the machine, the shark became stiff as a piece of wood. We next fell in with a blackfish. As soon as the whale-iron was thrown into him, and the machine handle turned, the fish began to sink. The operator then ceased turning the machine handle and the fish immediately rose, when the machine was again set in motion, upon which the fish lay stiff upon the surface of the water, and was taken alongside of the ship. At this time we made use of the four magnet machine.

"We saw sperm and other whales, and lowered our boats, but were unsuccessful in getting fast to them, as they disappeared on our approaching them; while at all other times the weather was too boisterous to permit us to lower our boats. Thus we had but one chance to try the experiment upon a whale, which was made with the four magnet machine. The whale, upon being struck, made one dash onward, then turned on his side and was rendered perfectly powerless.—Although I have as yet not been fortunate enough to test the invention in more instances, I have the fullest confidence in the same, and doubt not to be able to report the most astonishing results on my return from the Arctic seas, where I am now bound."

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, AUGUST 12, 1852.

We learn with surprise from the "Rough Notes," a LEADING Daily from the city of Buffalo, that "there is a GANG of men, settled at Beaver Island, in the straits of Mackinac," who "have driven off all the fishermen from the Island, stolen most of their property, and make a business of appropriating whatever they can lay their hands on, BELONGING to the BOATS which call there," and that "WHEN A BOAT TOUCHES AT THEIR ISLAND" THEY "FLOCK DOWN to the dock with ARMS LOADED, and ready FOR ACTION."

It astonishes us that such things should occur in a civilized and christian country; more that it should happen so near us, and we hear nothing of it; and, worst of all, that the present wise, just and efficient administration has not suppressed such high handed piracy.

The Straits of Mackinac are but forty miles from here. How such a gang should have congregated in the Straits, and so far accomplish their nefarious purposes before we heard a word of it, is more than we can divine.—But then the Islander has no regular foreign correspondents; no traveling editor, or perambulating reporters, and we have neither Railroads or Telegraphs. The lightning line don't pass this way; we have but a casual mail, and the Police Gazette has no subscribers. We feel mortified that we are doomed to so much ignorance. Yet considering how much alarm and terror it has saved us, we can truly say that in this case ignorance was bliss.

It is certainly a most serious complaint against the present Whig administration, and a disgrace to the republic that such pirates should carry on their depredations with impunity. Many years ago, during the war with Great Britain, an Island in the Straits of Mackinac was sold out to the British, and while governed by the royal authority was the scene of many acts of hostility against the unoffending citizens of the republic. And a long time afterward the public property on Drummond Island was pirated by a gang of outlaws from the same place. But these acts were during the infancy and childhood of the republic.

Mexico has disgraced herself in the eyes of all the world by her confessed inability to suppress the guerillas that rob the peaceable citizens. Who could have dreamed that the conquerors of Mexico should have fallen under the deeper disgrace of seeing their merchantmen pirated by a little band on a little island, in a fresh water strait. The very mantle of Gen. Taylor ought to cry out against such scandalous cowardice.

Where is the War Steamer Michigan—the Iron Sided? Why does not Mr. Secretary Graham order her up in hot haste to batter down the strong holds of the pirates of the Straits? Only last year he ordered her up to take the Mormon King on a visit to the United States, an honor bestowed on no other foreigner but Governor Kossuth only. And now she is paying complimentary visits to the towns where there is beauty and no booty—women, wine and no war—while the credit of the nation and the commerce of the lakes perishes before the boldness of these rugged pirates. Shade of the immortal Jack—Fallstaff, rise up and vindicate the Anglo-Saxon name.

A few years since when a speck of war appeared in the northern horizon, during the Canadian rebellion, some one remarked that in case of hostilities, the commerce of the lakes would be annihilated. Old Hurricane Blake replied that with three cannon to each steamboat, and plenty of small arms in the hands of the passengers, he would pilot the fleet from Buffalo to Chicago with the broom at his masthead, and laugh at all the British on land or water; and now one little band of pirates, on one little Island, go armed aboard the steamboats and take off what they choose. Oh what a falling off was there, my countrymen!

There is no remedy for these things, but in the election of Gen. Scott to the Presidency. He alone is able to save the republic from disgrace and utter ruin.—We venture to predict that if he is not elected these pirates will be found boldly advancing upon the great commercial towns, and laying contributions upon the merchants, and no man but the brave "Capt. Watts, who wont let them go on to the deck of the Morton to steal," will be able to navigate the Straits of Mackinac.

Glorious Captain Watts! Relic of the bravery of the olden time! He lives the life of the republic. While there is marrow in the bone, there is hope for the nation.

If the republic is not able, until the inauguration of the hero of Canada and Mexico, to make a stand against this infamous band of pirates, we think out of gratitude for the courtesies heretofore shown to the August Sovereign of the Mormon Kingdom, we ought to lend them a helping hand. Such is the general expression of the people of the Mormon Islands.

We cannot speak by authority for his Majesty, but it is our opinion that he would unhesitatingly put all his soldiers and ships under orders to protect the commerce of the lakes, and annihilate the pirates of the Straits, whenever the United States asks his assistance. This is the sure resource of the republic; for the editor of the Rough Notes has already proved that "the King's name is terrible," and that of his men "one does chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight."

(From the Erie Chronicle.)

Beaver Island, July 5, 1852.

This was the 4th of July for us on board the propeller Troy. Speaking of the propeller Troy, who that has ever taken a voyage upon it would not wade the Maumee swamp to do it again? The table is as good as Apicius himself could desire; the arrangements as orderly as on any craft on the lakes; the officers as sociable and intelligent as any body could wish; and the captain as obliging and clever as the most unreasonable man could hope for—and what more can one ask? The man who rides upon her and finds fault, or even does not enjoy himself, deserves to be kicked to death by mosquitoes.—Capt. Dobbins hails from Erie I believe.

Beaver Island, as I before informed you, is about 16 miles long. In it there is said to be 7 handsome lakes, and these must at some day add more materially to its appearance and attraction than at the present. This Island is as yet very little settled. The name of Saint James, Troy, (in honor of our boat) &c., have been given to several scattering villages along the shore. Saint James, situated on one of the sweetest little bays in North America, and the waters in a calm day are as clear as crystal. A few feet from the beach the shores rise very regularly to the height of 12 or 15 feet. On the margin of this bank stands the foundation of a temple—100 feet long by 60 wide—which has been abandoned for a while on account of the late difficulties. The Mormons say they have been persecuted, and no doubt they have. A good deal of prejudice exists against them among the surrounding people. Some of this prejudice has probably a foundation, and some of it none. Like John, and James, and Zebedee of old, most of them are fishermen; and like all other people rendered a little exclusive in feelings and interest by devotion to a despised religion, they don't like to have unfriendly Gentiles come from a distance to surround their Island with nets and deprive them of the means of subsistence. This was done. A little feeling was aroused on both sides; recrimination followed; recrimination; threat followed threat, until the consequences were more serious and terrible than could have been desired by either party in the beginning. The Mormons who participated in the proceedings referred to were undoubtedly culpable beyond all exemption; but the evil doings of a few graceless scamps should not taint with infamy the good intentions and good behavior of any community of real or professing christian people.

It may be that I have been deceived by the outward appearance and professions of these Islanders, but my impression is, they are a community disposed to do well when let alone. But of this I neither know for certainty "nor haply care to know." I was going to tell you of a dance we had the night I was there.

"There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Beaver Island had gathered there—
Her beauty and her chivalry; and bright
The candles shone o'er fair women—"

You know the rest—over "brave men," of course! The Mormons are a people who are bound to enjoy themselves in the innocent amusement of dancing, fiddling, &c., and so far they are to be commended. Why not dance? Why not fiddle? Why this long-facedness of some people about amusements? I don't know, nor do I care.

I told you they wore the Bloomer dress here—and so they do. Every one to his taste. The dress, however, is not universal on the Island; nor were all the pretty danseuses at the gathering clad in them. The Bloomer here is the same as any frock, but it is not quite so long as some Bloomers I have seen.

Beaver Island is a very handsome spot, and when once cleared up, and proper attention is paid to its looks, it will be quite attractive. As it rises before you with its shores clad with the green foliage, the cedar, the fir, the tamarack, you are reminded of the Island bowers of Calypso spoken of by old Dan, Homer. And I am not content but the Ogygia of Lake Michigan abounds with Calypsos whose artless charms are as real as those of Miss Calypso of old were imaginary and artful. I left it with a sigh, and went on deck to cast a "longing, lingering look behind," but the night was black as a wolf's mouth—I couldn't see two feet before me; and the rain pelted me so that I was glad to go below again and "turn in."

A paper is printed here called the "Northern Islander." Yours, J.—S.

The foregoing we presume was intended as a kind of complimentary notice, and for that reason is marked and sent to us. We republish it merely as evidence of the non-information and misfortune of those who mean us no malice.

To moderate the bitterness of prejudice, which the writer knew was unfounded, he makes out a case in which the blame is not ALL on one side, and then, lest he may have gone a step further than the public will endure, he deprecatingly adds, "the Mormons who participated in the proceedings referred to, were culpable beyond all exemption."

We want the Erie Chronicle to understand that "the Mormons who participated in the proceedings referred to" did so by command of the officers of the law, and were compelled thus to participate under pain of fine and imprisonment; and that they have not done one act of aggression beyond what they were compelled as citizens, and against earnest personal remonstrances to do, in enforcing the civil and criminal law of the State.

When this fact is stated, we do not feel that we have been favored with any partiality whatever. It is a simple naked fact, established by the records of the Courts of the State and the Union.

Neither do we claim exemption from infamy on the excuse that a few "graceless scamps" ought not to taint our good intentions and good behavior." We don't keep graceless scamps in our communion. We cast them out when their scampishness is discovered. But the moment we cast one out, he is taken up by others, and made a gentleman and a man too virtuous, too pure to abide our wickedness. This is so well understood that the vilest scamp on earth feels perfectly sure that he can get into the circles of good society by setting up as an apostate Mormon. And so he can for a few days.

Among all the annoyances and vexations we are subjected to none is harder to bear; none taxes our patience more than this: seeing one with a patronizing air, and a conceit that he is doing us a great favor, representing us not quite so bad as our enemies say, and not quite alone in the faults of the disturbances which have taken place here. If we have not in the whole matter of the collisions kept the law at all times and in everything; if we have not endured wrong and violence patiently, beyond all previous example, we consent to be all slain in a body without judge or jury, as our brethren have before us.

In the matter of the two great prosecutions conducted against us, in which we have suffered in the aggregate years of imprisonment, and a loss of more money than Beaver Island would sell for, the principal actors were the highest and best men among us; and all who acted at all, acted with their advice.

We wish it distinctly understood that we take the responsibility of the acts, and do not shirk it off on scamps, vagabonds or desperadoes. We have periled our lives and sacrificed our property in enforcing the laws of the State and nation. And State and nation have prosecuted, and endeavored to punish us for it.

Not that they were positive enemies to law and order. But there is a general animosity against us, and for that reason a very transparent lie is believed against us, rather than a plain and well authenticated truth in our favor.

Give us an out and out enemy, rather than a faint friend, whose best praise is that we are no worse than our persecutors. Either say we have done precisely right, in the most difficult and trying circumstances, and have successfully vindicated the integrity of the law, though it has never been a shield to us; when more favored persons would have failed to do so, or leave us to our avowed enemies. If we must be calumniated, let it be by those who hate us.

Dancing as an amusement is practiced here by some. Winter evenings it is quite common.—But so much evil speaking has been indulged in by those who practice it themselves, but think it sinful in the Mormons, that prudent and exemplary people will not attend a dance where strangers are admitted. A passenger on a boat, no matter how well he may appear, unless connected with some decidedly respectable family here, may be sure that any dance to which he is admitted is, to say the least of it, Utopian to us.

The style of dress called Bloomer, or Turkish, originated here, and has generally been used for three years by a majority of respectable ladies, though some have never adopted it. Besides a few very excellent persons who never liked it, a number of individuals hanging on the skirts of society are ever ready to display themselves before strangers with long dresses, in the hopes of thereby obtaining higher esteem among strangers than their good conduct has procured them among their neighbors.

We apprehend the Chronicle's correspondent fell among such; for certainly very few others would here attend a dance where strangers were admitted. Our courtesy has been construed for levity by too many well dressed villains. And the consequence is, that strangers can scarcely get access to society at all.

SPURIOUS AND WORTHLESS MONEY.

There is at the present time an extraordinary quantity of spurious, worthless and irresponsible paper afloat in this immediate vicinity, and an uncommon effort appears to be making to get it off.

We know of a single house, paying out money daily in considerable sums, which appears to make it a regular business to shove off a portion of worthless funds in all its payments. Much of this money goes to Indians who know nothing whatever of the value of money. The outrage is unendurable.

One bill, a $5, on the "Peoples' Bank," Patterson, N. Y., has been put off and redeemed at the same place four times, and has finally disappeared. Doubtless it has fallen into the hands of some luckless Frenchman, or Indian from the shores, to be redeemed no more.

Indians come into this office daily to get their money examined. Within a week past we have been obliged in more than a dozen instances to select out bills and tell them, "ka-win o-niji-shin." The same bill, a villainous counterfeit, fully described on the Detectors for three years past, was brought to us by two different Indians on two succeeding days, each of whom had been paid off with it, and both returned it.

We would willingly do anything that good citizens ought to do to punish those guilty of such criminal conduct. But it is useless to attempt it. If a prosecution was commenced, the guilty parties would ask for and obtain sympathy by saying that we wanted to root them out because they are not Mormons.

We know by bitter experience that in this country a man prosecuted by the Mormons, though he may plead guilty, will be turned at large unpunished. The present officers would doubtless have more respect to their official oaths, but a new election is at hand, and we don't know what felon may be entrusted with the administration of legal justice.

The only remedy to which we can resort is this expose, made with reluctance, but in all frankness, and without exaggeration; and if the practice continues, warning the Indians against all paper money, without exception.

Besides a great variety of old counterfeit and old worn bills, on wild cat and other broken banks, the issues of several individuals, in the similitude of bank notes, and of the unauthorized banking establishments in Chicago and Racine, are poured out in a flood.

If business men, who speak the English language, see fit to take the latter class of funds, we have nothing to say against it. But we cannot aid in giving it currency among Indians, whose only defence against imposition is their confidence in us. We have no sufficient knowledge of their language to tell them upon what a sandy foundation these institutions are built. We are obliged to tell them either that the money is good, or that it is bad; and in every instance where we would not ourselves be willing to pay gold for the bills, and lay them by for future use, we shall tell them the latter.

We have not sufficient knowledge of the Ojibwe to say, "that is broken—that at a discount—and that an irresponsible issue, likely to fail at any time." Our invariable answer is, and will be, to all such ka-win o-nij-shin. We can do nothing less without becoming the instruments of gross fraud, and we prefer the well earned confidence of all the Indian tribes around us, to the friendship and assistance of all the swindlers on earth.

PATRONAGE.

We have of late frequently been offered the patronage of divers friends, who are anxious to render us assistance in the work of making the Mormons a great and happy people.

One class assuming that we have plenty of capital, but no knowledge of men and business, offer us to come and open shops for trade, we furnishing capital, buildings, &c., and receiving a small share of the profits, and assure us that they are not afraid to live among Mormons; as you might expect an apprentice of Van Amburg's to tell you he was not afraid to sleep with a lion.

We cannot avail ourselves of any such friends, because, first, we have no capital for the purpose; second, if we had it, we could not trust them with it, and, third, we really think we can find persons at home who know how to transact business just as well as strangers.

Another class are anxious to come with supplies to trade on, for the purpose of helping us, lest we should come to want, especially next winter. If these men wish to help us, we would be pleased to have them hand over the amount they intend to bestow upon us, and go on. If they wish to speculate out of us, it is not necessary for them to act the hypocrite also. It only induces us to despise them too much to trade with them.

There is still another class, who in addition to other inducements, assure us they shall join the Mormons as soon as they have arranged some matter of business. We confess our entire want of confidence in this class of men. Nothing can induce us to believe their hearts are aught but rottenness. They evidently look on us as villains in a small way, and themselves as the smart scamps, who shall teach and plunder us to our pleasure and their profit.

Any man who wishes to join the church for the sake of salvation, will do so without trying us to see what we will do for him; and the man who wishes to join for any other reason, we are anxious to be rid of.

If any gentleman proposes to come here to live, civility requires us to answer him courteously.—If he comes, we shall treat him so. But we wish to live here alone. We are content with this little spot, and think that every man who disbelieves our religion can find a home some where else in all the world. If they cannot, we will not treat them here as they have us at all other places.

NAVAL.

The United States Steamer Michigan visited this place the present week. She arrived Sunday evening, and departed late the following day for Little Traverse, where we understand it is the intention to practice target shooting for a few days. Thence she goes to the Sant.

During their brief stay here, officers and men were all on shore, visiting former acquaintances, picking wild fruits, and strolling over the Island. The interchange of civilities with the inhabitants was very cordial.

Capt. Bigelow walked through the principal settlements, and we understand expressed himself much pleased with the industry and thrift of the inhabitants; a pleasure repaid to them in the courtesy and kindness of all connected with the ship.

UNMITIGATED BARBARISM.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, speaking of the loss of the Propeller "City of Oswego," says: "sundry trunks had been broken open, and their contents plundered. Several boats were seen in the vicinity yesterday morning." After this notice of the most villainous piracy, along a densely populated coast, and where it is not possible that such an act should be attended with any degree of secrecy, and where the pirates can have no refuge but to the bosom of society, the Plain Dealer only adds, "we hope that this matter will be looked into, and the infamous ur-shers brought to justice."

We have in the last fifteen years heard of several similar piracies on Lake Erie, under circumstances equally appealing to our common humanity, against outrage and lawlessness, and all have gone by in like manner, with a mere passing remark.—Yet these acts have all happened in the most frequented places, and in the midst of a numerous christian population, where the arm of the law is supposed to be strongest, and all are unpunished.

Within two years the inhabitants of the Beaver Islands have saved shipwrecked property to the amount from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars, and not the soil of plunder has been found upon their garments. Not one cent has fallen into their hands but it has been accounted for to the satisfaction of the owners.—And they have never taken more than wages for their services.—Salvage, according to maritime practice, has never been demanded by them. What thanks have we got from forwarders and ship-owners? None. We hope they will choose some other place to wreck next time.

EXTRADITION CASE.

One Thomas Kaine shot his landlord, James Baif, in Ireland with the intention of killing him, but only wounded him. Kaine escaped to New York, where the agents of the British government found and demanded him, in accordance with the provisions of the Ashburton treaty.

The cause of Kaine has been espoused by thousands in the city of New York, who are determined, if possible, to prevent his being sent back for trial.—Every possible obstruction has been interposed to the execution of the treaty obligations and the punishment of the confessed murderer.

No question is made that he attempted and nearly succeeded in committing a most bloody murder, yet public meetings are held and numerous attended, to raise feeling, excitement and money to oppose the due enforcement of the laws, and the Marshal requires a posse of two hundred men to prevent his being rescued and set at large, in defiance of a solemn treaty, and the law of nations.

The administration of the laws, and the power of the nation is fast passing into the hands of common felons, who either by, or in defiance of law have their course, and destroy all who oppose them. No man who would use his power to restrain or punish such villains, could be elected to the office of Mayor of New York.

SALT LAKE AFFAIRS.

The story of the decamping of Brigham Young is confirmed.—He seems to have remained at Salt Lake till the first arrivals last spring, when learning the prospect of approaching troubles he departed: his destination is uncertain; it being given out that he was going to look out a new location for the Mormons.

If Brigham had any real courage, we should suppose he was preparing to take revenge on any new attempt at persecution. As it is, we doubt not his race is run. His deluded followers will be abandoned by him to their fate. Some better man will vindicate their right to live on the earth.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The Indians on the Plains are very hostile to the whites.—Nearly all the emigrants treat the Indians as though they were not human, and had no rights.—In turn the Indians take summary vengeance on them.

Toll is exacted of some, others are robbed, and others killed. Several parties, including a number of companies of Mormons, have been all killed, and their teams and property taken.

In the Utah Valley it is reported that the Indians became troublesome last winter. Beyond question a storm is brewing.—Collisions occur daily from Missouri to the Pacific.

ACCIDENT.

In a race between the Steamer Henry Clay and Armenia, on the Hudson river, the former was burned near Yonkers. Loss of life about eighty.

Mexico is being overrun by Indians. Large bands have made successful forays within two hundred miles of the capital.

The Mexicans have been in one severe battle, and between thirty and forty men slain, and in a considerable number of collisions. The Indians are becoming emboldened by success.

The Chinese continue to arrive in California. More than two thousand landed at San Francisco in one week. It is reported that a fleet of forty Chinese vessels will arrive during the summer, filled with emigrants.

BATTLE WITH THE INDIANS.

Captain Marcy and his command destroyed. Intelligence from Fort Smith, Arkansas, represents that a severe battle, lasting two days, had been fought by Capt. Marcy, and a company of United States troops, against two thousand Camanches, and that Marcy and his whole command were murdered. The despatch which communicates this report does not state precisely where the attack was made. Capt. Marcy was recently in command at Fort Smith, near the boundary line of the Indian territory, but the troops have been recently withdrawn from that post, and another fort was in process of construction.—It is probably that this latter place was the point of attack, and that the Indians were attracted in such numbers by the hopes of plunder from the numerous California trains which are now crossing the plains, Fort Smith being one of the starting points for emigrants. Capt. Marcy belonged to the 5th Infantry. He was the son of Governor Marcy, who was Secretary of War in President Polk's Cabinet. Capt. Marcy was an officer of great accomplishments, and his death, if the news as reported shall prove true, will be severely felt in the service. The report does not augur well for the safety of the California trains.

THE FAMINE IN GERMANY.

The famine in the mountain districts of Southern Germany is yet unabated, and provisions scarce and prices exorbitant. A letter to the New York Express dated Prague, June 3d, says.—

Families formerly in easy circumstances are reduced to beggary, and to severe sufferings from hunger. Bakers sell bread of rye and oat bran at high prices; people gather common grass along public roads and highways, and moss in the woods, cook and eat it to appease their hunger and to prevent starvation. Such are a few of the most glaring features of the great famine, not in the least exaggerated, but authenticated by the official reports of the local authorities to their respective Government. Truly the wrath of God is upon us!

DREAMY THOUGHTS.

"Twas in the peaceful stillness of the night,
When holy thoughts like dreams of Heaven arise,
And shades and visions of the cherished dead,
Gaze in our hearts with deep and mournful eyes.
And as the moonlight through the gleaming pane
Stole in in fiful shadows on the floor,
My soul was wrapt in strange and silent thought,
And visions of the days of yore.
Hours that had passed in sunny light,
And left no shadow on life's verdant track,
All in a breathing tone of mournfulness
In the hushed stillness of my soul came back.
And every thought or deed of wrong or guile
Around my couch like breathing visions stood,
And amid the memories of by gone days
Naught perfect came, and little that was good.
And then an unseen hand the curtain raised,
And those I erst had loved stood round my bed;
And with my quivering lips I spoke low words
To those I thought long since were with the dead.
And angels' pinions dimly seemed to gleam
'Neath their snow-flaked robes in each white fold,
And to my heart the touch of each dear hand
Gave back the blood—'twas so chill so cold.
And there they stood, and on my face they gazed,
In the dim silence of those mournful eyes,
While my swift thoughts drove me through realms of space
Beyond the pearly gates of paradise.
And there I saw my deeds on earth unwritten,
Spread in the pages of a wondrous book;
And even the lightest thought of youthful days
Appeared eternized to my shrinking look.
And in my musings on the fleeting rays,
So quickly passed and with results so long,
I won a blessing from the memories
That in the dim light round my soul did throng.
It gave me strength to fight life's battles boldly,
To wage a war against every wrong;
That at the last in Heaven high and holy
I might be found among the angelic throng.

A PATCH ON BOTH KNEES.

When I was a boy, it was my fortune to breathe, for a long time what some writers term the bracing air of poverty. My mother—light lie the turf upon the form which once enclosed her sweet and gentle spirit—was what is called an ambitious woman; for that quality which overturns thrones and supplants dynasties, finds a legitimate sphere in the humblest abode that the shadow of poverty ever darkened. The struggle between the wish to keep up appearances and the pinching gripe of necessity, produced endless shifts and contrivances, at which, we are told some would smile, and some to whom they would teach their own experience would sigh.—But, let me not disturb the veil of oblivion which shrouds from profane eyes the hallowed mysteries of poverty.

On one occasion, it was necessary to send me on an errand to a neighbor in better circumstances than ourselves; and therefore, it was necessary that I should be presented in the best possible aspect. Great pains were accordingly taken to give a smart appearance to my patched and delapidated wardrobe, and to conceal the rents and chasms which the envious tooth of time had made in them; and by way of throwing over my equipment a certain savor and sprinkling of gentility, my red and toil-hardened hands were enclosed in the unfamiliar casing of a pair of gloves, which had belonged to my mother in days when her years were fewer and her heart was lighter.

I sallied forth on my errand, and on my way encountered a much older and bigger boy, who evidently belonged to a family which had all our own dragging poverty, and none of our uprising wealth of spirits. His rags fairly fluttered in the breeze; his hat was constructed upon the most approved principle of ventilation, and his shoes, from their venerable antiquity, might have been deemed a pair of fossil shoes—the very ones in which Shem shuffled into the ark. He was an impudent varlet, with a dare-devil swagger in his gait, and an "I'm as good as you" leer in his eye—the very whelp to throw dirt at a well-dressed horseman because he was well dressed; to tear a boy's ruffles because he was clean. As soon as he saw me, his eye detected the practical inconsistencies which characterized my costume, and, taking me by the shoulder, turning me round with no gentle hand, and surveying me from head to foot, exclaimed with a scornful laugh of derision, "A patch on both knees and gloves on."

I still recall the sting of wounded feeling which shot through me at these words. To parody a celebrated line by the immortal Tuscan—

"That day I wore my gloves no more."

But the lesson, so rudely enforced, sank deep into my mind; and, in after life, I have had frequent occasion to make a practical application of the words of my ragged friend, when I have observed the ridiculous inconsistencies which so often mark the conduct of mankind.

When, for instance, I see parents carefully providing for the ornamental education of their children, furnishing them teachers in music, dancing and drawing, but giving no thought to that moral and religious training, from which the true dignity and permanent happiness of life can come, never teaching them habits of self-sacrifice and self-discipline and control, but rather, by example, instructing them in evil speaking, in uncharitableness, in envy, and in falsehood, I think, with a sigh, of the patch on both knees and gloves on.

When I see a family in cold, selfish solitude, not habitually warming their houses with a glow of happy faces, but lavishing that which could furnish the hospitality of a whole year, upon the profusion of a single night, I think of the patch on both knees and gloves on.

When I see a house profusely furnished with sumptuous furniture, rich curtains, and luxurious carpets, but with no books or none but a few tawdry annuals, I am reminded of the patch on both knees and gloves on.

When I see our public men cultivating exclusively those qualities which win a way to office, and neglecting those which will qualify them to fill honorably the post to which they aspire, I recall the patch on both knees and gloves on.

When I see men sacrificing peace of mind and health of body to the insane pursuit of wealth, living in ignorance of the character of the children who are growing up around them, putting themselves off from the highest and purest pleasures of their natures, and perverting their humanity, that which was sought as a means, insensibly comes to be followed as an end, I say to myself, "A patch on both knees and gloves on."

When I see thousands spent for selfishness and ostentation, and nothing bestowed for charity; when I see fine ladies besatined and bejeweled, cheapening the toils of dress makers, and with harsh words embittering the bitter bread of dependence; when I see the poor turned away from proud houses, where the crumbs of tables would be to them a feast, I think of the patch on both knees and gloves on.

MANUFACTURE OF WINE.

The following is given as the mode of manufacturing wine:

"The wine press, or curvier de pressor, consists in the majority of cases, of a massive shallow tub, varying in size from four square feet to as many square yards.—It is placed either upon wooden tressels, or on a regularly built platform of mason work, under the huge rafters of a substantial out house. Close to it stands a range of great butts, their number more or less, according to the size of the vineyard. The grapes are flung by the tub and caskfull into the curvier. The treaders stamp dilligently amid the masses, and the expressed juice pours plentifully out of a hole level with the bottom of the trough into a seive of iron or wicker work, which stops the passage of the skins, and from thence drains into tubs below.—Suppose, at the moment of our arrival, the curvier for a brief space empty. The treaders—big, perspiring men, in shirts and tucked up trowsers—spotted to the eye with splotches of purple juice, lean upon their wooden spades and wipe their foreheads.

But their respite is short.—The crack of another cart-load of tubs is heard, and immediately the waggon is backed up to the broad, open window, or rather hole in the wall, above the trough. A minute suffices to wrench out tub after tub, and to tilt their already halfsmashed clusters splash into the reeking pressor.—Then to work again; jumping with a sort of spiteful eagerness into the mountain of yielding, quivering fruits, the treaders sink almost to the knees, stamping and jumping and rioting, in the masses of grapes, as fountains of juice spurt about their feet, and rush bubbling and gurgling away. Presently having, as it were, drawn the first sweet blood of the new cargo, the eager tramping subsides into a sort of quiet, measured dance, which the treaders continue, while, with their wooden spades, they turn the pulpy remnant of the fruit hither and thither, so as to expose the half-squeezed berries in every possible way to the muscular action of the incessantly moving feet.

MORAL WORTH.

A man's moral worth is not to be graduated by his negative virtues—the evil he merely refrains from doing—but by the amount of temptation he overcomes. He is not to be judged by his defeats alone, but also by his victories. Many a man passes through life without a spot on his character, who, notwithstanding, never struggled so bravely as he who fell and was disgraced. The latter may have called to his aid more principle, resisted more evil, before he yielded, than the former, either from circumstances or his physical constitution, was ever called to do. It would be as unnatural, it would require as great an effort, for the cold, phlegmatic and passionless being to be vehement, wild and headlong, as for a fiery and tempestuous man to be quiet and emotionless. Victory is nothing. It depends upon the nature of the conflict and the odds overcome. Greater generalship, cooler bravery, and loftier effort may be shown in one defeat than in a hundred victories. We have no patience with those moralists of mere animal organization, who place the finest wrought spirit God ever let visit the earth on their iron bedstead, and stretch and clip according to the simple rule of long-measure.

FROM UTAH.

The N. Y. Herald publishes some strange documents from the Great Salt Lake, being a correspondence between Brigham Young and Judge Broccus, and an incidental missive from Elder Phelps. The letters between the Governor and the Judge grew out of an address delivered by the latter, in which it was assumed that he bore down rather roughly on the Salt Lake Ladies, in expressing a wish that they "might become virtuous." On this the Governor fired up, hence the correspondence, which was as mild as could have been expected under the circumstances. Elder Phelps mingles in the discussion as a kind of outsider, and brings all the arguments deducible from the example of the ancients in favor of a plurality of wives.

We are soon to have an interesting and authentic work on the condition and prospects of the Mormon settlement. A Detroit paper states that Lieut GUNNISON, of the Topographical Engineers, is about to publish the results of his observations, while engaged in the survey of the Salt Lake and other professional duties among the Mormons. He is a gentleman of cultivation and ability, and we expect to get a clear notion of the Mormon polity and its effects upon morality and civilization from his book.—Buff. Com. Adv.

THE GIPSY IN THE THORN BUSH.

A rich man once hired a boy, who served him honestly and industriously; he was the first to rise in the morning, the last to go to bed at night, and never hesitated to perform even the disagreeable duties which fell to the share of others, but which they refused to do. His looks were always cheerful and contented, and he was never heard to murmur. When he had served a year, his master thought to himself, "If I pay him his wages, he may go away; it will therefore be most prudent not to do so; I will therefore save something, and he will stay." At last the end of the third year arrived; the master felt in his pockets, but took nothing out; the boy then spoke:

"Master," said he, "I have served you honorably for three years; give me what I have earned."

"My dear fellow," said the niggard, "you have served me well; you shall be generously rewarded." So saying, he gave him three crown pieces. "A crown," said he, "for each year: it is liberal; few masters would pay you such wages."

The boy, who knew very little about money, was quite satisfied; and he set out therefore to see the world, singing to his heart's content; but as he leaped a bush, a little man appeared before him.

"Whither away, brother Merry? asked the stranger; your cares seem but a light burden to you?"

"Why should I be sad," said the boy, "when I have three year's wages in my pocket?"

"And how much is that?" asked the man.

"Three good crowns."

"Listen to me," said the dwarf: "I am poor, and unable to work; give me the money."

The boy's heart was good; so he handed him his hard earned wages.

"Take them," he said, "I can work for more."

"You have a kind heart," said the little man; "I will reward you by granting your wishes;—what will you ask?"

"Ha! ha!" laughed the boy; "you are one of those who can whistle blue! Well I will wish first, for a bird-gun, which shall hit whatever I aim at; secondly, for a fiddle, to the sound of which every one that hears me play must dance; and thirdly, that when I ask any one for anything, he shall not dare to refuse me."

"You shall have all," cried the manikin, as he took a fine fiddle and a bird-gun out of the bush; "and no man shall refuse what you ask!"

The boy went on his way, and soon overtook a wicked looking man, who stood listening to the song of a bird, which was perched on the summit of a high tree.

"Wonderful!" said the man, "such a small animal with such a great voice! I wish I could get him."

The boy aimed at the bird with his magic gun, and it fell into a thorn bush.

"There, rogue," said the other, "you may have it if you can fetch it."

"Master," answered the man, "leave out the 'rogue' when you call the dog; but I will pick up the bird."

In his effort to pick it up, he had worked himself into the middle of the prickly bush, when the boy was seized with a longing to try his fiddle. But scarcely had he begun to play, when the man began also to dance; and the faster the music, the faster and higher he jumped, though the thorns tore his dirty coat, combed out his dusty hair, and scratched his whole body.

"Leave off, leave off," cried he, "I do not wish to dance!"

But he cried in vain. "You have flayed many a man, I dare say," answered the boy;—"now we will see what the thorn bush can do for you!"

"Mercy, mercy," he screamed at last, "you shall have this purse of gold!"

"Since you are so ready to pay, I will cease my music," said he.

With this he took the purse and departed.

The thievish looking man watched him till out of sight; then he bawled insultingly after him; and when he had relieved himself, he ran to the judge of the next town.

"Honorable judge," cried he, "I beg your mercy; see how I have been ill-treated and robbed on the highway."

"Was it a soldier," asked the judge, "who has wounded you with his sabre?"

"No, indeed," answered the gipsy, "it was one who had no sabre, but a gun at his back, and a fiddle on his neck!"

The judge had the boy caught, and he was brought to trial, but he said with a loud voice:

"I did not beat the fellow, nor steal his gold."

"He can lie as fast as I can catch flies off of the wall," cried the man.

And so the judge ordered him to be hanged.

The boy ascended the ladder, but, on the last step, he asked the judge to permit him to play once more on his beloved fiddle.

"Do not let him, do not let him," screamed the rogue.

"I have granted it already; he shall have his wish!"

"Tie me fast! bind me down!" cried the gipsy.

The fiddle player began; at the first stroke all became unsteady—judge and bystanders tottered—and the rope fell from the hands of those who were binding the tatterdemalion; the judge and the gipsy were the foremost, and leaped the highest. Then the judge gasped:

"Cease, and I will give you your life!"

Then the boy went to the gipsy, and said:

"Rogue, confess where you got those ducats, or I will play again!"

"I stole them, I stole them!"

Then the judge hanged him instead of the boy, who journeyed on to see the world.

When certain persons abuse us, let us ask ourselves what description of character it is that they do admire—we shall often find this a very consolatory reflection.

A young lady lately appeared in male attire in St. Louis, and one of the editors says that her disguise was so perfect that she might have passed for a man, had she been a little more modest.

"Doctor, do you think tight lacing is bad for the consumption?"

"Not at all; it is what it lives on."

The doctor's saying was wise, as well as witty.

INSUBORDINATION RIFE.

It is useless to disguise the fact, its truth is undeniable, that a greater degree of insubordination has been manifested by the negro population within the last few months than at any previous period of our history as a State. Our exchanges from all quarters of Virginia come to us freighted with attacks of negroes on their masters or overseers, and a general laxity of punishment seems to pervade the length and breadth of the old Dominion. And not only is it abroad that the spirit of mischief seems brewing, but even here, we might cite several notable instances that have been named to us.

We have heard of negroes who refused to be chastised by the overseers, and who have gone so far as to resist. Kitchen servants who teach their children that no such relative position as master and slave ought to exist, and that henceforth the term is to be repudiated, and instead of master it is to be Mr. And instead of their offspring applying the terms heretofore known as father and mother, among the blacks, it is to be pa and ma!—This might be ludicrous to comment upon, but it shows the progressiveness of the times, and develops a feeling among the colored population which has never before been known to exist.

We conceive it to be time that all parties understood each other on this subject, and while we object to anything which might smack of heartless severity, yet personal safety may demand some abridgment of the extended privileges which are now allowed to the colored population.

It is now a debatable point as to which color shall use the sidewalk, and which give way—a point that we think had better be settled at once.

Let the public see to these matters in time, or great severity will be required after a time, while a little wholesome restriction just now will obviate its necessity and application then.—Fredericksburgh (Va.) Herald.

You cannot mend it now. That day has gone by. [Ed.]

A CURIOUS FACT.—A modern philosopher, taking the motion of earth on its axis at seventeen miles a second, says, that if you take off your hat in the street to bow to a friend, you go seventeen miles bareheaded, without taking cold.

THE INCENDIARY.

The wind howled dismally through the narrow streets of the city of —. The Storm King was out on his airy flight, and he lashed the earth in fury. The rain pattered upon the pavements and a thick darkness settled around, unbroken save by the street lamps, which cast a pale and fitful glare on either side as they battled with the imps of darkness. The bespattered watchmen, weary and drenched, had sought some refuge, where they might be in some measure sheltered from the bristling storm which seemed to gather strength as it continued; while a thick fog settled in gloomy silence around the city, as if to shut it out from all communication with the world.

The hour of one pealed from a distant clock as a person crept slyly along that avenue which led to the house of Mr. Lester, a wealthy merchant, who was at that time snugly ensconced in his bed—little dreaming of harm or danger. But how little do we know of the fate which awaits us! When the heart feels most secure, dangers—ah, death itself may be knocking at the door to summon us away.

Cautiously the person whom we have introduced, proceeded, gazing around, as if he fancied some unseen eye might behold the deed he was about to commit.— Suddenly he stopped, as if he caught the glimpse of a person turn a corner upon the opposite side of the street, and disappear.

Breathless, he stood a few moments, till feeling sure he was unobserved, he hastened on, and disappeared in a small wooden shed adjoining the house of which we have spoken.

A few moments and he returned, while a small streak of flame was observable through the door from which he had issued. Hardly had he cast his eyes around ere they fell upon a person whom he too well knew had been an observer of the crime. Quicker than thought he leveled him with the earth, and hastened away. A moment, as if struck by some thought, he returned and searched the pockets of his victim, and turning, fled.

Peal after peal rang from the bells of the city, and the cry of "fire!" resounded from every part. The startled inhabitants were seen leaving their houses, and hastening in the direction from which the flames ascended; the extreme darkness of the night rendered them so brilliant as to raise the impression that a large portion of the city was in flames.

Soon the hardy firemen were engaged in their work of mercy. But nought could stay the angry flames. Suddenly a cry, most heart-rending, burst upon the ears of those gathered round. 'Twas a mother's shriek: "My daughter! my daughter!" which was heard above the uproar,—"save! my daughter!"

A shudder passed through the crowd at that cry; for who in that city knew not the lovely and accomplished Miss Emeline Lester? And to know her was to love. Just bursting into womanhood, she was almost a perfect specimen of all we admire. Although flattered and caressed by all who knew her, she possessed a mild and gentle disposition, while her mind shone forth like some rich diamond upon the coronet of a king. Such was she whom it now seemed must perish in the flames.

At this moment Mr. Lester stepped forward from the crowd which had gathered around him, and with a calm voice, while his face showed all the agony working within, made known that his daughter was in the third story of the burning building, and offered any reward within his power to bestow on the person who would rescue her from her situation.

A groan of agony ran through the crowd, which told the father that sympathy was all he could expect from them. The stoutest heart quailed at the thought of the imminent danger which would be incurred in attempting a rescue.

The father again appealed in the most moving strains, while the mother swooned in the arms of a friend.

Suddenly a young man burst through the crowd and stood before the father. "If I perish," exclaimed he, "you will inform my friends, whom you will find by means of this," and he raised his bared arm, disclosing upon it a spot of peculiar shape, and brownish hue. A moment and he was buried within the burning pile. The moments wore away. Agony was depicted upon every face, and each heart trembled at its own thoughts.— All labor was suspended. A deathlike stillness reigned around, broken only by the sullen roar of the flames, as they shot upwards, streaking the sky with a vivid light, or the fall of a timber as it came down with a heavy crash. The roof was seen to tremble, as if it shuddered at the awful abyss into which it seemed about to plunge.

Suddenly a cry of joy echoed around, as a part of the walls came down with a tremendous crash, for, ere it reached the ground, a figure was seen to leap from the flames, bearing a burden which he placed in the arms of the father, and instantly fled.

The morning dawned brightly on the ruins of the preceding night; and with its first rays, a person in a well known hotel, near the centre of the city, rose from his couch, upon which, if his looks were to be credited, he had obtained but a small portion of rest. Hastily dressing himself he sallied forth to breathe the morning air, and to invite the morning breeze to play around his temples. An hour elapsed before his return, and in the meantime his room had filled with a crowd of people, who appeared somewhat disappointed at his absence. Unable to account for the excitement which seemed to exist, he hurried forward and entered the room.

Here he was addressed by a person who stepped forward to meet him, in these words:

"Have I the honor of addressing Mr. Augustos Montague?"

"That is my name, sir!" returned he.

"You are my prisoner!" exclaimed the former seizing him roughly by the arm.

Had a thunder-bolt opened a path at his feet, Montague would not have been more surprised than he was at those words.— His face was, for a moment, over-spread with a deadly paleness, which was quickly construed by the officer into an evidence of guilt.

"Come! march my boy!" exclaimed he, rudely seizing Montague by the collar. "Your face shows plainly that we have made no mistake in the person!"

"Why am I thus rudely treated?" exclaimed Montague, indignantly shaking the officer from him. "I am ready to accompany you. But why am I arrested?"

"You are quite forgetful," was the reply. "But come!" and they moved off together; followed by a score of ragged loungers.

We will not follow Montague through his examination, but leave him in prison awaiting his trial for the crime of arson.

It was a beautiful morning.— The sun rose clear and undimmed by a single cloud. The air was pure and fresh as a new blown rose, and it swiftly bore upon its wings the sound of a well known bell, which sent a thrill through the hearts of many persons confined within the strong walls of the City Prison, around which a crowd had collected. Slowly its massive gate opened, and a prisoner, with a proud and lofty bearing issued from the walls, attended by an officer and pointed towards the Hall of Justice. The prisoner was Montague!

As he entered a general hiss ran through the crowd, which expressed feelings towards him too well. Although there were some present who gazed with admiration on his fine form, (and among these the females) yet no one gave vent to these thoughts except it were in exclamations of surprise, that one of so noble bearing should have been engaged in so enormous a crime.

None appeared to doubt his guilt, and all seemed to rejoice in the detection of one whom they believed to be the author of all the alarm, on account of the unusual number of fires of late, which bore upon themselves the marks of an incendiary. Did I say all believed him guilty?— There was one among that company who would not believe the noble being before her, could have been guilty of so dreadful a crime as that charged upon him, and this one was Emeline Lester! The moment her eyes fell upon him, a thrill ran through her frame, unknown before. That face, that form, seemed familiar to her, but where she had met him she was unable to say. A thousand bewildering thoughts passed before her mind. There was a secret chain that linked that form to her mind, but in vain she strove to discover the key by which she might disentangle its intricate folds. Unsatisfied and perplexed, she strove to dispel the subject from her mind but her efforts were only succeeded by its roots becoming more deeply implanted.

But to proceed. We will not follow the Court through the many ceremonies prescribed by law, and sanctioned by justice, but hasten to the evidence adduced to establish the guilt of Montague.

The chief witness that was brought against him, having taken the usual oath, deposed— "That passing the building destroyed, a few moments before the alarm was given, he perceived a person suddenly emerge from the door of the shed, adjoining the house, and hasten toward the hotel where the prisoner lodged. Suspecting some foul play, he had followed and overtaken him. That a smart struggle ensued between them, in which the prisoner had dropped a pocket book which was now before the Court, bearing the prisoner's name—and which he had declared since to be his—and which he has owned he lost upon the night of the fire."

The servant of the Hotel also declared that Montague had left the Hotel at about 11 o'clock, and had not returned until after the alarm of fire. These circumstances, with some others of minor importance, deemed enough to warrant the Jury in returning a verdict of "guilty." When called upon for his defence, Montague arose and addressed the Court in the following words:

"Gentlemen—I have no defence in this case, except to tell you the truth, and may God direct you aright. Of the charge laid against me, I am perfectly innocent, and I am willing to trust myself in the hands of a wise and just God, knowing he will not let the guilty go unpunished."

"Sitting alone in my room, upon that evening, the events of which have placed me here, before you, a low whispering in an adjoining room attracted my attention. Curiosity prompted me to listen. Placing myself near the door, which was partly open, I soon caught the theme of their conversation, which was no less than the plot, the effect of which you have witnessed. I had not heard enough of their plans to take any effectual measures for their defeat, ere the persons left the room and disappeared; but not till I had marked them both. The love of adventure has been implanted in my breast from my earliest youth and the only reason I can give for keeping what I overheard a secret, was the novelty of the adventure which I anticipated, and the fear of its being overthrown. Determined, however, to prevent the designs of these plotters, I immediately repaired to the house of which I had heard them speak, and remained in its vicinity till long past midnight, without hearing anything from the villains I expected. I had wandered some distance from the house, and had just returned and stood opposite of the door of the shed which has been described to you, when I perceived a light near the inner edge. Stooping to make sure of the fact, I caught a glimpse of a figure behind me, and, before I could turn I was struck down by a villain, who must at that time have taken the book from my pocket, either for the purpose of implicating me in the crime, or from the supposition that it might be of value. I soon recovered from the blow sufficiently to rise and walk to my lodging, where I soon entirely recovered. I then hastened back to the burning building, where I arrived just in season to hear the appeal of a father for the preservation of a daughter.—How well my heart answered to that appeal I will refer you to this," raising his arm which he had bared, and disclosing to his astonished hearers the identical spot which many of them had witnessed upon the night of the fire, and which now seemed to appeal to every heart and disclose the innocence of the prisoner. A joyful cry here burst from the crowd of ladies, and the words—"It is he!" burst from the lips of the sweetest maiden present.

Memory had done its work, and Emeline L., again stood within the burning building; again the shadow of a rescue burst upon her closing eyes as she swooned away in his arms; and in Montague she now recognized that shadow which had so long slumbered in her breast.

Naught could exceed the excitement caused by his words, and if there was a person before convinced of his guilt, that same person now had not a doubt of his innocence. When sufficient order had been restored for him to proceed, Montague continued:

"Whether I have been justly confined as a prisoner I leave you to decide; but I would this time point out to you the real incendiary, and also his accomplice."

Raising his arm slowly, he fixed his piercing eyes upon the chief witness against him, and declared him to be the man. Then turning to a person who had been one of the loudest to declare the guilt of the prisoner, he exclaimed; "You, sir, are the man whom I overheard in your conversation on the night of the fire."

Trembling with guilt and fear, and goaded on by a guilty conscience, the former stepped forward and confessed himself the author of the fire, and that he had charged it upon Montague for the purpose of obtaining the reward which had been offered for the detection of the incendiary.

Suffice it to say, that Montague was set at liberty, and in a short time, was amply repaid for all his troubles, by receiving the hand of Emeline, while those who had so basely made an attempt at his honor and his life, received the just reward of their crimes.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1852.

PRICE OF STEAMBOAT WOOD.

At the first opening of navigation last spring a consultation was had among all the wood dealers at this place, and an arrangement entered into by which steamboat wood was to be sold at the uniform price of one dollar and fifty cents per cord during the season. Every trader pledged himself to neither take less or ask more.

This arrangement has been kept by all the traders but one. A single individual has sold a little, and promised much wood at $1.25 and $1.38 per cord. But as usual with rats, has been unable to fulfill his contracts. No one need expect to purchase wood here at any other price.—Woodmen will not chop, nor wagoners haul wood to be sold at a less price, nor owners of wharfs allow it to go over them on any other terms. The policy of every man having any interest in the permanent growth and prosperity of the place, is to furnish a good article as low as it can be afforded, and to keep the price uniform the entire season, and no man who either asks more or takes less will receive the slightest countenance from the craft, nor be able to fulfill his contracts.

To show that no man can seriously contemplate carrying on an honest business in selling wood at $1.25 per cord, we merely state that the very wood which sold here at that price was sold a few days previous in the wood-yard, at constable's sale, at $1.23 per cord. After this it had to be hauled on the wharf, and the wharfage paid.

Men who sell at that price must either run away and cheat the laborers out of their pay, or get advances from the boats and fail to pay them. Either way it can be a resort for a few days only.

It is the interest of the steamboat owners to get their wood at the lowest rate that will insure a steady supply of good wood. But when the price is pressed below a remuneration to the laborer, the supply will be limited to the positive necessity of the laborer rather than the power of production, and will be continued only while that necessity continues. People here are not obliged to do wood business. Many of them at present prices prefer burning up the timber to cutting and hauling it. It cannot be purchased at any other place in the lake cheaper than here, and purchasers need not be flattered with the hope of reducing the present price.

Mr. Yerkes, of Plymouth, Mich., who has recently visited Grand Traverse, says that a Mormon's life would not be safe there a moment, and he appears to rejoice in that state of society.

We will assure Mr. Yerkes that the wish is father to the thought. A Mormon can visit Grand Traverse as safely as any other place in the United States.

With the exception of a half dozen drivelling cowards there is no feeling of hostility to the Mormons there. But if there was an universal hostility, nevertheless a single Mormon could go there with perfect safety. They know too well the vengeance of the law which the Mormons would see meted out for any act of lawless violence.

STATE OF SOCIETY.

A writer in the Forest City, a respectable Cleveland Daily, recommends abandoning all reliance on the laws and public officers, and getting up a committee of one or two hundred volunteer regulators, who shall catch and hang whoever they think proper to put out of the way. The article is published without a word of disapprobation, and we have a right to believe that the editors and patrons at least look with favor on the project.

This is a most melancholy evidence of the state and progress of society, in one of the most orderly and best regulated cities in the United States. That a writer in a respectable paper, and a comparatively exemplary and moral city, should prefer the mob to the judiciary, and advise systematic but lawless murder as a remedy for the evils of society, is certainly melancholy evidence of the tendency and approaching end of the Republic.

Cleveland is not alone in this love of lawlessness. It is springing up throughout the length and breadth of the nation. There is scarcely a city in the Union where the elections of municipal officers are not controlled by undisguised criminals. Sad fruits are these of universal suffrage and an elective judiciary.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY STOLEN—Almost.

Some ten days since Mr. Burk, keeper of the Isle-le-Galet (Skilagalee) light house, was returning from Mackinac in a government boat, and stopped for a short time at the Wau-go-shance light, hitching his boat with a line, leaving all sails standing, with the sheets cast off and fastened at the extreme end.

On going out an hour or two after the boat was gone. A general hue and cry was raised, and the shores ransacked for a great distance to find the boat. The story went to Mackinac and from there to all the world that the Mormons had stolen a government boat. We presume that by the time the tale got to Buffalo the prize was a Revenue Cutter at least, if not the War Steamer Michigan.

People here did not fear and tremble, just because they never heard the rookery. Some days after Mr. Miller, of this place, going to Mackinac, saw a boat at an unusual place on Hog Island.—At Wau-go-shance he heard of the loss, and mentioned what he had seen.

Word was forthwith sent to Isle-le-Galet, when Mr. Burk went to Hog Island, and there found his boat, with clothing, provisions, nets, spyglass and every thing else in it just as he left it. Mr. Burk himself informs us that of $200 worth of property on board, there was not lacking so much as a cracker or a red herring; the tiller was stuck in his own hands, and the sheet ropes cast off and fast at the extreme ends in the same manner, and every article lying just where he left it, except a spyglass, which he rolled up in a coat, and which had fallen out in the rocking of the boat, and lay in the bottom.

Yet Mr. Burk persists in the opinion that the boat was stolen. Stolen with two hundred dollars worth of property aboard, and abandoned without removing a penny's worth, though the thieves had nearly a week in which to dispose of it, upon an uninhabited Island, cut up with deep winding and intricate bays, and covered with a dense forest. So anxious is he to avoid the suspicion of tying a line indifferently.

We fully approve of his conduct in the premises. The people have itching ears to hear something against the Mormons. No matter what occurs, if it is ill done it is laid to them. And there are fools enough who will pretend to believe it if they know it false. In truth, the officers in this region need somebody to lay their blunders to.

Men who are willing to avoid the suspicion of tying their boat a little carelessly by charging a whole community with felony, ought to be government employees, when light house keepers pay fifty dollars a year bribe, and the man who makes the money ought to be just as friendly to us as Mr. —.

INDIAN LIQUOR LAW.

A trader from Chicago recently made his appearance among the Indians at Grand Traverse, with ten barrels of whiskey, one of which he tapped and commenced business.

The Indians immediately assembled in a body and knocked the hoops off the barrel, and he saved the remaining barrels by putting them on board a vessel in hot haste. The Missionary seconded the Indians by taking out a warrant against the trader, which however we believe was not prosecuted.

The trader left and went among fishermen, where he found no difficulty in selling out; but when he got to Mackinac more than half his money was Wild Cat and counterfeit.

A goodly lot of Whig electioneering documents have found their way here, urging the people to vote for Gen. Scott, of course. By these evidences he is beyond a doubt worthy to be elected.

The only question is, are the people of Beaver worthy to vote for him? We have several here who voted for Harrison and Fillmore, and one who was a member of the Baltimore Convention which nominated them. Can the Advertiser or Tribune tell whether we are deemed fit, since they whitewashed us, to vote for Scott and Graham?

As for the Democrats, we have no hopes from them. They have not sent us a single document, or even a private letter. We don't expect they will let us have tickets unless we pay for the printings.

PIRACY AND LYNCHING.

We are informed that a short time since some fishermen at Pine River, near Grand Traverse Bay, discovered five men running off with one of their boats and a quantity of nets, &c. Pursuit was made immediately, and so sharp that the pirates ran into Grand Traverse and went ashore, where they escaped to the woods.

At the latest information the whole coast was rallied and on the alert hunting down the fugitives, with the intention of shooting them down or hanging them wherever they are found. We wish the pursuers success. Then for once it will be known who does the pirating. However wicked it may be to murder criminals instead of punishing them according to law, we cannot commiserate the fate of men who live a life of crime, and contrive to shift the odium of their deeds on the innocent and unoffending.

Riots have occurred in various towns, both in England and Ireland, between Romanists and Protestants. The Queen's government are endeavoring to enforce the statutes that yet remain against Popery. The great increase of the Romanists make them restless under these restraints. Sir Lionel Rothschild said at the hustings, that there was more religious liberty in Austria than in England. We are confident, there is more in Austria or Russia than in the United States, where the laws declare an universal freedom,

For there, though the law deprives us of some rights, such as it really acknowledges it secures and protects. In the United States and in England, to some extent, all liberty exists in promise only. It is a Dead Sea fruit, beautiful to look upon, but turns to ashes on the lip.

The Green Bay Spectator says he has received a communication from Albion, disclosing some awful crimes committed by the Mormons, which he declines publishing for want of a responsible signature.

When did the Spectator become so careful? Or, has he only had the habit of publishing his own lies ad libitum? Who at Albion pretends to be confidential criminal associate of the Mormons? It is a filthy bird that fouls his own nest. But the world has recently witnessed men who would chew hen d—g to spit on a Mormon's garments.

The Hon. Waddy Thompson has recently visited the Cherokees, and in an account of his visit, he says: "I was three weeks in the Nation, and did not see a ragged, a dirty, or a drunken Indian. The temperance laws are extremely stringent; it being a penal offence to keep ardent spirits. Aided by a general public opinion, these laws have entirely expatriated that vice, pernicious elsewhere, but especially to the Indians. The leading features of the Cherokee laws are

RESPECTABLE EMBASSADOR!

The Hon. John S. Ogle, of Pennsylvania, was some months ago appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate, as Charge d'Affaires of the United States, at the Court of Denmark. He received his nine thousand dollars outfit, but never left Washington. Descending from the splendid wine suppers of Congressmen, to taverns, groggeries, houses of ill-fame, and gambling hells, he has squandered all his money, and has become so degraded, that the President has been compelled to revoke his appointment.

We neglected to mention that the wharf of Mr. James Cable, at the head of this Island, fell down two weeks since.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE OF FOUR HUNDRED LATTER DAY SAINTS.

Newport, July 13.

Yesterday evening a most remarkable occurrence took place here, which, while it appeared to involve the lives of three or four hundred persons, did not inflict the slightest injury on a single individual.

The Latter Day Saints, or Mormonites, have of late years so greatly increased in the colliery districts in the neighborhood of this place, that an organized body now exists here, with elders and prophets at their head, and a regularly constituted government to direct their spiritual and temporal affairs.

Annually these people hold a conference, at which the chiefs of the body assemble, and communications with their brethren in other quarters are made.

This year some of the elders who had been in the camp on the borders of the Great Salt Lake were expected at the Newport conference, and preparations on an extensive scale for their reception, and for the general celebration of the festival, were being carried out. It was also expected, or ambiguously hinted, that miracles would be performed; and the credulous Welsh, ever ready to believe any "new fangled doctrine," gave ear thereto as believers.

Yesterday evening, after the conclusion of one of the services, the brethren, the saints, and the elders assembled together in a large building, known as the Sunderland Hall, where it was intended to celebrate the occasion by a tea festival on a great scale.

About four hundred persons (men, women and children) were sitting down, after a blessing had been invoked by the elders, and a pleasant festivity was anticipated. Suddenly a creaking noise was heard, followed by a sound like a crash of thunder, and immediately the lofty ceiling of exactly one half the hall, divided in the centre of a large beam, fell almost flat upon the multitude below.

A terrific shrieking and screaming and groaning ensued. The residents in the neighborhood, apprehending some frightful casualty, rushed out of their houses, and were almost paralyzed by the continued screams and groans.

Presently the windows were burst out, and the affrighted Mormons appeared, terrified and screaming for help, while some actually flung themselves into the street, and others, clinging to the sills and frames, made those below shudder at their anticipated death or frightful mutilation.

A scene of indescribable horror ensued. The crowd of spectators rushed toward the doors of the hall, which they burst in, as well as they were able from the mass of rubbish, &c., that had fallen inside; and here the spectacle was frightful in the extreme. The people were huddled together in crowds beneath the tea tables—some crowding to the windows—some rushing towards the doors—and many struggling to extricate themselves from the heaps of broken rafters, lime, &c., among which they were embedded. Assistance was rendered, and after much difficulty the unfortunate Mormons were extricated from their perilous condition.

It is most remarkable that not a single Latter Day Saint received any injury from this accident, although the ceiling was heavy, and was quite one half of the ceiling of the whole hall, while attached thereto were the heavy pieces of timber which had previously supported it. It is also singular that that portion of the ceiling beneath which the "elders" or "prophets" sat was perfectly uninjured and sound.

Nothing less than a miracle is supposed by the infatuated Latter Day Saints to have preserved so large a number of persons from the fate of death, which appeared so inevitable; and a great reaction in their favor will be the result among the half converted disciples of Joe Smith, who abound in this quarter.

The remainder of the evening's services was devoted to thanksgiving for the miracle which had been performed by the elders in favor of the true believers.—Eng.P.

Had there been a real miracle, not a Gentile would have believed it. A mere lucky escape they are willing to make a miracle of. [Ed.]

Col. Colt, a British officer, stationed in Egypt, has made a communication to one of the Oriental societies in London stating that he has ascertained the principal ingredient used by the ancient Egyptians in the preservation of mummies. It is only the vegetable tar of those countries, called by the natives natron.—He has made a trial and forwarded to Eng and animal substances, and a human hand, prepared about forty years ago with this substance. The best informed among the Arabs think that large quantities of camphor, myrrh, aloes, frankincense, &c., were used in the preparation of the mummies, but those specimens proved that such additions are by no means necessary, as the tar applied alone penetrates and discolors the bone. The tar is obtained from the branches of a small tree or shrub exposed to a considerable degree of heat, and it is found in most parts of Syria and Arabia Felix.

THE EMIGRANTS—BATTLE BETWEEN THE INDIANS AND MORMONS.

St. Louis, June 2, 1852.

We are beginning to receive an occasional item from the emigrants on the plains. Those who made their departure from St. Joseph and other points below that little city, seem to have escaped difficulties with the Indians.

Nearly all the northern division of emigrants are of the Mormon faith, and most of them are from England and Wales. Hence their difficulties with the Indians.

The rumors we have received here—and they amount to little else as yet—are, that the Mormons had to proceed over one hundred miles from the Bluffs, following up the north bank of the Platte, when the Indians commenced the levying of black mail by stealing into their camp at night and driving off their cattle. This was repeated several nights in succession, when at length one of the night guards fired upon and wounded an Indian. Finding that no more could be hoped from silent and stealthy roguery, and exasperated at the wound inflicted upon their comrade, the red men determined upon more decisive measures. According to the dead hour of midnight, when the whole Mormon emigration was sleeping in assured security in the valley of the Elk Horn River, the Indians charged on horseback into their midst, firing arrows and shooting guns at random, and yelling as if all pandemonium were let loose.

The consternation of the emigrants, who knew little of savage habits, was very great, but they were driven by sheer necessity to a vigorous defence. So soon as the Indians discovered that the camp was thoroughly aroused, they retreated as precipitately as they originally charged, driving before them as many horses and oxen as they could. The rumor is that two of the emigrants were killed and several wounded. What injury the Indians received no one knows. A considerable number of horses and cattle were lost.

The above we copy from the N. Y. Tribune, of June 19th.—Who is Mr. X, and who are his informants? How does he know that most are Mormons who travel on the North side of the Platte? Come out Mr. X, and give us your real name, and let us see what can interest you in making statements so destitute of foundation in truth, and rumors that none would credit and none but yourself give currency to. Now, as to better health being enjoyed by emigrants on the South than North side of the Platte, he is as widely mistaken as he is in supposing that he will ever become a popular "penny-a-liner."

The fact that hundreds and thousands have crossed from the South to the North side of the river, on account of the very sickly and unhealthy state of the emigrants, is too commonly known and understood, to require a re-assertion, as any person who has returned eastward on either side well knows.

The most of the emigrants on the North side, says he, are of the Mormon faith, and from England and Wales, &c. Now, who does not know this entirely false? The Mormon emigration, though large, from this place, is not the twentieth part of those who started out from this place and out of those, one to five may have come from the old country.

The route on the North side of the Platte, or Nebraska, is far the best supplied with small streams of cool and springing water, and also with wood and timber grass and game, and more than all other considerations, the enjoyment of better health on the North side, or on the old Mormon Route, has become a proverb.

The Indian and Mormon fight and robbery is a complete fabrication—not a word of truth in the whole report. The fact is, but a few Mormons had started at the date of his communication—but a very few families—the main body not having started until July, or at least the last of June. Neither has the Indians on this route been uncommonly troublesome, the only difficulty we know or have heard of is, where a party of Pawnees, or some other westerly Indians undertook to steal an ox from a small company of emigrants (Californians, we believe,) and were chased into the river and shot at by the emigrants. This undoubtedly, is the foundation of his great Mormon fight—Pandemonium let loose—Indians charge on horseback—general consternation and two killed!

These public letter scribblers are both common and annoying. They have come to be a very bore on the public patience. If men will write, why not confine themselves to something they know, and not write so much founded on the improbabilities of rumor. Rumor is given up to be a noted liar and a disturber of the peace. It won't do to believe or give currency to half she says—so Mr. X. don't you listen to her again.—Western Biola

THE FISHERY QUESTION.

The "Intelligencer" learns on the best authority, that this Government was notified on the 7th of this month, of the stationing of a force of small vessels to prevent the infraction of the fishing treaty; and that the officers employed upon such service were instructed and commanded to avoid all interference with vessels of friendly powers, except when in the act of violation of the existing treaty, and in all cases to avoid giving ground for complaint, by the adoption of harsh or unnecessary proceeding, where circumstances compel the arrest or seizure of vessels.

The "Intelligencer" also has reason to believe that orders have been given for sending into those regions one of our best vessels, commanded by most experienced naval officers, as well for the protection of seamen against any molestation that may be attempted contrary to existing treaties, as to enquire into any abuses that way grow up on their rights, and to warn them against any invasion of the rights of others.

THE FISHERIES.—The Boston Atlas thus sensibly discourses upon this exciting subject: The Nova Scotia people are the persons most to be feared. There is a spirit of jealousy towards us among them, and they will do all in their power to molest our people and drive them off. They will not hesitate to make seizures, and have the vessels condemned upon ex parte evidence; and our fishing owners must be more vigilant in making their grievances known to government, if they wish to preserve their property. Instruct the crews to conform to the treaty as it has been understood heretofore, and let them scrupulously avoid trespassing upon the inhabitants, or fishing or curing within three miles of shore. If, then, any seizures are made, give immediate information to government as soon as possible after it is known here, and there cannot be any doubt that Mr. Webster will do all in his power to obtain their release, and if illegally seized, satisfaction for the detention.

The Fon du Lac Journal says: "We hear that in conversation with a gentleman from this State, President FILLMORE said that he regarded the Green Bay Spectator as the ablest, most reliable and interesting Whig paper in Wisconsin." Very interesting.

POETRY.

Know you a man so distrustful and cold,
That he'll live out his life without gaining a friend:
Constantly toiling for silver and gold,
That he pledges himself he never will spend?
Pity him!

Know you a heart, confiding and warm,
Where the flame of affection steadily burns:
For whom neither silver or gold has a charm,
But who spends far more every year than he earns?
Pity him!

Know you a man who is striving for power,
Who is ceaselessly toiling for wealth or for fame,
And gauding himself each day and each hour,
That a few of his fellows may hear of his name?
Pity him!

Know you another quite careless of fame,
Neither longing for wealth, nor yearning for power;
Thoughtless alike of his fate and his name,
And wantonly squandering each hour?
Pity him.

Know you another, both prudent and kind,
Who has lived to do good, and made many a friend;
Who has all his life long kept peace in his mind,
And for whom is reserved greater peace at his end?
Copy him.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Cayuga, Mich., July 11, 1852.

Z. H. GURLEY, —SIR:—Your communication of June 6th reached me a few days ago. I now sit down to reply. You say your object in writing is to point out to me and others the true order of God. This would have been a benevolent object indeed, provided you could, and would accomplish it.

But, sir, your effort in this so far, I must say, has darkened counsel with words without knowledge, and proved an utter failure. So much so, that I am somewhat disgusted with some, if not all of your arguments. I almost wonder that you should attempt to re-convert your converts upon so fragile an excuse. You say there are some doctrines of men, and some of devils in the church, in which you so lately held a priesthood under the Presidency of James J. Strang.

It may be so, for aught I know; and so also the spirit has testified heretofore of some doctrines in the true church which God hates, as the doctrine of the Nicolaitans. But what has that to do with the true order of God? But I cannot but reflect why you should never have written to me in all the time your family has been acquainted with mine till since your apostacy from the order to which we both belonged. What are you to do to repay the damage you have occasioned by so long and arduous labor to lead men into error? You say nothing to me by way of repentance of your former teachings. But Mr. Strang you think is not the true and legal successor of Joseph Smith. Why then did you proclaim him as such? Are you not guilty for so doing? Did you obey the law of God, to "prove all things?"

If you had not proved this one thing, what was your testimony? Did you teach the things you knew, like God's servants? or, like the servants of men, did you run before God sent you? and, like a blind leader of the blind, lead others into the ditch? Why, sir, one of two things to me is certain: and that is, you were no better employed than a sectarian priest then, or else you are now a base hypocrite and an apostate from the true order of God. You now appeal to the book of Doctrine and Covenants. Was not this the same book out of which you proved James the rightful successor of Joseph? How many more orders can you prove and point out to me for the true order of God? Will you pretend to me to be a sound logician, and think to guide me, when heretofore you could not guide yourself, nor be guided aright? I am quite astonished!

Why, sir, I verily think you are less merciful than was Dives in hell. For he did not want his brethren whom he had left at home to come to that place of torment. You say they have the gifts where you now are, and for a sample you send a few lines so penned by one of your own children. Well, I don't seek after such signs. If I did I could find brighter gifts among the unregenerate. And who but fools would take any such things as proof of God's order, especially the writing of poetry? Why, I was about to say that I was knowing to the Jersey Bard's writing better poetry when only four years of age. But the girls must not be blamed. You must not be ignorant of the subtle devices of satan. He tells some truth, and just enough to accomplish his purpose. Will not some come up and say, have we not prophesied and done many wonderful works, to whom Christ shall say, depart ye workers of iniquity, I remember you?

Why did he not know them? Why, we all agree it was because they were not in his order—not of his church—consequently he did not know them. He does not say they did not prophecy, nor do marvellous works. But they were never his sheep, nor of his fold; or, if you please, of his order. This then is the true meaning, and the only reason why such will not be owned at the last day. God has but one church or order on earth, and in that order there must be a President continually. If that order can live and be maintained one year without a visible head or President to order it, then why not ten or twelve years, by the same rule? You say God will soon raise up from the loins of Joseph a President to the church. O, inconsistency! What, raise a living head to place upon a dead body? Which part of the body do you suppose he will place it on? He will not be apt to force it on to such parts as disown it, will he?

He once was almost ready to disown or destroy the whole body beside the head, even as in Moses' day, from which he promised another body should grow. But no where has he made a body to live without a head, as I am aware of. And if he has done so in the church of Latter Day Saints since 1844, I think it must be a prodigy indeed.

And furthermore, by the same act of mercy, he may yet put a living head upon each of the sectarian churches; for it is certain they will not all acknowledge one head, any more than Mormon factions do. But, sir, did you ever know a reasonable body to exist without a reasonable head for so much as twenty-four hours?

If you ever did, tell me when and where. Now, if I understand it, you profess to be the body of Christ, without any visible head; that is, you are alive, yet without a head.

Can you reason soundly without a head upon your body? If so, you must reason with your elbows. Now let us see if you do not. You quote from Book of Covenants, sec. 3, par. 18. From this you say God will soon fulfill his promise, (herein made,) and raise up a head or President to his people, from the lineage of Joseph Smith. Well, then, now I suppose you would be happy to think that ere long you will have a head upon your body.

But would you not appear quite easier and better to lie still until your head comes along, and not preach and prophecy any more with your elbows? And, in fact, I cannot speak to you as a member of Christ's body; for unless you are able to receive the sincere milk of the word, how can you live? I can only talk with you as a man in an unregenerate state. For if you can live as you suppose you do, then why not all the rest of the sectarian world, who all claim to be led by the spirit, &c., without any visible head, save one of their own placing upon them for temporary purposes, to be put off again at will?

But, sir, you no doubt wanted me to look at your quotations, and take your view of the matter. But who made you a guide or expounder of prophecy? You ought to know you are right and have authority before you presume to teach men. I cannot be bamboozled around by a headless body. I have experienced enough of that in my younger days, when tossed about by sectarian winds and hurricanes.—You ought to know better, and would undoubtedly had you not supposed myself as on the same road to apostacy, and wishing to get up some more help to your faction. For I cannot see how you, as a minister of the gospel once in order, could deny that order and authority and yet claim to hold authority to teach by virtue of call and ordination. Shocking to good sense!

Under whose hands were you ordained to teach your present doctrines? You should first tell me this, not come to me without a head, professing to know something. Why should you know more than others who have no heads upon their bodies? If you have a head, let me hear from that first. If you are ashamed of your head, do cover up your body. But if you have none, as it appears from your own maneuvering, then I suppose it will be just as vain to reason with you as with a sectarian priest, who don't know that the bride, the Lamb's wife, has or needs to have any visible head in this life. And just as well might each one of them exclude the head of his own dear wife, and assert that she had no visible head upon her body because her husband is the head.

However I will just look at your position as to a body writhing in pain for breath, and reaching with arms spread wide if possible to find the lost head. But you extend your cries beyond this life. You reach to Joseph, who is gone. Why not to Jeremiah, or Enoch, just as well?—To the past, or to the future, all is the same with you; at present you are dead, unless you can live without a head. And if you can, why call for one? or are you the head pro tem? When the President is gone how do we get another? O, by lineage, you say, and no other way. What profound knowledge! What a pity, it had not been before understood. How long has it been so?

What the Lord will do I dare not tell, unless it were first revealed to me by or through some other means than my own interpretations of the book of Covenants, or any other book. One thing is certain to me, and that is, if God raises up a leader or head to his people that leader will know of it himself, and will be qualified to prove his mission or claim and demonstrate by the revelations which he has given concerning that matter. And for one I never expect to see the matter more fully and clearly demonstrated than has already been through James J. Strang.—If he is an impostor, and has ever been since he has claimed to be the rightful successor of Joseph, then I must own that it is utterly vain for me any further to attempt to understand anything correctly about the true order of God.

And, therefore, you and all others might as well cease to teach me, unless you get up some new thing entirely, and give unto me some new powers of reasoning, new eyes to see, new ears to hear, and a conscience which no such spirit can operate with as heretofore. And I do look upon such movements as yours as most palpably absurd and contemptible. And I would not reply to such a mass of confused nonsense, were it not for wiser purposes than merely to refute such fallacious pretences.

JOHN S. COMSTOCK.

GREELEY'S OPINION OF THE AMERICAN SOVEREIGNS—THE REPUBLICAN RULERS OF THE NATION.

The usual pow wow for the election of delegates to the various city conventions was held last night, and passed off without serious disturbances, so far as we have heard. The "nurseries" were extensively patronized, as all the elections were held in rum-shops, and many of them in those of the lowest, dirtiest and basest description, where gambling and prostitution are the chief means of profit.

"Of course, the 'election' was the most ridiculous farce. The names had been selected weeks before at Tammany Hall, and the Gem tickets were prepared, the 'right' sort of inspectors chosen, a dozen of beastly ruffians in each ward, hired to do the voting, and knock down any one who should presume to interfere with the play. These poor, ragged, drunken, soulless, mindless, debauched, and diseased cut-throats and thieves, which crawl through a blasted and horrible existence in the low dens of the Sixth Ward, who riot or starve, just as they have luck in robbing prostitutes, and picking strangers' pockets, who, with a probable chance of escape, would cut their own mothers' throats for ten dollars a-piece—these hireling curses to themselves and the world, constitute the bulk of the 'regular democratic voters' at all primary elections; they are the disgusting wretches who make 'public opinion' for the columns of the National Democrat and the Herald, (their especial organ and patron,) and express the voice of the great 'democratic party' of the metropolis. The ruffian lately tried for his life, and barely escaping the gallows, crowds from the democratic rostrum the District Attorney who prosecuted him, and the crest-fallen gentleman sneaks cowering from the brazen miscreant; the 'democratic' gatherings are every where addressed by a man who owns and keeps in full play a nasty gambling house, where strangers are robbed every hour in the day. This foul-mouthed, hypocritical braggart, but in fact most wretched coward, is the saint, the Peter the Hermit, the demigod of the democratic crusade."

A GENTLE REPROOF.

The following though not new, will bear reading at least once in seven years:—

One day Zachariah Hodgson was going to his daily avocation after breakfast, he purchased a fine large codfish, and sent it home with directions to his wife to have it cooked for dinner. As no particular mode of cooking was prescribed, the good woman very well knew that whether she boiled it or made it into chowder, her husband would scold her when he came home. But she was resolved to please him once if possible, and therefore cooked portions of it in different ways. She also, with some difficulty, procured an amphibious animal from a brook, back of the house, and plumped it into the pot. In the mean time her husband came home; some covered dishes were placed upon the table, and with a frowning, fault-finding look, the moody man commenced the conversation:

"Well, wife did you get the fish I bought?"

"Yes, my dear."

"I should like to know how you have cooked it, I will bet anything you have spoiled it for my eating, (taking off a cover,) I tho't so. What in creation possessed you to fry it!—I would as lief eat a boiled frog."

"Why my dear I thought you loved it best fried."

"You didn't think any such thing. You knew better—I never loved fried fish—why didn't you boil it?"

"My dear, the last time we had fresh fish, you know I boiled it, and you said you liked it best fried. But I have boiled some also."

So saying, she lifted a cover, and lo! the shoulders of a cod nicely boiled, were neatly deposited in a dish, the sight of which would have made an epicure rejoice, but which only added to the ill nature of her husband.

"A pretty dish, this!" exclaimed he.—"Boiled fish! chips and porridge! If you had not been one of the most stupid of womankind, you would have made it into a chowder."

His wife with a smile, immediately placed before him a tureen containing an excellent chowder.

"My dear," said she, "I was resolved to please you. There is your favorite dish!"

"Favorite dish, indeed," grumbled the discomfited husband, "I dare say it is an unpalatable wishy-washy mess. I would rather have a boiled frog than the whole of it."

This was a common expression of his, and had been anticipated by his wife, who, as the preference was expressed, uncovered a large dish near her husband, and there was a bull-frog of portentous dimensions, and pugnacious aspect, stretched out at full length!—Zachariah sprang from his chair at the sight of the unexpected apparition.

"My dear," said his wife in a kind, entreating tone, "I hope you will at length be able to make out your dinner."

Zachariah could not stand this. His surly mood was overcome, and burst into a hearty laugh. He acknowledged that his wife was right and he was wrong; and declared that she should never again have occasion to give him another lesson.

A certain good-natured old Vermont farmer preserved his constant good-nature, let what would turn up. One day, while the black tongue prevailed in that State, one of his men came in, bringing the news that one of his red oxen was dead. "Is he?" said the old man; "well he always was a breechy cuss. Take his hide off and carry it down to Fletcher's, it will bring the cash." An hour or so afterwards, the man came back with the news that "line back" and his mate were both dead. "Are they?" said the old man; "well I took them of B——, to save a bad debt that I never expected to get. It is lucky that it ain't the brindles. Take the hides down to Fletcher's, they will bring the cash." After the lapse of another hour the man came back again to tell him that the high brindle was dead. "Is he?" said the old man; "well he was a very old ox. Take off his hide and take it down to Fletcher's, it's worth cash, and will bring more than two of the others." Hereupon his wife, who was a very pious soul, taking upon her the office of Eliphaz, reprimanded her husband severely, and asked him if he was not aware that his loss was a judgment of heaven for his wickedness. "Is it?" said the old fellow. "Well if they will take the judgment in cattle, it is the easiest way I can pay it."

At a Court Martial lately held at Norfolk, the following Dialogue took place between one of the witnesses and the court:

"Are you a Catholic?"

"No."

"A Protestant?"

"No."

"What are you, then?"

"Captain of the foretop."

A western farmer, being obliged to sell a yoke of oxen to pay his hired man told him he could not keep him any longer.—"Why," said the man; "I'll stay and take some of your cows in place of money." "But what shall I do," said the farmer, "when my cows and oxen are all gone?" "Why, you can then work for me, and get them back again."

If you see a squall arising in the latitude of your wife, what course should be pursued to avoid the consequences? Double her cape with your left arm, and let your lips drop anchor on the cruising ground of "smacks."

CORRESPONDENCE.

SECOND EPISTLE OF J. S. COMSTOCK,

A SERVANT OF GOD, AND AN ELDER OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST, UNTO THE MOST EXCELLENT MR. WOOD.

Grace be unto you, and peace from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ. I thank God, by Jesus Christ, for the hope that is given unto me whereby I know and am assured of your faith in Jesus Christ and the holy scriptures, whereby much assurance is given unto us of God's willingness to save all mankind.

But, notwithstanding all this abundant manifestation, we must not forget that God is one, and has decreed but one way only through which he will save our fallen race; and that way never was by faith in the written word merely, else the eunuch by reading the prophecies might have dispensed with the mission of Philip, whom God sent to him to preach unto him Jesus. From the same passages he was more than willing to believe.

And you should notice the effect of Philip's preaching unto him Jesus was soon felt to lead directly down into the water of baptism. And not only Philip, but all in that age who believed in the preaching of Jesus, were under the necessity of believing in water baptism, or rejecting the gospel. For Jesus said himself, to one who was disposed to slur such an idea as that held forth by John and the disciples, that a birth through water baptism was necessary to salvation. But verily, verily, I say unto you, except a man be born of the water he cannot be saved.

And you, my dear friend, dare to slur the idea also. And to contradict it, I shudder at the thought. But, pray, where is your authority to dispute the plain word of Jesus Christ? The New Testament, which you at the same time hold a rule of faith and practice? You certainly ought to know it was a practice so strictly enjoined by Christ and his disciples that they could not and would not fellowship any man as a member of the church of Jesus Christ without water baptism, even though he might be born of the spirit previously. I say even although he might be filled with the Holy Ghost under the preaching of God's living ministry.

That ministry had the power to bind and seal the command of God. And you must know, if you do in fact believe the holy scriptures, that Peter did speak words of authority to Cornelius, and that too from God, when he commanded him to be baptized in water, after being born of the spirit; yes, after receiving the Holy Ghost.

And, lest you or any one should consider it only the words or command of man, you should remember that God had previously revealed it to Cornelius that this man Peter would tell him words whereby he could be saved, and his house also. And what was necessary to his salvation, is necessary to all. As said Jesus, except a man be born of water he cannot be saved. And Peter knew it to be true, and so did all the disciples, and so do I; and the man who dare dispute it and risk his salvation by rejecting this requirement of the gospel, has no saving faith in the promises of Jesus Christ.

And I would that you should understand that men may have faith in the Bible and faith in Jesus Christ, and yet not be saved. For the devil himself has all this, and more too; for he even knows that Jesus is the Christ, the holy one of God; and he knows also much of the sacred writings. And, furthermore, I would that you should understand that no man can be saved neither by the additional qualification of a good moral character added to his faith in Christ and the written word, without a knowledge of a living ministry and their official aid.

Here is the stumbling stone with you. And, sir, if you will listen to the voice and counsel of one of your best friends, you may be positively assured of this fact. And I will demonstrate it by proofs which you cannot help but admit, unless you reject the plain letter of the sacred books, and the order of God through which alone he ever gave a revelation of his will to men. And here again I would express my joy in that at this time I am privileged to address one who is not ignorant of the prophets, nor destitute of faith in the written word as it stands revealed, and unsophisticated by the private interpretations and vain sophistry of assuming uninspired teachers.

I say, then, I have found you at this stumbling stone, this rock of offence, the holy priesthood of Jesus Christ. Here you stumble. You are willing to believe in Moses; that God through him gave a fiery law upon mount Sinai; and in the Aaronic priesthood under Moses, or as an appendage to that higher authority which Moses held, through whose officiating authority the sins of the people were absolved by obedience to certain laws and ordinances, by which every man had to go to such alone or only who were appointed by direct revelation through Moses by the strict commandment of God, and to obtain a remission of their sins through the ordinances that then were ordained of God.

I say you, no doubt, believe all this, that no man could get remission of his sins in that dispensation without the administration of that living ministry; that ministry appointed by God and specified through his servant Moses. You must believe this. And you must also bear in mind God's displeasure of any disorder in these functionaries, or of assumed right by virtue of even holiness of character, or of belonging to the church of the living God. Remember Core and his company, who would be priests. You know that the ground of right to the priesthood assumed by Core was as good and even better than any sectarian minister could pretend at this day; for it was indeed true that all the congregation were holy, inasmuch as they observed God's order.

But Core forgot that holiness or their holiness could only be continued and preserved by submission and obedience to that order. But by what shadow of pretence could it be asserted that all or even any part of the sectarian world are holy? Why are any of them holy? If any of them are holy it must be by other means than obedience to the command of God, or of subjection to his order. And without this you should know assuredly that there is not, never was, nor never can be any holiness among men, nor any salvation to man. Else I am sure the pious, praying, alms giving Cornelius might have been saved without sending to Joppa to be made acquainted with God's agents and order and ordinances, which he had appointed for the salvation of a lost and ruined world.

Yes, that journey was necessary for Cornelius; for no one of God's officiating agents were nearer unto him at that time. Yet he knew how to pray, and did get a revelation from God even before—on that you say the gospel was established—and one too of the most important revelations for him—and one too which I would be glad if you could get, viz., who are God's agents to-day, or in this generation.

If the Bible be a rule of faith, why not now by faith and prayer know what Cornelius found out before his conversion to the faith of the gospel and order of Christ's church? I say to you, my dear sir, why do you not know? Dare you say you do know? How do you know, without a revelation, any more than myself with it, or any more than many others who differ with you in that matter? I say you do not know who they are, unless it be by a revelation, and one too given in this generation.

For you know very well, by the book itself, which you consider the sufficient rule of faith, that past revelations never did do away the necessity of succeeding ones. And although it had been previously foretold and penned by the prophet Abraham what should befall his posterity, and that God would, after four hundred years of bondage, raise up a deliverer, yet when that deliverer God raised up you know it was said by one of his own brethren, who made thee a ruler and a judge? You see that man wanted some other revelation unto himself, beside the previous prophecies, in order that he might know who that deliverer was when he appeared.

And John, also, had been prophesied of by even the celebrated Isaiah, and others noted in Israel, yet when he was about to make his appearance on earth new revelations were given even just before he was born, and again shortly after he was born, by miracles, &c., and then again by the additional fulfillment of previous prophecies, by the power and spirit of Elias upon him, and, last of all, an entire new revelation through him to be fulfilled in the presence of as many beholders as should choose to witness it.

And you ought not to forget that in the fulfillment of this last revelation, of which I am speaking, that it was a revelation given to all, confirming John's testimony as a prophet of the most high God. But to you and to this generation it is not a revelation, but a history, a sacred history. And John, and Jesus Christ, and the first Apostles are gone; and while they lived on the earth it was with difficulty that they could persuade many comparatively to believe in their missions. And now, what will it suffice us to garnish their sepulchres?

They are dead, and cannot possibly administer to us the ordinances of God's house, which always required a living ministry. And Jesus himself, since his ascension, has, like as before he came here, substituted agents to do for him in order what he has decreed to be done to save mankind. And now the question is, who are the agents of the most high God in this generation? If none are clothed with authority from God as his ministers to bind and seal, then truly God is doing nothing to-day among the children of men like as anciently, unless as in that period of the past in which for a time he suffered all nations to walk in their own ways.

Consequently we know that when men walk in their own ways, they cannot be walking in God's way. And this one fact is forever established and unchangeable, that there is but one God, one faith, and one baptism, and one hope of our calling, and one body of Christ, and that body is the one undivided church of the living God, having in it the order of the ministry or priesthood of Jesus Christ, with all the spiritual gifts even as the New Testament holds forth to all who are ready to embrace the faith once delivered to the saints, and to be saved in the kingdom of God.

May the Lord help you to understand, and do your duty.

stand, and do your duty.

The salutation of me, John, written in Springport, by my own hand, May 2d, 1852, Sunday morning.

J. S. COMSTOCK.

P. S.—The reason of my copying the ancient mode of expression used by the first disciples of our Lord, has been in order that you may observe that there is no more ostentation or assumption for one in this generation to style himself an Apostle or an Elder, if he is such, than in any former period, when they invariably did so with the fullest confidence, as being well aware of the sacred trust committed unto them.

And, sir, I can say also that it has not been by mine own will or the will of man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, that I have been called unto this testimony. And I know it to be the testimony of the only true gospel of God our Savior, wherein is salvation; and he only who believes and obeys it will be saved in the kingdom of God, while all who reject it will be damned. And I can say with Paul, I am not ashamed of this gospel, because, although it may be despised by proud professors of religion in multitudes, yet it is to-day the power of God unto salvation, unto all who obey it in full faith of the promises. Yes, and the promise of the gospel is the same to-day as Peter declared, namely, the gift of the Holy Ghost, is promised unto you and your children, even to as many as God shall call.

Why then will you not prove this testimony? There is but one and the same good old way to prove it. We say unto you, repent. God commands you to repent and be baptized in water for the remission of your sins, under the administration of those he sends to you with this fulness of his gospel, declaring, yes, we declare from God that you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost on the same conditions as in the days of Peter.

And have you no faith in this testimony? What gospel then will you believe? Will you believe the Bible? Is that your rule of faith and practice? Why then do you blot out or pluck up the main root, by rejecting the necessity of a living ministry, which the Bible holds forth? Or why substitute another? Why accept of a ministry who do not believe in the faith once delivered to the saints? Why, above all, will you be led by such blind guides as you know and affirm do not understand the plain prophecies, which are to you as daylight, and were given to be a light in the dark?

Do you not know it to be wrong to follow or to fellowship blind guides? Go not after them, nor follow them, says your rule of faith and practice. Do you observe this rule? Come, Mr. friend Wood, let us be plain, and let there be no grumbling. And above all, let us be reasonable, or else let us renounce christianity. For you know God, who is to-day as yesterday, says, Come and let us reason together. For in effect I say, if you will do so, a material benefit shall arise therefrom.—Yes, your sins may be washed away.

For God has a right to say to-day to you, and now why tarriest thou? arise, and be baptized, and wash your sins away. And do you say it is unreasonable?—Why any more so to-day than yesterday? Can you say you have no sins to wash away? As well might he to whom the command was; for he was a professor of religion, and a believer in the sacred writings, except those of his own generation, and as touching the law of that dispensation blameless. J. S. C.

THE CLIMATES OF COUNTRIES.

Although Edinburg, in Great Britain, is situated ten degrees farther north than the city of New York, it has a much warmer climate in winter, and the heat and cold never attain to such extremes. The climate of England is, to the majority of our people, a mystery. The Island is situated between 50 deg. and 55 deg. north latitude, and it has a milder climate than we enjoy in the latitude of 40 and 45 deg. The British Isles are situated in the path of a warm ocean currents, which flow across the Atlantic, and beat upon and circulate around them.

The wild Orkney Islands which are situated in 59 deg. 5 min., have warmer winters than we have in New York City, which is situated about 17 deg. further south. In the city of Glasgow, the mean temperature in the month of January is 38 deg., and it has never been below zero but twice in forty years, and then only 3 deg. for two days. In Unst, in the Shetland Isles, in latitude 60 deg. 5 min., the mean temperature in January is 40 deg. In many places of the United States, ranging from New York to Maine, in latitude 45 deg., the mean temperature is 6 deg. below zero.

Unst is only one degree colder than Constantinople, in January; and no country in Europe, nor the world perhaps, enjoy the mildness of climate peculiar to Great Britain and Ireland. This must have a wonderful effect upon the health and organization of the people. The cause is, as we have stated, generally attributed to the current of the Gulf Stream; one philosopher, however, attributes the genial warmth to moist breezes from Africa, which come over the Atlantic, crossing the equator. In Russia, Moscow is on the same line with Edinburg, yet its mean temperature in winter is at least 13 deg. lower.

The climate of England is moist and wet. To foreigners accustomed to clear skies, it is disagreeable. The atmosphere is cloudy in summer, and this is one reason why it is not so warm as in other countries in the same northern latitude. Were it not for the warm ocean currents and the warm breezes, the coasts of England would be ice-bound, and many of the plants which now flourish there as evergreens, would be unknown.

On the northern coast of our Continent—in northern Oregon—the climate is much warmer in winter than in places on the same lines of latitude in our Eastern States. It is believed that currents from the orient flow over the Pacific and wash the Oregon shores, as the Gulf Stream of the Atlantic does the British Isles.—During the past winter the thermometer ranged at 17 deg. above zero, and the prairies were green all the time, except when covered by occasional snow storms.

The farmer is not compelled, as the Eastern States, to depend for the winter sustenance of his cattle on hay raised the previous season, his cattle can graze there throughout the whole year, and wild flowers may often be plucked in the month of January and February.—Scientific American.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, SEPT. 2, 1852.

Read this tale:—

There is, most people are aware, a gang of men—a branch of the Mormon Church—under the management of one Strang, settled at Beaver Island, in the straits of Mackinac. Recently many complaints have reached us from that quarter—especially from fishermen—in regard to the outrages perpetrated by these Islanders. It would seem that the narrow escape some of them had about a year ago from the halts of justice has not produced a good effect on them, but on the contrary made them more annoying and paved the way for fresh crimes and outrages. They have now driven off all the fishermen from the Island, stolen most of their property, and make a business of appropriating whatever they can lay hands on belonging to the boats which call there.

It would be hard to believe there were such things occurred every day, were it not that we have it from the most reliable sources, and from many witnesses whom we feel confident are incapable of uttering a falsehood in reference to the matter.

The Mormons, when a boat touches at their Island, flock down to the dock with arms, loaded and ready for action. They have a paper called the Northern Islander, devoted to the peculiar interests of the Latter Day Saints of Beaver Island, which is very industrious in manufacturing public opinion upon affairs connected with the Island and its inhabitants. The most atrocious falsehoods are unblushingly promulgated by the paper and sworn to by the Saints, and the most malicious reports concerning some of the first steamboat officers on the lakes find places in its columns.

It has just recovered from an attack of paralysis brought on from over-heating itself in an attack upon the officers of the steamer J. D. Morton, which always touches at Beaver Island on her way to and from Green Bay. It politely intimates that Capt. Watts and all the other officers of the Morton are thieves and pirates, and all that sort of thing, and all because the Islanders are not permitted to go on board and steal all about deck. Something should be done to check the high-handed proceedings of this piratical band of desperadoes before they become any more troublesome. A wholesome restraint should be imposed upon them by some government officer appointed for that purpose; they should be made to respect the rights of fishermen as well as of travelers. Of course all they say against the officers of the Morton will not have the value of a hair in the estimation of the traveling public. We do not refer to the matter on that account.—Rough Notes, July 27.

And now this:—

We have received two numbers of a weekly paper called the Northern Islander, published at St. James, Beaver Island, Lake Michigan, and devoted to the interests of Strang—an apostate of several years standing from the main trunk of Mormonism—and his followers. It may be remembered that we published an article in relation to the Beaver Islanders, about four or five weeks since. The editor of the Northern Islander says he received one of our papers with the following direction upon the wrapper: "James J. Strang, Mormon King, by God, sir;" and the editor adds, in the true spirit of christian charity, that we "evidently intended to have said, by grace of God, sir." He thinks to entertain a suspicion of our being profane were uncharitable. We humbly beg the pardon of all the Beavers, but the truth is, we never sent, nor caused to be sent to any person on their island any copy of our paper. We have no cause of quarrel with any Mormon in christendom, and if the editor will please refer to our article he will observe that we said if the reports in circulation in regard to them were true, etc., they had been highly culpable, and the case should undergo legal investigation. We referred to the difficulties existing between the Islanders and the officers of the Morton, stating what we had been told by unprejudiced passengers on the Morton.

If we were satisfied that we had maligned the Mormons, we should be as quick to render them justice as any other class of men. We are free from any feeling of prejudice against them. Yet to us at a distance from the scene of operations, these things wear an entirely different aspect from what they do to one who is an immediate observer. We entertain no doubt but the Mormons have been put upon, perhaps maligned, but when their organ claims for them—what can be said of no other class of people in the world—that they are guilty of no transgressions whatever, and that all these stories are manufactured, we say gammon. Allow that the lusts of the flesh and the seeking after filthy lucre may have led some of even your immaculate body astray, and we will drop the subject, so far as we are concerned, without a sigh. We would say to the Islander that we are coming up to spend a couple of weeks with them before the close of navigation, and shall expect them to give us a friendly shake of the hand betimes.—Id. August 19.

The Editor of the Rough Notes never sent a paper to any person on this Island, and therefore did not send the address "James J. Strang, Mormon King, by God, sir." Very well. Then this profanity lies at the door of the "very gentlemanly officers of the Morton," who brought the paper from the office, in an office envelop, with such a direction written on the paper itself, before enclosing.

Put that in your paper, Mr. Rough Notes, send it along to the Green Bay Spectator, and you two may puff the very gentlemanly officers of the Morton to your heart's content. Give the public the facts. They will know then what in your estimate makes a gentleman.

And the Rough Notes has "no quarrel with any Mormon in christendom," though he expressly asserts that "they have driven off all the fishermen from the Island, and stolen most of their property"—"that the most unblushing falsehoods are promulgated by their paper, and sworn to by them"—and that "the narrow escape some of them had from the HALT OF JUSTICE, has made them more annoying, and paved the way for fresh crimes."

In the name of truth, with whom do you quarrel but the innocent and the unoffending? No quarrel with such men: God deliver the innocent and unoffending from the society of your friends.

You must be kin to a merchant who wished to establish at Saint James, and offered as an inducement to the Mormons to patronize him, to purchase all the fish they would steal at a very slight reduction on the market price.—Finding no customers on such terms, he is now engaged in trying to get us mobbed off, in hopes of speculating out of the plunder of our property.

With such sentiments, we had rather you would not come up to visit us. If you have no quarrel with us, having that opinion, a little acquaintance would make one; and if you have no such opinion, and have merely called us thieves, pirates, &c., to please the "very gentlemanly officers of the Morton," the least we can say is, we don't shake hands with such.

In all candor, Mr. Rough Notes, we do not believe that such things would be said by you and other journalists, if you gave them one sober thought before putting them in type. Editors know their readers have itching ears for ill news of the Mormons. They are sometimes willing to gratify a man who can give them a free passage, &c., by saying things to please him, the truth of which they have never investigated, and do not consider that though it is sport to them, it is death to us.

This course of misrepresentation has been pursued towards the inhabitants of Beaver Island, until we live here with the consciousness that any band of ruffians who should succeed in murdering any of us in the most unprovoked and cold-blooded manner would be left at large unprosecuted. On the other hand, should we resist to blood, a wicked unprovoked and murderous attack, we should be seized, imprisoned and tried as murderers.

Last year two men by the name of Bennett fired upon and shot down a constable who went to arrest them, and after the constable fell his posse returned the fire, and one of the Bennetts was killed, and this has been published as far as the English language is spoken as a cold-blooded murder.

A thousand newspapers published that the Mormons were attempting to subject the Bennetts to Mormon Law, and that one of them was killed for resisting Mormon authority. The Editors of every one now know that this Mormon Law was the public law of the State of Michigan, and that this Mormon authority was a Prosecuting Attorney, a Justice of the Peace, and a Constable in and for the County of Michilimackinac. Yet the fourth paper in the thousand cannot be found which has corrected the misrepresentation. They make us murderers rather than take back a falsehood which has been imposed on them. It may be sport to you, but it is death to us.

But the Rough Notes says: "When the Mormon organ claims for them—what can be said of no other class of people in the world—that they are guilty of no transgressions whatever—we say, gammon."

Ah! then it has got down to this,—that the Mormons are justly presumed to have some imperfections, because "the lusts of the flesh and the seeking for filthy lucre" lead some astray, wherever human nature remains. If we "will allow" this, you "will drop the subject."

We allowed this before you was out of petticoats, and have continued to confess it to the present hour. We alledge in behalf of our religion that its tendency is to make men better. But no man among us pretends to impeccability. Nor has the Editor of the Rough Notes ever seen or heard one word from us claiming individual perfection to any men, save "the man Christ Jesus."

It is not these "some imperfections" which you accused us of in the Rough Notes of July 27th. You accuse us of the most astounding crimes which ever disgraced the human name, and alledge the most unimpeachable authority. Either you have such authority, or you have not. We undertake to say you have not.

You charge "that the Mormons have drove off all the fishermen from Beaver Island." Mr. Cadwallader, will you tell us the names of the fishermen who have been driven off Beaver Island?—If they have been driven they have names, and your respectable informants can tell what they are. If you do not tell, it is because the statement that any have been drove is a deliberate falsehood.

You charge the Mormons with "stealing most of the fishermen's property." A pile of plunder that would be. Name a thing, one single article, that Mormons have laid felonious hands on, or stand self-convicted of a most foul slander.

You charge "that when steamboats come into Beaver harbor the Mormons flock down on to the docks armed and ready for action," and alledge the authority of respectable steamboat passengers. Mr. Cadwallader, you cannot name one respectable man who will say he ever saw one Mormon go armed upon a dock when a steamboat was there or approaching. It is false as hell. The thing was never done.

Name the boat that was ever so approached. Name the witness who asserts it. One hundred steamboats have called at our docks this season. The Michigan, the Lady, the Sciota, the Ohio, the Troy, seldom pass without stopping. Nearly every boat that runs upon this Lake touches occasionally. The officers of these boats are frequently in Buffalo. If there is one word of truth in what you have asserted, you can inquire of them and get the evidence.

But you will never ask them the question. When you made the assertion you knew it false. You are not near enough a fool to believe its truth possible. It is a deliberate falsehood, said against men far away, to please the officers of the steamer Morton. It is sport to them; it may be to you; but it is death to us.

Mr. Cadwallader doubtless values his own testimony and his own reputation for truth and veracity as high as any man's.—He has charged the Mormons with a long catalogue of the most enormous crimes that ever damned to infamy the human name; and a successful career of wickedness, which, if true, makes them the most bold, the most desperately daring, and the most successful band of robbers that ever pirated on land or sea; and he alleges the highest authority for all these assertions.

And in his apologetic article he drops down to this: "Allow that the lusts of the flesh and the seeking after filthy lucre may have led some of your immaculate body astray,—and we will drop the subject." That is, for all your charges against us you rest upon the mere presumption that among the common errors of mankind we have some share.

Yet you argue that all the stories against us cannot be manufactured. Cannot other men manufacture stories as well as you? Are not others as expert and as reckless in publishing falsehoods? And if your assertions are all "gammon," may not theirs also be?

One other remark of the Rough Notes calls for a passing note: "It would seem that the narrow escape some of the Mormons had about a year ago from the halter of justice, has not produced a good effect on them."

We are aware, Mr. Cadwallader, that the Mormons tried in the United States District Court at Detroit, went to trial prejudged and foredoomed. And how narrow their escape was from judicial murder, we know better than you. The opinion has been generally expressed, both among our friends and enemies, that but for the uprightness of one man we should have been utterly overwhelmed.

Now you will remember they were indicted for robbing the United States mail, the 18th day of Feb., 1851—charged with going out armed, in a body, and attacking the mail train on the ice in front of the Indian village, Garden Island.

Now, Mr. Cadwallader, out of the some two hundred witnesses sworn on that trial, excepting the prosecutors themselves, not a man could be found who would say that he ever heard of the thing till the month of May following.

Mr. McKinley, the prosecuting assistant P. M. on that trial, swore upon his solemn oath, that the Mormons (the prisoners at the bar) did attack the mail train and attempt to take the mail; and yet, upon his cross examination, he testified that in April following, on the opening of navigation, he entrusted that same mail to the Mormons, to be carried to Mackinac, on the schooner Dolphin, owned and navigated by the Mormons, and none but Mormons aboard; and that every mail but one which he sent from the office for a period of eight months, coming down to the commencement of that prosecution, he sent by the hands of the Mormons. There is not one man living within one hundred miles of here who believes that any attempt was made on the mail, or ever believed it.

Even McKinley acknowledged, on his cross examination, that at his own instance a company of thirteen white men and thirty-five Indians came to St. James the day following the affair at Garden Island, and had an interview with Mr. Strang, to remonstrate with him for the Mormons going there to arrest one Eri J. Moore on that occasion; and that during an interview of three hours, attended with angry vituperation and threats against the Mormons, no one accused them of meddling with the mail. Not a soul mentioned it at all.

And these are a very few out of the hundred facts surrounding that prosecution, all showing that the charge was merely trumped up, without one solitary fact on which to found it; licked into shape like a new born cub, by an U. S. District Attorney, and supported solely and alone upon the oaths of witnesses, paid for falsehood deeper than hell, out of public funds from the Treasury of the United States.

LAKE FISH.

We find in the Fredonia Censor a letter describing the success which has attended the experiments made in that part of Lake Erie to catch trout and whitefish. The writer says:

So little known have been the contents of these waters, that until very recently it has been an object of profit to make frequent drafts on Old Connecticut for her salmon trout. But now it is ascertained that we have the very fish in great abundance at our feet. Recent experiments in taking these fish proved very successful. Mr. Andrews, on his return to Dunkirk from California a few months since, aided by an old Mackinac fisherman, set to work in earnest, preparing himself with all the necessary apparatus for fishing on a large scale.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made at different depths of water, and in different ways, but at length the true way was found, and that by turning out some thirteen miles from shore and dropping nets to the depth of nearly or quite 100 feet, and thus letting them remain for some hours when they are hauled up and the fish secured. The trout unlike many other kinds of fish, have no gills, but swim with their mouth open, bridling themselves with the twine of the net, the meshes being too small to allow them to pass through, and they cannot back out because of the structure of their teeth curving inwardly, and thus become their own executioners. Last evening, Mr. Andrews took at one haul over fifteen hundred lbs. of trout and whitefish. In this lot were thirty-three trout weighing about thirty pounds each—a beautiful sight—which sell readily at six cents a pound.

WHAT IS WORTH DOING DO WELL.

To none of the business of life does this injunction apply with so much force as to that of the farmer. The mechanics and the professional men are also reminded that their work should be done well. All classes of men and all branches of business prosper in proportion to the strictness with which this rule is lived up to. It is safe everywhere to conclude that if a thing is worth doing at all, it may be made profitable generally by doing thoroughly and well. The farmer who occupies a farm of two hundred acres, when his means would allow him to take proper care of but fifty acres, does his work badly and gets but poor returns. Fifty acres of land made good and productive, is more profitable than one hundred acres, tolerable good and but indifferently cultivated. And yet are seen hundreds of farmers who have large farms under their direction who get but scanty crops.

They labor hard, but don't seem to get along well. The truth is, they get but half crops, while their outgoes, in the shape of extra labor, extra interest on investment &c., are double. The testimony of all is that such a course is bad policy, and it undoubtedly is bad policy, but still hundreds pursue it, working hard all their life time, and conclude that the business of tilling the soil is a hard business. Let them adopt the motto do well whatever er you do, and tilling the soil is not so hard after all.—Jefferson Farmer.

THE ART OF THINKING.

One of the best modes of improving the art of thinking, is to think over some subject before you read upon it, and then observe after what manner it has occurred to the mind of some great master; you will then observe whether you have been too rash or too timid; what you have omitted and what you have exceeded; and by this process you will insensibly catch the manner in which a great mind views a great question.

It is right to study; not only to think when any extraordinary incident provokes you to think, but from time to time to review what has passed, to dwell upon it, and to see what trains of thought voluntarily present themselves to your mind. It is a most superior habit in some minds to refer all the particular truths which strike them to other truths more general, so that their knowledge is beautifully methodized, and a particular truth at once leads to the general truth.

This kind of understanding has an immense and decided superiority over those confused heads in which one fact is piled upon another, without any attempt at classification or argument. Some men always read with a pen in their hand, and commit to paper any new thought which strikes them; others trust to chance for its appearance. Which of these is the best method in the conduct of the understanding must, I suppose, depend a good deal upon the understanding in question.—Some men can do nothing without preparation—others little with it; some are fountains, others reservoirs.—Sidney Smith.

FOLLIES OF FASHION.

In no instance have the folly and childishness of a large portion of mankind been more strikingly displayed than in those various and occasionally opposite modes in which they have departed from the standard of nature, and sought distinction even in deformity. Thus, while one race of people (the Chinese) crushes the feet of its children, another flattens their heads between two boards; and while we in Europe admire the natural whiteness of the teeth, the Malays file off the enamel, and dye them black, for the all-sufficient reason that dog's teeth are white.

A New Zealand chief has his distinctive coat of arms, emblazoned on his face, as well as on his limbs, and an Esquimaux is nothing if he has not bits of stone stuffed through a hole in each cheek. Quite as absurd, and still more mischievous, is the infatuation which among Europeans, attaches beauty to that modification of the human figure which resembles the wasp, and compresses the waist until the very ribs have been distorted, and the functions of the vital organs irreparably distorted.

MARKS OF THE GENTLEMAN.

No man is a gentleman who, without provocation, would treat with incivility the humblest of his species. It is a vulgarity for which no accomplishments of dress or address can ever atone. Show me the man who desires to make every one happy around him, and whose greatest solicitude is never to give just cause of offence to any one, and I will show you a gentleman by nature and by practice, though he may never have worn a suit of broadcloth nor ever heard of a lexicon. I am proud to say, for the honor of our species, that there are men in every throb of whose heart there is solicitude for the welfare of mankind, and whose every breath is perfumed with kindness.

All you grumblers and growlers about hot weather, get up early in the morning, snuff the fresh breezes of the first breath of day, don't be broiling in your bed-like a shad on a grid-iron, and then get up weak, feeble and emaciated; no wonder if you go through the day just able to keep body and soul together. But if you swallow the last dark streak of retreating night and the first gray tint of appearing day, you will find it will strengthen your system, and recuperate your energies.

GOOD NATURE.—Good nature is a gem which shines brightly wherever it is found. It cheers the darkness of misfortune, and warms the heart that is callous and cold. In social life, who has not seen and felt its influence? Don't let little matters ruffle you. Nobody gains anything by being cross and crabbed. If a friend has injured you; if the world goes hard; if you want employment and can't get your honest dues; or fire has consumed; or water swallowed up the fruits of many years' hard toil; or your faults magnified, or enemies have traduced, or deceived, never mind; don't get mad with any body; don't abuse the world or any of its creatures; keep good natured, and our word for it, all will come right. The soft south wind and the genial sun are not more effectual in clothing the earth with verdure and sweet flowers of spring, than is good nature in adorning the hearts of men and women with blossoms of happiness and affection—those flowers, the fragrance of which ascends to Heaven.

LOCAL AND TRAVELING AGENTS WANTED.

FOR USEFUL AND POPULAR BOOKS, Just Published.

CALIFORNIA ILLUSTRATED, including a Description of the Panama and Nicaragua Routes, with 48 superb Tinted Lithographs, 324 pages, 8vo. Price $3. This work by J. M. Letts, has been adjudged by the unanimous voice of the press, to be the most elaborate, practical, and intensely interesting volume that has yet been written upon this golden theme. BUILDING ON SAND.

'Tis well to woo, 'tis good to wed,
For so the world has done
Since maidens grew, and roses blew,
And morning brought the sun.

But have a care, ye young and fair,—
Be sure ye pledge with truth;
Be certain that your love will wear
Beyond the days of youth;

For if we give not heart for heart,
As well as hand for hand,
You'll find you've played the "unwise" part,
And "built upon the sand."

'Tis well to save, 'tis well to have
A goodly store of gold,
And hold enough of shining stuff,—
For Charity is cold;

But place not all your hope and trust
In what the deep mine brings;
We cannot live on yellow dust
Unmixed with purer things.

And he who piles up wealth alone,
Will often have to stand Beside his coffer-chest, and own
'Tis "built upon the sand."

'Tis good to speak in kindly guise,
And soothe where'er we can;
Fair speech should bind the human mind,
And love link man to man.

But stay not at the gentle words,
Let deeds with language dwell;
The one who pities starving birds
Can scatter crumbs as well.

The Mercy that is warm and true
Must lend a helping hand,
For those who talk, yet fail to do,
But "build upon the sand."

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERRY AND MILLER, 1852.

"My friends spent the night in scraping and removing the tar, and washing and cleaning my body; so that by morning I was ready to be clothed again. This being Sabbath morning, the people assembled for meeting at the usual hour of worship, and among those came also the mobbers; viz., Simmonds Rider, a Campbellite preacher, and leader of the mob; one McClentie, son of a Campbellite minister; and Pelatiah Allen, Esq., who gave the mob a barrel of whiskey to raise their spirits; and many others. With my flesh all scarified and defaced, I preached to the congregation as usual, and in the afternoon of the same day baptized three individuals.

"The next morning I went to see Elder Rigdon, and found him crazy, and his head highly inflamed, for they had dragged him by his heels, and those, too, so high from the earth he could not raise his head from the rough frozen surface, which lacerated it exceedingly; and when he saw me he called to his wife to bring him his razor. She asked him what he wanted of it? and he replied to kill me. Sister Rigdon left the room, and he asked me to bring his razor; I asked him what he wanted of it? and he replied he wanted to kill his wife; and he continued delirious some days. The feathers which were used with the tar on this occasion, the mob took out of Elder Rigdon's house. After they had seized him and dragged him out, one of the banditti returned to get some pillows; when the women shut him in, and kept him some time."

Joseph, after this cruel treatment, thought it high time to absent himself for a little, and on the 2d of April he started, in company with some of his adherents, for Missouri, "to fulfil the revelation." Although he left secretly, his inhuman persecutors received notice of his design, and tracked him for several hundred miles, until he arrived at Louisville, where he was sheltered and protected from his assailants by the captain of a steamboat.—He arrived at "Zion," or Independence, on the 26th, where he was enthusiastically received by a large congregation of thriving "Saints," and solemnly acknowledged as prophet and seer, and president of the high priesthood of the church. He found that in his absence, but in obedience to revelation which he had given, a printing-press had been procured, and a monthly newspaper or magazine established by W. W. Phelps, the "printer to the church," under the title of the Evening and Morning Star. A weekly paper was also planned and established, called the Upper Missouri Advertiser. Both of these journals were exclusively devoted to the interests of Mormonism, which by this time numbered between 2,000 and 3,000 disciples, principally in Missouri.

In January, 1833, while attending to his worldly business, a schism broke out in "Zion" itself, which threatened, and, in combination with other circumstances, ultimately produced, the greatest calamities, and led to the violent expulsion of the Mormons from the whole State of Missouri. The manner in which the Mormons behaved in their "Zion" was not calculated to make friends.

The superiority they assumed gave offence, and the rumors that were spread by their opponents, as well as by some false friends, who had been turned out of the church for misconduct, excited against them an intense feeling of alarm and hatred. They were accused of Communism, and not simply of a community of goods and chattels, but of wives.—BOTH THESE CHARGES WERE UTTERLY UNFOUNDED; but they were renewed from day to day, and found constant believers, in spite of denials and refutations on the part of the Mormons.

"In the month of April," says Joseph in his autobiography, "the first regular mob rushed together, in Independence, (Zion,) to consult upon a plan for the removal, or immediate destruction, of the church in Jackson County. The number of the mob was about three hundred. A few of the first elders met in secret, and prayed to him who said to the wind, 'Be still,' to frustrate them in their wicked design."

"They, therefore, after spending the day in a fruitless endeavor to unite upon a general scheme for 'moving the Mormons out of their diggings,' as they asserted, and becoming a little the worse for liquor, broke up in a regular Missouri 'row,' showing a determined resolution that every man would 'carry his own head.'"

This article was distributed from house to house in Independence and its neighborhood, and contained many false charges against Smith and his associates, reiterating the calumny about the community of goods and wives. The Mormons were insulted and sometimes beaten in the streets and highways, and quarrels and fights were of frequent occurrence.

In the beginning of April, a meeting of three hundred people, enemies of the Mormons, was held in Independence, or "Zion," itself, at which the resolution referred to by Joseph, "that the Mormons should be removed out of their diggings," was unanimously passed. After the publication of these two articles, other meetings were held in various parts of Jackson County, at which still more violent resolutions were agreed to.

A general meeting of the citizens of Jackson County, expressly convened, as the requisition stated, "for the purpose of adopting measures to rid themselves of the sect of fanatics called Mormons," was held on the 20th of July. Between four and five hundred people attended from every part of the county, and an address to the public was agreed upon.

The address stated that little more than two years previously "some two or three of these people made their appearance in Missouri; that they now numbered upwards of 1,200; that each successive autumn and spring poured forth a new swarm of them into the country, as if the places from which they came were flooding Missouri with the very dregs of their composition; that they were but little above the condition of the blacks in regard to property and education; and that, in addition to other causes of scandal and offence, they exercised a corrupting influence over the slaves." The sanguine boast and sincere belief of the Mormons, that the whole country of Missouri was their destined inheritance, and that all the "Gentiles," or unbelievers in Joseph Smith, were to be cut off in the Lord's good time, was not forgotten. The address concluded:

"Of their pretended revelations from heaven—their personal intercourse with God and his angels—the maladies they pretend to heal by the laying on of hands—and the contemptible gibberish with which they habitually profane the Sabbath, and which they dignify with the appellation of unknown tongues, we have nothing to say: vengeance belongs to God alone. But as to the other matters set forth in this paper, we feel called on, by every consideration of self-preservation, good society, public morals, and the fair prospects that, if they are not blasted in the germ, await this young and beautiful country, at once to declare, and we do hereby most solemnly declare—

"That no Mormon shall in future move and settle in this country.

"That those now here, who shall give a definite pledge of their intention within a reasonable time to remove out of the country, shall be allowed to remain unmolested until they have sufficient time to sell their property and close their business without any material sacrifice."

"That the editor of the Star be required forthwith to close his office, and discontinue the business of printing in this country; and, as to all other stores and shops belonging to the sect, their owners must in every case comply with the terms of the second article of this declaration, and upon failure, prompt and efficient measures will be taken to close the same.

"That the Mormon leaders here, are required to use their influence in preventing any further emigration of their distant brethren to this country, and to counsel and advise their brethren here to comply with the above requisitions.

"That those who fail to comply with these requisitions be referred to those of their brethren who have the gifts of divination and of unknown tongues, to inform them of the lot that awaits them."

COLLEGE EXAMINATION.

B—, who has since made quite a noise in the world, while at College, was called upon to undergo an examination in Astronomy. On emerging from the ordeal, one of his companions asked him how he got off. "First rate," said B—; "they only asked me two questions, and I answered them both promptly and correctly." "What were the questions?" "The first was, what was a Parallax? and I told them I didn't know! and the second was, can you calculate an Eclipse? to which I said no! I'd like to see anybody answer two questions more correctly than that!"

HOW THE MAJOR UPSET HIS FORTUNE.

We were all assembled around the blazing fire of mine worthy host of the Cold Spring Hotel, late in the autumn of 1850, relating such stories as might be interesting to ourselves and acceptable to our hearers, that the time might pass pleasantly away, and each one be enabled at a proper hour to retire to his couch, feeling that he had done something to contribute to the general happiness of the social circle, and thereby endeared himself to his brother man.

The clock having just struck ten, we called for a light, and were about ascending to our chamber, when the door opened, and an old man, bent with age, but wearing a happy smile, entered the room and exclaimed—

"What's up, boys? what's up? Telling stories?"

"Yes, Major," chimed a half dozen voices; "we have all of us told one story each this evening, and some of us two; but we have missed you sadly! as you know we have long since set it down as an indisputable fact, that no one can equal the Major in spinning a yarn."

The Major laughed heartily at the compliment, displaying in so doing as beautiful a set of teeth as we have ever seen, and exclaimed—

"And do you want a story from the old man to-night?"

"Yes! yes! by all means!" echoed all the voices.

"What shall it be?" asked the Major.

"Anything! anything!" replied the boys enthusiastically.

"Did I ever tell you," asked the Major, "anything about the fortune that I had left to me when I was about thirty years of age?"

"A fortune? No, indeed," replied the boys.

"We were not aware that you ever had a fortune. Who bequeathed it to you? Was it money, or real estate? Where is it now?"

"Don't be in a hurry," said the Major; "I will answer all your questions by telling you my story."

I contracted the habit of indulging in strong drink, and regardless of the entreaties of an aged and feeble mother, and a faithful and loving wife, that habit so rapidly increased upon me that at the age of thirty I was a confirmed drunkard and a nuisance to society."

"Major! we don't care anything about your intemperance," exclaimed the roughest of the boys present; "give us your story about your fortune."

The Major looked up at this interruption, carefully scanned the impatient and unfeeling youth, and replied—

"It will require a stronger restraint than any that seems to be placed over you now to keep you from following the very steps that I so unfortunately chose, when I ought to have been an honor to that noble mother who so assiduously labored to save her first-born; but as words from an old man will not be likely to cool your impetuosity, I will, as you request, continue my story."

"I know not how or why it was—but after the habit of intemperance became fixed upon me, I conceived the idea that I had a very rich uncle residing somewhere in the West Indies, who would at his death bequeath to me the whole of his immense fortune. This supposition became so strongly impressed upon my mind, that I made it a subject of conversation, night and morning—talked it to the landlords, to my drunken companions, and even to the boys that I met in the street."

"Thus matters stood, when, on returning home one hot night in July from a convivial party at the tavern, I entered my house, and found standing in the hall a large barrel marked with chalk—

"To MAJOR W., I, LORD W., BEQUEATH THIS BARREL OF GOLD."

"The pale moon threw just enough of its soft mellow light through the little panes of glass over the door to enable me to read the direction; and wishing if possible to obtain one blessed sight of the immense treasure without waking my poor care-worn wife—for I still felt for her the only faithful throbs of my once honest heart—I carefully rolled the barrel into the front parlor, and then sought for a hammer with which to take out its head and reveal to me the large, shining lumps of golden ore."

"Not being able to find the hammer, my patience gave way, and in my impetuosity I sprang upon the head of the barrel—it was now standing upon its end—and jumped with all my might, with the expectation of splitting the thin pieces of board into a thousand atoms. But, alas! the head being of a tough and springy nature, slipped clean from the staves and sunk beneath my feet."

"Losing my equilibrium by the uncommon exertion, I fell upon the sharp edges of the staves, and the next instant the barrel and myself came tumbling to the floor."

"What my first sensations were I am unable to say. Perhaps the fright, combined with the great amount of liquor that I had drunk that evening, so confused my mind that I was unable to think very fast. But the first suspicion that I recollect of having entertained was, that I had fallen into the very fangs of the great Sea Serpent and was now, after being rapidly slimed to be swallowed alive."

"Frightened at the noise—for I had yelled like a half starved hyena—my wife sprang from her bed and rushed into the parlor just in time to see me draw my legs from the barrel, and attain a perpendicular position."

"I think the excitement must have been too much for me, for I was put to bed that night without giving or asking for the slightest explanation. But I ascertained next morning that a brother of my wife had the day previous sent her a barrel of soft soap, and one of my own children, as a mere joke, had chalked upon its head the sentence which had caused the mischief."

"My good wife without murmuring in the least, was employed all the next day in accouping up the soap from the best carpet; and before we retired that night, I made her a promise that if she would promise never to tell any one about the soap I would never again taste of intoxicating drinks of any kind. And I've kept my word!"

As the Major finished his story, he took from his capacious pocket a large, luscious apple for each boy present, and putting on his hat, left the room, exclaiming:

"More than thirty years have now passed since the reformation, and to-night, for the first time, I have related how the Major upset his fortune!"

PROGRESS OF MORMONISM.

Elder Curtis E. Bolton, writing from Paris under date of June 14, speaks most encouragingly of his success. He is now holding public meetings, and in the last three weeks had baptized fifteen persons.

Elder Wm. Willis writes from Calcutta, May 2, that since last Christmas Day his Indian brethren had increased from six to one hundred and fifty, and "if ye," says he, "were to include children, we could show more than three hundred Indian Saints of all sizes, colors and languages, not to say a word about dress and undress." The statistics of the Mormons in India at that date were three Elders, eight Priests, nine Teachers, eight Deacons, and one hundred and twenty-two members.—N. Y. Tribune.

A gentleman rode up to a public house in the country, and asked:—"Who is the master of this house?" "I am sir," replied the landlord, "my wife has been dead about three weeks."

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

A LEAF FROM MY LIFE.

Circumstantial evidence most certainly carries with it, in perhaps a majority of cases, strong inducements for belief. Most prominent in my mind is an actual occurrence, and one for which I can vouch, as the subject of it was my only brother.

My native place is a small town in Lincolnshire, England, where my father, my brother, and myself, formed for a few years a small but happy family. My mother died when I was very young, and our education was superintended entirely by my father, till my brother was of sufficient age to enter the lower class of a then celebrated college.

I remember how hard it seemed to me that he should leave us; but as the time wore away, and every letter received from him told how rapidly he was progressing in his studies, and with what favor he was regarded by professors and students, I gradually suffered my lonesome feelings to be superseded by a sort of respectful love for him.

He had, if I remember rightly, entered the third year at college, when we began to hear from different sources strange rumors about him. People would meet father in the street, and say, "Why did your son leave college?" and other things equally mysterious and inexplicable.

"He is still at college," father would answer, and perhaps receive in return an incredulous look, or a singular reply.

Yet my brother spoke of no change in his letters. They were cheerful and confiding as they ever had been, and I have seen my father, when disturbed and troubled by some flying report, sit down at his desk and read them over, and rise up refreshed.

But at last the bolt fell. One evening at dusk, as we were sitting at the front parlor window, the stage drove up, stopped, and my brother walked up to the front door. My father met him in the entry.

"James," said he in a voice very different from his own, and yet with a fearful effort at composure, "why have you returned before the vacation?"

James handed him an open paper. He read, staggered back a few steps, and sank into a chair. I ran for some water, rubbed his face and hands, and slowly and with gasps he revived. He asked me to leave him alone with my brother. I went out of the room, and in going through the entry saw the paper lying on the floor. I picked it up and read:—

"The undersigned, the Faculty of — College, expel James Miller from said college for intentionally taking and appropriating to his own use sundry articles belonging to the students."

This brief document was signed by a number of names. And my brother, on whom I had always looked as one superior to me was a thief! I could not believe it. I walked back and opened the parlor door. I heard father say:—

"I knew, my son, that you could not have so forgotten yourself and me," and the poor man seemed almost happy again. We formed a sorrowful family that evening; yet misfortune seemed to rivet the bands of love.

Tears are at any time affecting, but when a strong man weeps, and when that man is one you are accustomed to love and reverence, the cause must seem to you awful to the last degree. And my father wept, and we all wept. And as no bail could be procured, from before our faces my brother went to prison.

James' trial began about ten days after my father's defeat in the law suit. Confident that innocence was his strongest protection, my brother would have no lawyer, and in this he was counselled by my father, and this probably caused—but I will not anticipate.

Father and myself sat down on that awful morning near the prisoner's seat in the court room. I remember the King's prosecutor opening the case. I have a confused remembrance of witnesses testifying that they had missed such and such things, and had found them in my brother's desk; that he had been seen to enter the room of one of the professors, in the professor's absence, and that from that room were missing different articles; that the professor had kindly taken him aside and told him that if he would restore the property his conduct would be overlooked; that he indignantly and impudently denied all knowledge of it; and finally, so many things were gone, that the Faculty concluded an expulsion would be necessary.

And these charges, were, I recollect, substantiated and woven together in such a manner as to leave no doubt of his guilt in any minds but our own. And as proof after proof was adduced, my father would sink forward and cover his face with his hands, as if to shut out all memory of the world.

The last I recollect was the testimony of the college porter, who alone gave the direct evidence of having seen my brother in the act. I had fainted on my seat, and as I recovered my senses, my father was bending over me, as I lay on a rough bench in a little ante-room.

We went back into the court room, and my brother's small array of witnesses were being called. But they could only testify to his reputation and general deportment through life, and as they had soon finished, James rose to make his defence.

He stated, as nearly as he could remember, his occupation at the times when the missing property was stolen. Oh! I knew he was telling the truth, and the whole truth. He spoke of his resolution on entering college to give his whole attention to his studies, taking his father's counsels as his guide. He remarked with how much success he had been favored, what a high academical position he had held, and how every prospect was destroyed, and every expectation blasted by this fatal charge. And I remember how sure I was that he must be acquitted.

Were it not that I am now old and my sensibilities hardened by contact with the world, I could not go on. The jury, after a short absence, returned. They said my poor brother was "GUILTY." And do not wonder at my feelings, in this happy land and in this happy age. For we know that forty years since in England theft was punishable with—DEATH. And my brother James, whom I had played with, and talked with, and whom I loved, was hung; and my father died in an insane asylum.

But at last in the year 1840, the man who was the college porter, at the time of which I have written, confessed on his death bed that he had placed those articles on my brother's premises, and had sworn away my brother's life. By a singular judgment of God, every one of the college Faculty, but one, who is now living, died sudden or violent deaths. And am I a man to believe in the infallibility of circumstantial or even direct evidence?

THE TURKISH SULTAN.

One of the most interesting articles we have perused in a long time, appeared in the last number of the Knickerbocker Magazine. The subject discussed was the Turkish Government, and very many facts are related which, to our readers, will be matters of interest. The present Sultan, Abdul-Mejid, is in his twenty-ninth year, and succeeded his father in 1839, when but seventeen years of age.

Previous to his accession to the throne, but little was known of his life, or the way in which he was brought up. He had several sisters and one brother, all by other mothers than his own. The former have since his accession died, with the exception of one, who is a wife of the present Minister of War. His brother still lives, and resides with the Sultan in his palace. The mother of the Sultan was a Circassian slave. She still lives.

She is a large, portly lady, yet in the prime of life, and resides with her son, over whom she exercises great influence. In person the Sultan is of middle stature, slender, and of a delicate frame. His address, when unrestrained by official forms and ceremony, is gentle and kind in the extreme—more affable and engaging than that of his Pachas; and no one can approach him without being won by the goodness of heart which his demeanour indicates.

He has never been known to commit an act of severity or injustice; his purse and his hand have always been open for the indigent and unfortunate; and he takes a peculiar pride in bestowing his honors upon men of science and talent. Among his own subjects he is very popular and much beloved; they perceive and acknowledge the benefit of the reforms which he has instituted, and he no longer need apprehend any opposition on their part.

In some of the most distant portions of his empire, such as Albania, where perhaps foreign influence is exerted to thwart his plans, his new system of military rule has not yet been carried out; but it evidently soon will be, especially when its advantage over the old is felt by the inhabitants.

The palaces of the Sultan, on both banks of the Bosphorus, though externally showy are very plain and simple in their interior arrangement. They are surrounded by high walls, and guarded by soldiery.

The first block of buildings which the traveler approaches on visiting them, up the Bosphorus, are the apartments of the eunuchs, the second his harem, or female apartments, and the third those of the Sultan. Beyond these are the offices of his secretaries, guard, and band of music, all beyond the walls of the palace. The number of eunuchs is some sixty or eighty, and the females in the harem about three hundred to four hundred.

The Sultan never marries; all the occupants of his harem are slaves, and he generally selects from four to six ladies as his favorites, who bear children to him, and who succeed to his throne. The remainder of the females are employed as maids of honor, who attend upon his mother, his favorites, his brother's mother's favorite, if he have one, and upon his children.

Many hold offices in the palace, and are charged with the maintenance of good order and regularity. Many of them are aged females, who have been servants to his father, his mother, and sisters and brothers, and have thus claims upon his kindness and protection. The only males who have the right of entrance to the imperial harem are the eunuchs, all of whom are black. The chief of their corps is an "aged gentleman of color," possessing the Sultan's confidence in an eminent degree, and in official, and is higher than any other individual connected with the imperial palace.

The eunuchs are assigned to the service of the different ladies of the harem, do their shopping in the bazaars, carry their messages, and accompany them on their visits. Indeed, their duties are much like those of well bred gallants in our country, without any of the ambitious feelings which animate the latter, and certainly they never aspire to the possession of their affections.

Some of them grow wealthy, possess much property, and slaves of both sexes, but as they can have no families, the Sultan is their legal heir. Eunuchs are possessed by many of the pachas and other officers of rank, for the purpose of serving their wives, sisters and daughters; they cost four or five times as much as an ordinary black slave, and the highest officers seldom possess more than ten of them at once.

The Sultan's palace is peculiarly his private home, and no officers of high rank occupy it with him. He has four private secretaries, and as many chamberlains. He has also two aids-de-camp, who are generally in command of the body guard, which has its quarters in the vicinity of the palace. He seldom, however, commands their attendance; their duties are to keep watch at the principal entrances, and to salute him or any of his higher officers who may arrive at or leave the royal residence.

The secretaries write out his orders, and the chief of their number receives all foreign functionaries or Turkish dignitaries who visit the palace on business. One of them is the Sultan's interpreter, and translates articles for his perusal from the foreign papers received from Europe and America by the Sultan.

All official documents are sent to the chief secretary by the different ministers of the Sublime Porte, and those received from the foreign embassies and legations are translated there, previous to being transmitted to the Sultan. No foreign legation ever transacts any official business directly with the Sultan, or through the chief (private) secretary; but the latter may be visited on matters relating to the sovereign personally.

Documents from the Sublime Porte are always communicated through the Grand Vezir, who has a number of port folios, in which these are placed, and he sends them to the palace by certain functionaries charged especially with their conveyance. Of these the Vezir possesses one key, and the Sultan or his chief secretary, another.

The Sultan passes several hours of the day, from eleven till three, in perusing these papers, and in hearing their perusal by the private secretary before him; and his imperial commands are traced on their broad margin, either by his own hand in red ink, (as is customary in China,) or he directs his secretary to do it for him.— So very sacred are all manuscripts coming from his pen, that these papers seldom ever leave the bureaux to which they belong, except after his decease. It is only on such documents that the autograph of the Sultan is ever seen.

INDIAN TRIBES OF ILLINOIS.

The following interesting sketch of the various tribes of Indians, who once resided in Illinois, is taken from Governor Reynolds' History, recently published:—

The Illinois confederacy embraced five different tribes; the Peorias, Cahokias, Tammarias, Mitchagamies, and Kaskaskias. The Mitchagamies at first occupied the shores of Lake Michigan, and gave the name of the lake. Afterwards we find them located on the Mississippi, near Fort Chartres, in the present county of Monroe, Illinois. They inhabited this tract of country before the year 1720, as the French government reserved their lands from the whites from that date. Afterwards they became extinct as a nation, and the remains merged into the Kaskaskias tribe.

The Peorias, Cahokias and Kaskaskias occupied, respectively, the villages of Peoria, Cahokia and Kaskaskia, and the country adjacent. The French continued the names of these villages, which they retain to this day. The Tammarias inhabited also the village of Cahokia, and the country round about. They have left no name of any locality, indicating their residence in Illinois, except, perhaps, the Twelve mile Prairie, in St. Clair county. In olden times this prairie was called "Prairie Tammarias."— This tribe may have had a village in or near this prairie; but it has been swept off by time, so that their existence is only known in history.

These were the confederated tribes of Illinois Indians, who were gradually driven off by their enemies from the north to the south, until they took refuge among the whites, near the village of Kaskaskia and Cahokia. They diminished for more than one hundred years, and left their country at least, being a remnant only of their former greatness.

A melancholy reflection forces itself upon us, that the nearer the Indians reside to the white population, so much the worse it is for the Indians; and all the attempts heretofore made by the most worthy and pious men to christianize and civilize the nations, have produced an injury rather than a blessing to them.— There may be some exceptions to this statement, but they are only exceptions which do not disprove the statement.

The Piankeshawa inhabited the country on both sides of the Wabash, towards its mouth, and between the sources of the Kaskaskia and Saline rivers, to the Ohio. They have left no name in the country they occupied.

The Shawnee Indians had a village, in ancient times, on the north bank of the Ohio river, and inhabited the adjacent country. The same site is now occupied by Shawneetown, in Gallatin county, Illinois.

The Miamis inhabited the north-eastern section of the present State of Illinois, but their country mostly lay east of that.

The Pottawatamie Indians occupied, in modern times, a large portion of the north-east section of Illinois. They were a branch of the great Chippeway nation, and were also connected with the ancient Miamis. They extended their hunting and fishing almost the whole length of the Illinois river. But towards Chicago was their main residence. Branches of this nation extended to Wisconsin, Michigan and Indiana. They were the largest nation of the west in modern times, and figured ferociously in the wars against the whites.

The Winnebagoes, or "Puants," as the French called them, from their unsavory and "ancient fishy smell," inhabited the country west of Green Bay. The old French maps often call this bay "Le Bai des Puants," from these Indians.

These Indians occupied a section of the northern part of Illinois on Rock river, but their country, for the most part, lay north and east of that in Illinois. They were a large nation, but dirty and savage in their habits. If we can say anything of the Indians—that they advanced in civilization—it will be nearer true to say, the Winnebagoes advanced backwards.

There is a tradition amongst the Winnebagoes, and other nations, that the Winnebagoes migrated from the west and settled near the lakes. They claim no connection with the other Indians, nor do I think there is any. Their language is different from any other near them. Almost all the nations in the west have some affinity in their language, except the Puants. They speak a guttural language, and it is very difficult to learn or speak it. An interpreter must be raised with them, to be able to speak or understand their language. They are a stout, robust people, and about the copper color of their Indian neighbors. Their cheek bones are higher, and they are generally a degree more uncouth and savage than the other tribes near them. I presume they are not connected with any of the other tribes in the west.

A small but energetic tribe of Indians, the Kickapoos, resided on the east side of the State of Illinois and Wabash rivers, and including the Sangamon river and the country thereabouts. Some lived in villages near the Elkheart Grove, and on the Mackinaw river. They claimed relationship with the Pottawatamies, and perhaps the Sauks and Foxes also. This nation was the most bitter enemy the whites ever had. It may be said in truth of this tribe, that they were the "first in battle, and the last at a treaty with the American."

They were more civilized, and possessed more energy and talents than the other Indians in their vicinity. They were also more industrious and cleanly. They were better armed for war or the chase. This energy, and their implacable enmity to the United States, caused them to be first and the most efficient in all the Indian battles with the whites, in the north-west. They bore a conspicuous part against Harmar, St. Clair and Wayne; and at Tippecanoe they were first in all the bloody charges of that savage battle.

The Kickapoos disliked the United States so much, that they decided that when they left Illinois, they would not reside within the limits of our government, but settle in Texas. What will they do now? Texas is annexed and forms part of our Union. The northern tribes of Indians waged a destructive war against the Illinois Indians for ages, and at last nearly exterminated them.

The last hostile attack was made by the Kickapoos, in 1805, against the poor Kaskaskia Indian children. These children were gathering strawberries in the prairie above Kaskaskia, in this year, and their relentless enemy captured and carried away a considerable number of them. The Kaskaskias followed the Kickapoos, to recapture the children, a long distance but failed to overtake them. The enemy escaped with the children to their towns, and thus ended this outrage.

Power in the hands of frail men—Indian or white—is apt to be abused. The northern Indians destroyed the Illinois tribes, because they had the power; and the white man destroys the Indian, and occupies his country, because the civilized man has the power.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, SEPT. 9, 1852.

SAUT CANAL.

The editor of the Lake Superior Journal—who, by the way, ought to know better than any body else—expresses the opinion that the appropriation of 750,000 acres of land for the Saut Canal will fail of accomplishing the work, and looks to the Canadian Government to open steam navigation from Huron to Superior.

With the highest appreciation of the Journal's information and judgment in the premises, we cannot come to the same conclusion. Lands judiciously selected, and selected with reference to the expected improvement, are certainly available as cash at sixty cents per acre, or a little less than one-half the minimum price. 750,000 acres at that rate are worth $450,000, and are ready means at that rate.

The first quality of stone locks of a capacity sufficient for the largest class of lake steamers can be constructed for $5,000 per foot lift—say forty feet lift from the foot of Lake Superior (and we think it is much less) $200,000. This leaves $250,000 for about one mile of excavation of canal—say sixteen feet deep, and two hundred wide.

Less than a quarter of the excavation is in rock, and that of a soft texture, and favorable for working. Part of the way it would only be necessary to dig on one side and raise a bank on the other.

From the compact nature of the earth the drainage would be light, and can all be accomplished by no more than two pumps.

Stone for the locks, of the best quality in the United States, can be obtained at Drummond Island without a rod of land transportation.

We have entered into no particular calculation of the amount or expense of the work, but this very cursory view of it convinces us that the appropriation is abundantly sufficient to secure the completion of the work, if not to do it. If, indeed, it should do but half the work, the canal itself ought to be good security for a loan of the other half; and, indeed, if it is not, it is not worth building.

Taking any view of it, the work must now be done; for, long delayed by both American and British authorities, there seems now to be a strife which shall accomplish it.

GRATUITOUS LYING.

Almost every sail craft which has visited this harbor from any of the fishing grounds, for six weeks past has brought the report that the fishermen and Indians were just about to make a foray upon the Mormons and destroy them. Yet not the first act of open hostility has yet been done here.

The only act looking that way was the base dastardly act of cutting the cords and destroying an old gang of nets belonging to some Mormon fishermen at the head of this Island. And those who descend to such meanness, will never conquer and drive off the Mormons. The truth is, nobody expects any war, except a half dozen old grannies down at Mackinac.

Not long since R. Peckham, then a merchant at this place, met in Mackinac Capt. Shepard, who is carrying on a fishery on High Island, and told him the Mormons had stolen his nets, and gave Cooper, Shepard's foreman, as authority.

Shepard has met with serious misfortunes during the past year, and the announcement fell with crushing weight upon him. But when he got home not a net was gone. His fishermen had never heard of the theft, and the Capt. owes no thanks for such gratuitous lying.

This same Peckham having involved himself in a series of liabilities to various persons whom he purchased his goods of, which he is unable to meet, has closed his business and slipped off, and now attempts to justify his dishonest acts by saying the Mormons have robbed him. All the facts considered, nothing could be more gratuitous than this falsehood.

Last year, when most of the Mormons were absent, prisoners on various malicious prosecutions, Peckham settled here, and in a private way made himself a "common gull-trap" to receive the property of which they were plundered. In this way he purchased and sold large quantities of wood, which were stolen from them.

When Johnson and McCulloch succeeded in recovering from one Chapman a judgment of about eighty dollars for wood he had stolen of them, and were about to levy on his property to collect it, Peckham came forward and pretended to have purchased the property and paid the cash for it. The fraud was detected, and they collected their debt. But there still remained in Peckham's hands over one hundred dollars, and he never returned to Chapman one cent.

Last December Peckham chartered the schooner A. J. Vieau to bring him a cargo, which arrived as late as the 17th or 18th Dec. To induce the agent to send here, he agreed to furnish the men who remained aboard through the winter, and her outfit in the spring, and to give her a full freight back at the first opening in the spring, and to pay prices commensurate with the perils and expenses of the undertaking.

But as soon as he had her here, and winter locked so that she could not leave, he turned out her winter supplies at a most exorbitant price; and immediately posted off to Mackinac and obtained an attachment against her, under which $117.11 costs were made before the owners could possibly get here.

The owners had to pay $273.57 to get the vessel out of his hands. If Peckham was not guilty of robbing in this, we would like to know what the Mormons could do to make them guilty.— It is quite gratuitous for such a man to complain of being robbed by any species of unfair dealing.

Mr. Peckham was very industrious in rooting out all the traders at this place, pretending that he wanted to get rid of all the enemies to the Mormons, so as to give them a chance in the world. This pretence was another piece of gratuitous lying. His sole object was to get an exclusive monopoly of trade.

In pursuing this object he entangled in the meshes of his net one Andrew Thayer, a Gentile like himself, and the only one who remained with him for the winter business. Pursuing steadily the policy of using up and removing all competitors, he brought a suit against Thayer before Mr. Strang and recovered, and on the coming out of his execution levied on his entire stock in trade, disregarding the law which exempts $250.00.

Mr. Thayer prosecuted suits before Mr. Chidester to recover damages for taking his property contrary to law, and succeeded in two suits to the extent of $122.00, on one of which he executed Peckham's property to the amount of eighty dollars.

The reader will bear in mind that this is a controversy between two Gentiles, in which the Mormons had no interest. That the only connection they ever had with it is that one of them, as a Justice of the Peace, gave judgment on it, and another served an execution. Yet because they have faithfully sustained the law, they are accused of robbery. If the world are not all in danger of being eaten by the calves, this must be most gratuitous lying.

of flour, pork, &c., was piled up in an old framed shed, enclosed only by a single course of boards, and they merely tacked on. At that time the Mormons were in the proportion of one thousand to about twenty Gentiles. The principal wood road passed against this shed, and no person slept within ten rods of it. Any person desiring to do so could have carried off this flour and pork by the sled load, and could never have been tracked a step. Mr. Peckham, before he determined to quarrel with the Mormons, often alluded to this fact, and asserted that he had not been trespassed upon to the value of a pin, as evidence of the uncommon honesty of his neighbors, the Mormons. Is it not gratuitous lying for him now to accuse the Mormons of robbing him?

A short time since a quantity of fish were executed here as the property of Ray Peckham. To prevent their being sold, Mr. Peckham assured the constable that they were not his property, but belonged to a Mr. Goff. Mr. Goff also claimed them, and presented a bill of sale of them signed by Peckham.

But as this sale had not been accompanied or followed by any change of possession, the constable, under counsel, held it fraudulent as against creditors, and sold the fish. Peckham has since, for the purpose of replevying the fish, made oath that they were his. Is not this gratuitous lying? If it is not, what sort of lying was that when he asserted that he did not own the fish, but Goff did?

Not long since, the Collector at Mackinac was on board a little hooker—the Sloop Defiance—with several passengers all engaged in discoursing on the criminal conduct of the Mormons; when, that he might not be without a share of accusation, he asserted that the Mormons stole his boat. (He alluded to the Light-house boat at Isle-le-Galet. These officials never can divest themselves of the opinion that they own the Government property.)

Another passenger, after he got through, informed him that the boat had been found, and that it was ascertained that it had not been stolen at all, but had only floated off for want of proper fastenings. And he replied that that was just what he expected from the first. Was not his accusation gratuitous lying?

The elections for county officers and for Representatives and Senator for the Upper Peninsula come off the last Tuesday of the present month. Why does not the election notice make its appearance? It is the duty of the Sheriff to forward the notice to every Town Clerk, and to publish it in some newspaper published in the county. There can be no good reason why it is not forthcoming.

The water is receding in the Lake, and is now four inches less than in June. The last rise is beyond question the highest in a century, as it has drowned out timber land and killed the timber of more than a century's growth.

A REAL CASE OF STEALING.
Not long since two Gentile fishermen at the head lost a gang of nets. As usual they laid the loss to the Mormons. The next night two Mormon fishermen near by lost a gang of nets.—They supposed the current had swept them off. After a short time their buoys and pieces of cord came ashore, so cut and injured as to show that they had been deliberately destroyed.

After a few days the same Gentiles lost another gang of nets. Since making a vain effort to find them, they sent word to one of the principal Mormons, offering to return the nets their Mormon neighbor had lost if their own were returned to them. Of course they have them. Else why should they offer to return them? The Mormons were not so lucky.—They had no stolen property to return.

We understand the subject will undergo a judicial investigation, and hope it may result in ferreting out some real criminals.

We have just had a treat of some excellent melons, the growth of this Island. Ripe pumpkins are coming forward.—The agricultural prospects of the place are good; and the numerous openings made the present season, and the large increase in the number of cattle, look well for our growth and prosperity.

Hester L. Stevens, Democrat, and George Bradley, Whig, are in nomination for Congress from the District extending from beyond Pontiac to the Isle Royal.

The number of Indians in this region is considerably increased. They are returning from beyond the Mississippi, where the tribes are rapidly melting away.

The annual meetings of the several School Districts come off on the last Monday of Sept. inst. We call attention of the several District officers to their duties in making up returns.—The census of school children, precedes the annual meeting not more than ten days. This must be attended to in season to secure our proper share in the public funds.

The Indians are rapidly congregating at Mackinac to attend payment. This is much earlier than usual, and is better for the Indians.

We have heard constant rumors of wars for a fortnight past. But these things have not moved any of us.

We are in receipt of some beautiful Tomatoes fully ripe, grown in the garden of Mrs. Barker on this Island.

Apples and potatoes from the Indians of Cross Village, are in Market.

The crop of wild hay is better than last year, but is not sufficient for the increased amount of stock now here.

"I do not profess to be a married man, but my rule has ever been to carefully examine the cheap commodities of life. A 'cheap' hotel is my horror; a 'cheap' shirt is a day and night-mare, laden with the sighs of heartbroken seamstresses; a 'cheap' coat disfigures God's image; 'cheap' boots give corns; 'cheap' education is dear at any price, and so are 'cheap' law and 'cheap' medicine; and above all, 'cheap' travel is so married to culpable negligence and carelessness, that one need value his life at the price which Burns' epigram hero valued his when he offered the boatman a farthing for saving him from a watery grave. And to sum it all up to a 'T', there is just the difference of that letter between cheap and cheat."—Cor. N. O. Bulletin.

FROM UTAH.
We have received a file of the Deseret News to June 26th. There was good weather, growing crops, and universal peace among the "Saints." Nothing is said of any internal difficulties.

Presidents Young and Kimball, with the exploring company, had returned to Deseret City, on Friday the 21st of May, all in good health and fine spirits, having visited many Indian tribes, and all the settlements in the southern part of the Territory. They speak highly of the industry and perseverance of the brethren, generally, in their new locations. But little has been done at Coal creek toward the manufacturing of iron; though their dwelling-houses, gardens, corrals, &c., are now completed, and the settlement is newly organized into an iron manufacturing company which, it is expected, will prosecute the business without delay.

Emigrants were beginning to flock in into the Territory. They bring information that the Pawnee Indians are very hostile, having killed many emigrants; in one instance having killed a whole company consisting of five wagons.—Cleveland Herald.

And this is the end of the story about Brigham's running away. We are glad of it. Brigham is a bad fellow, but he is lied about because he is a Mormon.

A MODERN PATRIARCH.
A correspondent of the Cleveland Herald gives the following:—"Steaming it up the Sant River yesterday, we noticed the 'retreat' of one who is emphatically a father of the people. Major Rains is an Englishman, and probably the only man in the world, save the Grand Turk, who is the father of sixty-two children, all living. His wife is now living in Canada, and occasionally visits the patriarch, who domicils with two English sisters—not spirit brides—as the weight of evidence and 'cloud of witnesses' prove. And yet this Major lives on St. Joseph's Island! What's in a name?"

Sixty-two children make rather a large family for three mothers, as well as for one father.—Will not the Herald's correspondent come down about fifty?

Withal the Major is an intelligent and amiable gentleman; did most eminent service in the Peninsular campaigns, and is a faithful and efficient magistrate. If he does domicile with two English sisters, he don't cast off his children to beggary and the poor house, as do many of those who would like to call him immoral.

MINNESOTA SALT REGION.—Probably there is not a richer salt region on the face of the earth than the one in Minnesota. That Territory is generally supposed to be valuable for its agricultural resources alone; nothing, however, can be more erroneous. True, its natural wealth is probably second to none in the Mississippi valley, but its mineral wealth is not less extensive and valuable.

Among the latter its salt stands pre-eminent. This region lies between forty-seven and forty-nine degrees north latitude, ninety-seven and ninety-nine degrees west longitude. Its exact locality was ascertained and defined by an expedition sent out from Fort Snelling under Major Long in 1822-3. The same Major Long who, afterwards was commander of the expedition across the Rocky Mountains to explore the Columbia River and Oregon Territory, known as "Long's Expedition." A description of that salt region together with its locality, will be found in the Topographical Department at Washington. Our first information of that salt region was from a soldier in the expedition. He says that they had been traveling for several days over a vast rolling plain, with no trees or water, the troops and horses were almost famishing with thirst, when they came suddenly upon the shore of a beautiful lake about half a mile in diameter, sunk down deep in the plain. It resembling more a vast "sink hole." From the height above the waters, a vast snow bank appeared to line its shore, but upon examination, it proved to be an incrustation of salt as pure and white as snow. The waters of the lake also were like the strongest brine. So strong was it that one bathing in it, upon coming out in a few minutes he would be covered with the white crystallization of salt. If this salt region be as rich as it is supposed to be, a railroad projected into it would prove to be the best stock in the country. There are mines of undeveloped wealth more extensive, more durable, and more important than all the gold regions beyond the Rocky Mountains. We hope the attention of the public and the government will be turned to the subject. There is a region lying in our immediate neighborhood almost unknown, containing more intrinsic wealth than any other State in the Union, and which would yield an annual income probably equaling the entire revenues of the country.—Spoke.

The St. Genevieve Plaindealer has the following:—

We extract the following paragraph from a letter which the captain of the Whirlwind kindly handed us. The date, 25th June:—

"Every person that was able to leave Jackson, Missouri, did so, and have not yet returned. Since last Sunday there was not enough left to bury the dead. Some eight or ten lay corpses in different houses several days. The town of Jackson looks like a deserted farm; business of every kind is suspended, and every dwelling house was locked up."

The cause of this disease breaking out is attributed to a negro ball. It appears the negroes danced late, ate plenty and danced freely; on the day following, fifteen of the company died.

A MODEL LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION.

The following is said to have been given by Benjamin Franklin, to a person requesting from him a letter of recommendation. How beautiful its simple honesty appears:—

"PARIS, April, 1777.
Sir: The bearer, going to the United States, presses me to give him a letter of recommendation, although I know nothing of him, not even his name. This may seem extraordinary, but I assure you it is not uncommon here. Sometimes indeed, one person brings another equally so to recommend one another. As to this gentleman, I must refer you to himself for his character and morals, with which he certainly is better acquainted than I can be. I recommend him, however, to civilities which every stranger, of which I know no harm, has a right to; and I request you will do him all the good offices, and show him all the favor that, on further acquaintance, you shall find he deserves."
B. FRANKLIN."

OJIBWA LAND-HOLDERS.

Four hundred acres of land, situated on Sugar Island, a few miles below this place, were sold yesterday at the Land Office, to four Indians of the Sant Ste. Marie Band. They have been very wisely advised by their able Interpreter, Mr. EUSTACHE ROUSSAIN, to secure small tracts of excellent agricultural and wood land of this beautiful Island. We know of no more desirable location for a settlement of Indian farmers than Sugar Island, and now that our Indians are inclined to settle and make for themselves comfortable homes, we hope their annuities will be invested in this land instead of in whiskey, as has too often been the case with our natives heretofore. This evidence of improvement in their social condition is certainly cheering to the well-wishers of this ancient people, and, we doubt not, they will find every encouragement from their white neighbors in their noble undertaking.—Lake Superior Journal.

LOCAL AND TRAVELING AGENTS WANTED,

FOR USEFUL AND POPULAR BOOKS,
Just Published.

CALIFORNIA ILLUSTRATED, including a Description of the Panama and Nicaragua Routes, with 48 superb Tinted Lithographs, 324 pages, 8vo, Price $2. This work by J. M. Letts, has been adjudged by the unanimous voice of the press, to be the most elaborate, practical, and intensely interesting volume that has yet been written upon this golden theme. Since the publication of Stevens' Journal of Travels, no work has appeared that has created such a thrilling sensation. It is pre-eminently practical, and is interspersed with incidents of the most amusing character. In the language of one of the city editorials it "is a perfect daguerreotype of California, taken by the noon-day sun."

Also, Dr. Beach's great work on medicine, the American Practice and Family Physician, 800 pages, 200 engravings, 8vo, sheep, Price, $5. Dr. Beach is at the head of the eclectic practice in this country. Such was the demand, that eighteen thousand copies of this work were printed in one edition.

Also, Dr. C. D. Drummond's work on the same principles of practice, Medical Information for the Million or True Guide to Health, 12mo, cloth, 528 pages. Price $1.50, cloth, $1. paper covers, 4th thousand.

Also, a new and very useful article of Stationery for the preservation of valuable papers,

&c. Its form is that of a scrap-book, with leaves prepared for the reception of the article to be held, thus superceding with many advantages, the practice of binding.

Orders for books above advertised, with cash or postage stamps accompanying, will be promptly filled, prepaid, to any part of the United States. Address,

DROOP NOT UPON YOUR WAY.

Ho! ye who start a noble scheme,
For general good designed—Ye workers in a cause that tends To benefit your kind—
Mark out the path you would tread,
The game ye mean to play,
And if it be an honest one,
Keep steadfast on your way.

Although ye may not gain at once
The points ye most desire,
Be patient—time can wonders work—
Plod on, and do not tire;
Obstructions, too, may crowd your path,
In threatening stern array,
Yet flinch not! fear not!—they may prove Mere shadows in your way.

Then, while there's work for you to do, Stand not desponding by—
Let "Forward" be the move ye make,
Let "Onward" be your cry:
And when success has crowned your plans,
"Twill all your pains repay,
To see the good your labor's done;
Then droop not on your way!

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

This sarcastic, but very earnest and emphatic address, was unanimously adopted. The meeting adjourned for two hours, and a deputation waited upon Mr. Phelps, the Mormon editor, upon Mr. Partridge, the bishop, and upon the keeper of the Mormon store, and urged upon them the expediency of complying with these terms. The deputation reported to the meeting that they could not procure any direct answer, and that the Mormons wished an unreasonable time for consultation upon the matter, not only among themselves in Independence, but with Joseph Smith, their prophet, in Kirtland. It was therefore resolved, nem. con., that the Star Printingoffice should be immediately razed to the ground, and the types and presses secured. "This resolution," said the anti-Mormons, in an account of the occurrence published under their authority, "was with the utmost order, and the least noise and disturbance possible, forthwith carried into execution, as also some other steps of a similar tendency, but no blood was spilled, nor any blows inflicted." The meeting then adjourned for three days, to give the Mormons an opportunity of considering what their fate was likely to be in case they should ultimately refuse to leave the county.

The "other steps of a similar tendency," alluded to in this extract, appear to have been the tarring and feathering of two Mormons. Phelps, the editor, managed to escape from the mob, but Partridge, the Mormon bishop, and another Saint named Allen, were not so fortunate.—These two were seized, according to the established back-wood or Lynch fashion, stripped naked, tarred and feathered, and set loose. The Lieutenant-Governor of the State of Missouri, Lilburn W. Boggs—a man who from thenceforward appears to have pursued the Mormons with unrelenting hostility—was in the immediate neighborhood of the riot, but declined to take any part in preserving the peace.—Joseph Smith afterwards stated that he actually looked on, and aided the movement, saying to the Mormons, "You know what we Jackson boys can do. You must all leave the county." A Presbyterian preacher is also reported to have declared from the pulpit that "the Mormons were the common enemies of mankind, and ought to be destroyed."—On the morning of the 23d of July, the meeting again assembled. It was composed of several hundred persons, well armed, and bearing the red flag in sign of vengeance. They declared their intention of driving the whole sect forcibly out of Missouri, if they would not depart peaceably. The Mormons saw that it was useless to resist, and their leaders agreed, if time were given, that the people should remove westward into the wilderness. It was arranged, and an agreement was duly signed to that effect, that one half of the Mormons, with their wives and families, should depart by the 1st of January, and the other half by the 1st of April next ensuing; that the paper should be discontinued; and that no more Mormons should be allowed to come into the country in the interval. The opposite party pledged themselves that no violence should be done to any Mormon, provided these conditions were complied with.

In these distressing and perilous circumstances, Oliver Cowdery was despatched to Kirtland with a message to the "Prophet." On his arrival, it was resolved, in solemn conclave, Joseph himself presiding, to appeal for protection to Mr. Dunklin, the Governor of the State of Missouri, and to demand justice for the outrages inflicted.

Governor Dunklin wrote a sensible and conciliatory letter in reply to the Mormon petition, in which he stated that the attack upon them was illegal and unjustifiable, and recommended them to remain where they were, and to apply for redress to the ordinary tribunals of the county.

This letter was widely circulated, and the Mormons, upon the strength of it, resolved to remain in Missouri, and "proceed with the building up of Zion." They commenced actions against the ringleaders of the mob, and engaged, for a fee of 1,000 dollars, the best legal assistance they could procure to support their case.—But on the 30th of October, the mob was once again in arms to expel them.

Ten houses of the "Saints" were unroofed and partially demolished, at a place called Big Blue; and on the following day several houses were sacked at Independence. The Mormons, in some instances, defended their property, and a regular battle ultimately ensued between thirty of the Saints, armed with rifles, and a large company of their opponents, also well armed. In this encounter two of the anti-Mormons were killed.

Things at last assumed so alarming an aspect, that the militia, under the command of Lieutenant-Governor Boggs, was called out. The militia, however, was anti-Mormon to a man, and the unhappy Saints saw that they had no alternative but in flight. The blood that had been shed had caused such an exasperation against them, that it was unsafe for a solitary Mormon to show himself in the towns or villages. The women first took the alarm, and fled, with their children, across the Missouri river.

"On Thursday, Nov. 7th," says the account in the Times and Seasons, "the shore began to be lined on both sides of the ferry with men, women, and children, goods, wagons, boxes, chests, provisions; while the ferrymen were busily engaged in crossing them over; and when night again closed upon the Saints, the wilderness had much the appearance of a camp-meeting.

Hundreds of people were seen in every direction, some in tents, and some in the open air, around their fires, while the rain descended in torrents. Husbands were inquiring for their wives, and women for their husbands; parents for their children, and children for parents. Some had the good fortune to escape with their family, household goods, and some provisions; while others knew not the fate of their friends, and had lost all their goods.

The scene was indescribable, and would have melted the hearts of any people upon earth except the blind oppressor, and prejudiced and ignorant bigot. Next day the company increased, and they were chiefly engaged in felling small cotton-trees, and erecting them into temporary cabins, so that when night came on, they had the appearance of a village of wigwams, and the night being clear, the occupants began to enjoy some degree of comfort.

The Saints who fled took refuge in the neighboring counties, mostly in Clay County, which received them with some degree of kindness. Those who fled to the county of Van Buren were again driven and compelled to flee, and those who fled to Lafayette County were soon expelled, or the most of them, and had to move wherever they could find protection."

A THRILLING SKETCH.

One of our exchanges gives the following account of a mother's courage under trying circumstances:—A lady residing in the vicinity of Worcester, was picking berries in a field near her house, having with her an only child, a bright-eyed little fellow of less than a year old.—The babe sat upon the ground in an open space, amusing himself with grasping a clump of yellow weeds that grew within his reach, and eating berries brought him from time to time by his mother.

The latter at length, intent upon gathering the fine fruit, passed around a rock which hid her child from view. She was about to return to him, when hearing him laughing and crowing in great glee, and thinking he must be safe as long as he was so happy, she remained a little longer where she was.

Suddenly the little voice ceased, and after another minute's delay, the young mother stepped upon the rock and looked over, expecting to see her babe asleep; instead of which, he was sitting perfectly motionless, his lips parted, and his wide open eyes fixed with a singular expression upon some object which at first she was unable to discern. Yet who can judge of her horror, when, on closer scrutiny, she perceived, some four feet from the infant, a rattlesnake, with its glittering eyes fastened upon his, and nerving him by an almost imperceptible motion!

The sight of her darling's peril so nearly paralyzed her, that for an instant she half believed that the dreadful fascination had extended to herself; but the certainty, that, unless she was the instrument of salvation to her child, he was inevitably lost, in some degree restored her powers. She glanced wildly round for something that might be used as a weapon, but nothing appeared, and already the venomous reptile had passed over half the space which divided him from his victim.

Another moment and all would be lost.—What could be done? In her hand she held a broad tin pan, and springing from the rock, quick as thought she covered the snake with it, and stood upon it to prevent his escape. The charm was broken; the child moved, swayed to one side and began to sob. At the same time, the mother recovered her voice and screamed for aid, retaining her position till it arrived, when the cause of her terrible fright was dispatched.

ADVICE.

Keep good company or none. Never be idle. If your hands cannot be usefully employed, attend to the cultivation of your mind. Always speak the truth. Make few promises. Live up to your engagements. Keep your own secrets, if you have any.—When you speak to a person, look him in the face. Good company and good conversation are the very sinews of virtue.

Good character is above all things else. Your character cannot be essentially injured, only by your own acts. If one speaks evil of you, let your life be so that no one will believe him.—Drink no kinds of intoxicating liquors. Ever live within your income. When you retire to your bed, think over what you have been doing during the day.—Make no haste to be rich, if you would prosper. Small and steady gains give competency, with tranquility of mind. Never play at any kind of game of chance.

Avoid temptation, through fear you may not withstand it. Never run in debt, unless you see a way to get out. Never borrow, if you can possibly avoid it. Do not marry until you are able to support a wife. Never speak evil of any one. Be just before you are generous. Keep yourself innocent, if you would be happy. Save when you are young, and spend when you are old.

SOURCES OF MORAL STRENGTH.

What is radically false can give no strength. Women have a great deal of modesty, delicacy and feminine refinement, but they are not taught the principle from which these ought to spring as natural fruits. Certain qualities are praised, but it is like children who make a garden by sticking full blown flowers into the ground expecting them to keep their bloom.

Those who instruct them do not go to the real principle which shall teach them to discern right from wrong, nor give them any strong truths by which to guide their steps amongst the temptations and delusions which beset them; therefore we find that all the talk we have heard about "graceful modesty" and "female delicacy," does not enable them to stand against the stern reality of a strong temptation; propriety cannot swallow up the passion.

A SEA BULL.—An Irishman, who served on board a man-of-war in the capacity of a waiter, was selected by one of the officers to haul in a tow-line of considerable length, which was towing over the taffrail. After raising it 30 or 40 fathoms, which had put his patience severely to proof, as well as every muscle of his arms, he muttered to himself—"Sure, it's as long as to-day and to-morrow. It's a good weeks work for any five in the ship. Bad luck to the arm or leg it'll lave me at last. What more of it yet? Och, murder! the sa's mighty deep to be sure!" After continuing in a similar strain, and conceiving there was little probability of the completion of his labor, suddenly stopped short, and addressing the officer on the watch, exclaimed—"Bad manners to me, sir, if I don't think somebody's cut off the other end of it."

ANECDOTE.—A person on whom the temperance reformation had produced no effect, entered, in a state of exhalation, a temperance grocery, in a neighboring town.

"Mr. —," he exclaimed, "do you keep anything—good to take here?"

"Yes," replied the merchant, "we have some excellent cold water—the best thing in the world to take."

"Well, I know it," replied the Bacchante; "there's no one thing—that's done so much for navigation as that."

HOW TO PRESERVE HEALTH.

Medicine will never remedy bad habits.—It is utterly futile to think of living in gluttony, intemperance, and every excess, and keeping the body in health by medicine. Indulgence of the appetite, and indiscriminate dosing, and drugging, have ruined the health and destroyed the life of more persons than famine, sword, and pestilence. If you will take advice, become regular in your habits, eat and drink wholesome things, sleep on mattresses, and retire and rise very regularly. Make free use of water to purify the skin, and when sick take counsel of the best physician you know, and follow nature.

When neighbor Jones went in to dinner the other day, he found one of his apprentices in the kitchen quietly rolling up his sleeves.

"What are you going to do?" said Jones.

"O," quietly responded the boy, "I am going to dive down in that pot to see if I can find the bean that the soup was made from!"

Some years ago, a medical student who had paid more attention to billiards than anatomy was brought before a professor for examination, when the following question and reply were passed: "what would you do first in the case of a man who was blown up by gunpowder?"

"I should wait till he came down."

"Good morn, Mister Grimes! I come over to see if you'd lend our dad your pick-axe, to saw off a board to make a chicken coop to put our dog in; he runs after our neighbor's cows, and then they won't come about any more, so we have to drink our coffee without cream or sugar."

FRESH AIR.—Every breath we draw we take into the lungs from one and a half to two pints of air; so that it requires about two and a half gallons of pure air a minute, or sixty hogs-heads every twenty-four hours, properly to supply the lungs. How important, then, to health, to have houses well ventilated, and not to sleep in small close rooms!

We heard of a polite Frenchman one time, who carried his ideas of gallantry to so high a pitch of sublimity, as to run around the other side of a lady from where her shadow fell, so that he might avoid stepping on it.

A sharp Attorney asked a little boy who was testifying, if he knew what would become of him if he told a lie. The lad answered with simplicity, "yes sir—I suppose I shall be sent where all lawyers go, when I die."

TRUE BREEDING.—Lord Chatham, who was almost as remarkable for his manners as for his eloquence and public spirit, has defined good breeding to be, "benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves in the little daily occurrences of life."

The more a man works, the less time he will have to grumble about hard times.

"Onions and hominy, now and forever, one and inseparable"—that's my platform, as the boy said when he was eating his dinner.

MIRTH AND WIT.—Mirth should be the embroidery of the conversation, not the web; wit the ornament of the mind, not the furniture.

COLONEL EASY.

BY KIT KELVIN.

Every one knew Col. Easy.—He was familiarly called Easy Colonel. Parson Quiet knew him; Esquire Short knew him; Judge Bluff, of the adjoining county, knew him; and the Hon. Mr. Stiff knew him. It was, "How are you, Colonel, and what news have you?" He lived in a gable-roofed house, just on the corner near the Hotel;—an old house sacred to him, because his father's father built it; and he was very serious when time crumbled away an old pillar that supported the portico and obliged him to replace it with modern wood.

The interior was pleasant; old family portraits looked down from the walls, and a spread eagle protected an antique mirror by being perched above, and gazed below with open beak. The kitchen, too, looked south, and its old corners were cosy; and the fire place, oven, painted beams above, claimed near relationship by smooth poles stretched from one to the other, supporters for sausages, seed corn, etc.

The Colonel loved this place; and of an evening he smoked a pipe here, and laughed out his eyes, and chatted with a neighbor and the parson, and told many funny stories. This old kitchen was cosy. And then the lawn, with elms, and maples, and oaks. His father had played here; he had played here; his sons had played here; every blade of grass was dear to him—why not?

As I said, every one knew the Colonel. The boys in the parish, as he passed, took off their caps and whispered one to the other, "There is Col. Easy, a good man. I wish he could hear from his son; how long he has been gone. Papa says he owes Col. Easy a great deal, for he got his contract from him; and I know Esquire Short never would have gone to the Legislature if it hadn't been for the Colonel; and Judge Bluff never would have had the say about hanging 'poor Tom,' if the Colonel hadn't got him his judgements."

And so it was. Col. Easy had inherited an easy property, and, when young, dashed some; had always been the poor man's friend; had benefitted others and not himself; had placed this person in a lucrative position, and sent Senator Stiff to Washington, and helped Judge Bluff to the bench, and endorsed for Esquire Short, and a great many farmers; had educated an expensive family, and at the age of sixty found his property dwindled to a small amount; enough though he hoped, to bury himself and companion; but he was forgetful of contingencies.

If any one found himself in trouble, Colonel Easy was the man; if advice or calculation, why, Col. Easy could do it; if pecuniary assistance, Col. Easy; and so it had been, until it was a common saying, "Col. Easy cares for everybody," and not for himself. Yes, reader, he was a "clever man, and did many clever things," hoping by so doing to carry out the scripture admonition, "love thy neighbor as thyself."

Human nature smiled in the creation of Col. Easy, a God send to many, a blessing to all. Why should he have burdens of sorrow, heavy trials, and sore afflictions? Alas! he was of the earth, earthly, for "the rain falleth upon the just and the unjust alike." The poor Colonel had shed bitter tears over the loss of two noble sons, and he mourned in bitterness his first born. Three scions clustered about him and opened a bright future for his old age, but two faded from his call. He was childless, and yet his eye spoke kindness; his heart went forth for other's relief, and he was the same good easy Col. Easy.

Perhaps the uncertain fate of his son Paul agonized him more than the death of his sons; and sometimes in the gloaming, when the day had passed, a tear would be detected stealing from its cover upon the kind wrinkles, yet the sight of his life partner would clear it up, and the pleasant smile stood over the wreck. On a Sabbath at church, too, when Esquire Short's pew was sometimes the nucleus of all eyes by the return of his son from sea, the lips of Col. Easy would tremble, and his hand invariably shaded his eyes, he could not help it, but his devotional air seemed more deep, and himself more contrite, manly his intense feelings.

No one inquired of him for Paul, for he had never heard from him since his departure.—He had grown up with dissipated habits, and in a wild frolic had wounded a companion, and, before the result was known, had fled his home and country.—This was the history of the Colonel's agony, which he had endured for twenty long years. But for his son's wild passion the Colonel had made full amends; the wounded boy he had educated and cared for as his own. It was no less a person than Hon. Senator Stiff; in fact he looked upon him as a substitute for his lost Paul.

Had it not been proven before this unfortunate family trouble that Col. Easy was a proverbially kind man, his great consideration might have been attributed to domestic sorrows; but no one, to look upon his face, could discover a cultivated nature; it was innate. Not a needy dwelling in the country but had felt the generous aid of this philanthropist.

But the shadows of life began to lengthen and thicken upon the Colonel's pathway. It would appear that, like unto Job, the Almighty had permitted Satan to harass him for his own wise purposes, and with the swift feet of evil had visited his friends, to steel their hearts against his misfortunes, and also to bring troubles in frequent repetition.

Senator Stiff, for whom the Col. had largely endorsed, ever open to the memory of the injury he had sustained, as it were, from his own hand, died suddenly at Washington, with larger liabilities than his assets could cancel. The village merchant, a debtor for heavy cash sums, loaned, had failed, and put an end to his existence.

Farmer Wortley's buildings were destroyed by fire, and his delinquencies were fearful; all which riveted the Colonel still more fast in close and awkward circumstances. He began to feel and fear. People said the Colonel had grown old very fast.—Poor man! I hope he will find a quick return for his life long services of devotion to others.—Surely Judge Bluff and Esquire Short could easily advance all necessary aid, for the Colonel taught them how to do well in the world.

The Colonel lamented that he could assist no more, but must seek assistance. A very quiet letter was sent to Judge Bluff, and a note to Esquire Short, couched in manly language of distress.—He spoke of no previous business; he touched no chord of memory; it was merely for present assistance. He was sanguine all was right. Return post brought the following reply from the Judge:—

"Paul Easy, Esquire.—Sir: Your letter of the 12th, requesting a loan, is received. I regret, sir, to say, I have made such a disposition of my ready cash, that it would materially inconvenience me to favor you at the present time. Hoping your many friends may appreciate your necessities, I remain your obedient servant, R. BLUFF."

The Colonel read it, wiped his spectacles, and read it again. It was from a person to whom he had rendered numerous pecuniary favors, and who owed his political position to him. Esquire Short's answer was also before him:—

"TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18.

"P. Easy, Esquire.—Sir: I was surprised to receive your note this morning, considering your utter inability, present or prospective, to return me at any time the sum you desire. I had supposed that your honorable course of conduct was sufficient guaranty against any such equivocal exposure of character. Of course, sir, my expensive family prevent me from indulging you in such a strange vein.

GEORGE SHORT.

The Colonel had not recovered from this unkind and ungentlemanly reply, when the Judge's letter arrived. He could scarcely believe, and yet the truth was before him. He had played the benefactor, and was reaping the usual reward.

Other sources had failed, and he gave up the game, retiring into a state of feeling unhappy beyond measure. There was but one step; he strove to avoid it. He resorted to all his fertile resources; yet there was but one vision before him—an entire relinquishment of his all; the old gabled house, the kitchen, the lawn, the trees. His heart strings were breaking, but the same pleasant face covered all.

One October day, the inhabitants of the village of —, read with sorrow the following notice in the country paper:—

"ASSIGNEE'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE.—By order of George Short, Esq., Commissioner of Insolvency. The subscriber will sell at public vendue, on the tenth of December, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, all the right in equity which Paul Easy, an insolvent debtor, has to redeem his farm, lying in —.

"This farm is one of the most desirable and productive in the country. On it are a large gable-roofed house and two barns.

"For particulars inquire of O. J. Afton, or the subscriber, at Kirkstall. —E. H. BUSHMAN.
October 10, 18—"

But the wind was tempered to the shorn lamb.

Before the "ides" of December had come the thick darkness had been dissipated, and the Colonel's eye was moist with joy and happiness. His lost son Paul had returned rich from a long residence in South America, and the old gable house, the lawn, the trees, were still his.

Reader, you have read tales without a moral, but there is one intended here. I need not define it; but do you know any Colonel Easy's? Are you proteges of such an one? Have you felt the kindness of others, and repaid them with selfishness?—Is there any truth in this little tale? Was there ever a Colonel Easy?

SHAKERS AND THEIR WORSHIP.

At the distance of about one half mile from the village of the Shakers in Canterbury, N. H., there is to be seen in a pasture, far from any public road, a marble stone, in height about seven feet, which was brought from Lebanon, N. Y., the head quarters of the Shakers, about six years since, and erected by special command of heaven, as an object of worship by the holy anointed elders of this novel sect and their deluded followers.

The devotion around this stone consists of kneeling, tumbling, wailing, singing, dancing, and other antics too numerous to mention, which so forcibly reminded the spectator of the worship of the Hi doos, that he can hardly persuade himself that he is in America.

The Shakers of Lebanon have their "holy mountain" situated about two miles from their principal village, up to which they make a formal pilgrimage once a year, to worship "after their fashion." They go up in "families," each family comprising one of the three distinct "orders" into which the "community" is divided.

The "holy place" is located upon the top of one of the highest peaks of the picturesque and far famed "Berkshire Hills," and commands one of the most charming semi-mountain views we ever beheld. In one direction the Catskill Mountains are seen towering to the clouds; and with a glass in a clear day the Hudson River may be seen for thirty or forty miles of its course below Albany. Lebanon Springs, and all their vicinage of nearly unequalled pastoral scenery, are spread out at the foot of the hill towards the west.

Eastwardly lies in full view the beautiful village of Pittsfield—one of the rural gems of Massachusetts—encircled with its fine farms, and dotted with large, bright spots, which a closer inspection show to be lakes, or "ponds," as they call them "over there." Beyond, tower the mountains in the vicinity of Williamstown, North Adams, and other villages in that region.—

Towards the south-west lies a portion of the valley of the Housatonic, and at several points the river, here scarcely larger than a respectable mill stream, sparkles in the sun, as it flows on its course towards Long Island Sound.

Such is, in brief, the splendid scene spread out before the beholder, as he stands within the sacred enclosure of a strange superstition, upon the top of the Shaker's "holy mountain." A space of about an acre is encompassed with a handsome board fence, and is covered with grass, which is taken care of as sedulously as if it occupied the centre of some gentleman's fine park, in front of his lordly mansion, and where all the world might see it.

On the east side of the enclosure stands a plain frame building, about forty feet long, and perhaps fifteen feet wide, one story high, and having two entrances in front. This is occupied by the Shakers during a portion of the time devoted to their annual pilgrimage to the place. Towards the south-west corner of the lot, and nearly opposite this structure, is a small oblong enclosure, the earth of which is raised about a foot above the surface.

In the centre of this there formerly stood erect a marble slab, the inscription upon which commemorated the discomfiture and burial of no less a personage than the Devil himself, who was driven to this spot by Mother Ann, the great foundress of Shakerism, and its canonized Saint, and who, being fairly cornered, was effectually exercised into the very bowels of the "everlasting hills," where, so far as the Shakers are concerned, he has remained ever since, and has "ceased from troubling." (We wish we could say as much for some other "communities" we "wot of.")

The stone was broken off near the ground, several years since, by some sacrilegious vandals, and has never been re-erected. The visitors can only see where it was, by what remains of it in the ground.

It is to commemorate this great occurrence in their "strange eventful history," that the Shakers annually gather upon this hill top for worship, and curious and inexpressible are their ceremonies on that occasion. They consist mainly, however, in a sort of polking about the Devil's Sepulchre, mingled with the oldest singing ever heard in such a strange place, and all manner of antics, gesturing and grimaces, expressive, no doubt, of infinite joy over the final discomfiture of his Satanic Majesty.—Albany Register.

THE MOSQUITO.

This insect, says an exchange, the most tantalizing which feculent bog sand or solstitial sun ever produced for man's discomfort, can be heard now, any still evening, sounding a charge to the sanguinary feast which he so much delights in. No blood-stained warrior ever marched with more ardor under the martial sounds of the bugle, than this ensanguined robber rushes inspired by his own music to the field of his gory conquest.

Cruelty seems to be the very essence of his nature; vampire-like, he sucks and revels in the life's blood of his victims. His venomous spirit, not satisfied with what he takes away, infuses his poison into the wounds, and delights in the thought of the lingering torments he causes. Listen to the remorseless scoundrel! how he sings at his task, musical as a bee, and as if only extracting honey from the blossoms which invite him to their bosom. The flowers which attend his visits are only flowers of fancy, embellishments more florid than elegant, more brilliant than beautiful, more to be dreaded than the poison of the sumach or the virulence of the nettle.

And the exultant fiend is so discriminating in his visits, so nicely times the hour of its operations, catching its defenceless victims in the weakest and most unprotected period of their lives, when nights are broiling and blistering hot, and bedclothes are scarce and scattered. Can anything be imagined more tormenting, more trying to patience, more destructive to peaceful slumbers, or more likely to turn to curds the overflowing milk of human kindness.

Bad as the town-bred mosquito is—and, considering the christian and mollifying influences of civilization upon the savage nature, his inexorable and unchangeable appetite for blood should have been long since assuaged—still his malice is not of that implacable and unrelenting character which stirs the blood of a genuine man-eater, raised in the neighborhood of the bogs of the Wabash.

Their bills are touched with aquafortis, and their bite blisters the skin with plague spots, more to be dreaded than the small pox, and equally as ugly. We pity the seekers of pleasure in the country, who have attractions in a thin skin and rich blood, for the persevering assaults of such a sanguinary and phlebotomizing villain.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, SEPT. 16, 1852.

WHO IS THE SLAVE?

Many there are who, pointing to the negro that is held as chattel at the south, say, "the poor slave! he has not the liberty God has designed for all men—he is made to toil at the bidding of his master—he must do his task or receive the lash," and various other expressions, which touch the sympathies of a feeling heart.

Well, let us see how some of those who are free, and enjoy all the liberties of the citizen, without the prejudice of color against them, use that liberty, and how they answer the end of their being.

Now there is an honest, industrious and hard working man, with a good place, and plenty of work; but he has not a spot on God's footstool to erect his cabin. He toils by days work to earn the bread that supports him and the wife of his bosom, and perhaps a half dozen children, at the scanty pittance of seventy-five cents or perchance a dollar per day; laboring incessantly and buying all that is consumed by his family, both for food and raiment, and produces nothing.

Is not he a slave in all of these particulars? No, says one, he has his liberty; he is not under task masters. Very well.—Which is the worst, to have the satisfaction of being driven by the actual want of the bread that must be had to sustain life, or the necessity of doing a certain amount of labor, and provided with food and raiment? We shall not stop to discuss this subject, but simply give some scattered ideas in regard to the production and consumption of the articles for man's comfort.

Many, it is true, are the theories extant in regard to the best mode of providing for the poor. Various plans have been adopted in cities to provide employment for the poorer classes, but still the poor exceed the capacity of the places provided for them; and we read in the journals of the day of the fearful increase of crime in the large cities. And when we take into consideration the numbers that congregate together in such places, it is not at all surprising that such should be the results. The land is all either occupied by buildings or yards for various purposes, aside from producing any of the necessaries of food, and all the food consumed is to be bought, and that produced elsewhere. This gives a reason to suppose that crime must be among such a community; for all cannot possibly procure food without labor, consequently they must steal or starve.

A community placed on an equal footing in property could not long maintain its equality.—And why? Because some would by cunning and stratagem in trade overreach their neighbors, and secure all they possess, and then again would occur what now exists—monopoly and starvation.—Hence all the evils which surround us.

There is probably not one family to a hundred of the poor, if placed in a situation to raise or produce from the earth some of the necessary articles to support life, but what would be able to support themselves comfortably. If they do not raise it somebody else must, and they cannot live without eating. Consequently, should the means of obtaining a supply cease, some resort must be had. Many are ashamed to beg, and will rather steal, saying, that God has made all these things, and why not a portion for us?

The sentence pronounced upon our first parents, at the time they were driven forth from the garden, follows to this day, and in consequence we have to earn our bread by the sweat of the brow; and he who does it not is one that lives upon the labor of some one else: for the earth now has to be cultivated in order that it may yield its fruit, and the sentence to eat bread by the sweat of the brow includes all the descendants of Adam, and none are exempt.

Although one may not produce his bread by cultivating the earth, yet he should be employed at something that would be of use to another who is employed in the cultivation of the soil, and thus be obeying the injunction as well as the other. A mechanic is as useful as the husbandman. They can in no manner be separated in a civilized society. They are the bone and sinew of society. All should be engaged in some occupation, and then idleness finds no votaries, and want and the bailiff looks in at the door of the industrious, but dare not enter.

The practice is almost universal of sending our sons and daughters away to school, to get an education. Nothing is more detrimental to their best interest than to place them beyond the eye of their parents. Who but a parent is anxious for the true greatness of a child? Many make loud professions, but when the trial is made, alas! it too often proves that the price of tuition is the motive, and not the child's good. Hence we see many who promise fair to be an honor to their parents, who look with wishful expectations forward to a day when they shall see them arrive at the age of maturity, and be among the nobles of earth, fall. Their tutors are influenced by the paltry sum paid for tuition, and their care is limited to the amount paid.

These evils ought not to exist. But what is the remedy? Many have been the schemes for the amelioration of the sufferings of our race, but all are the device of the human mind. We dare not point out any person as the one who would bring about that result which is desired. But one thing let us say, and that is, when the Lord God of Heaven reveals unto man his law, he should hear and learn of God; and by so doing they would be redeemed from the enthrallment into which the world is thrown by the unskillfulness of man in managing the things which belong to God: "for God alone hath the right to rule, and in his name only he to whom he granteth it."

Man should not usurp power over his fellow man, but yield obedience to those called of God, and set in authority to rule; and thus will the command be kept, which says, "honor and obey the king and the judges, and all that are set in authority." In so doing, the rulers of a people who are chosen of God are a fear unto evil doers, and the family of mankind are established on an equal basis, wherein is the principles of eternal union and fraternity, which shall last to all ages; and no man then shall have need to hold the good things which God has given from his brother, but all wants may be supplied from the bounteous goodness which follows in the path of the obedient: for it is said by our Savior, that the "willing and obedient shall eat the good of the land."

PERFECTION.

We have often heard individuals, who advocate the Arminian doctrine, talking about perfection, and even pretending that they are examples of the perfect class; when, indeed, they are not only ignorant of the principle, but destitute of the necessary qualifications, which are prerequisites to so high a standing. Perfection, in the extended import of the word, is that which is beyond improvement. Christ commanded his people, saying: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect."

We do not understand from this that mankind, while in their present state on earth, are to become perfect in all things, as the Lord is, or to that degree that he is; but that we have appointed unto us a certain sphere to act in, and that we can be perfect in it; and that we have certain laws to comply with, and we can harmoniously do it. The Lord is perfect in all things, and he governs the whole universe, and every planet pursues its course without interfering with others; for there is order and harmony in all the works of God: for he is the fountain of intelligence, and the first in power; and every thing that he does will be perfect when completed.

The formation of this earth is the work of God, and when entirely finished it will be crystallized and made pure, and even glorified, or be perfect; although it has its orbit to act in, and with order and harmony does it. So it is with men; they have their sphere to act in, and they can be perfect in it;—but God has the immensity of space to act in, and he is perfect in it.

It is not to be expected that mankind are required to be perfect in all things, while in a state of mortality, as God is. His power is unlimited; but we have a certain sphere to act in; therefore, our intelligence is limited; but as we have before stated, we can be perfect in this sphere; or, in other words, we can obey the law of the Lord, walk circumspectly, orderly and harmoniously before him. Therefore, we are disposed to enquire into the nature of the sphere we have to act in, and so learn how we can be perfect in it.

There are certain principles of power that are within the reach of man while he is in his present state, and there are many things beyond his reach; but as far as his power extends, or that he has power over things, he has the power of choice and free agency to act for himself; and his sphere that he has to act in, extends no farther than he has power to obey or disobey. Hence, in our opinion, the perfection that a man may attain to in time, consists in obeying the law of righteousness, and obtaining the promised blessings of the gospel of peace, which are within his sphere.

Right and wrong are before him, and he has power to do either; but if he does that which is right, and obeys the law of the Lord in all things, he is a perfect man, as far as his sphere of action extends. But it is impossible for a man to attain to this high standing without a perfect law or rule to guide him. No law can be in justice presented to a man for his sanction and obedience, which is beyond his power or the power given him to obey; therefore, no law can be a perfect one, that exacts things of men that they cannot perform.

The law of God is infallible or perfect, because God, who is infallible or perfect, devised it, and it does not exact things of men that they cannot do. If this law is perfect, and also the principle by which a man is made perfect; or, in other words, that he cannot be perfect without obeying it; then, if he rejects one principle of it, he is not perfect in his sphere. James, no doubt, alluding to the gospel, says: "But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed." (James i. 25.) This perfect law of liberty expands the mind, and liberates it from the vulture fangs of bigotry, which has ever infused the idea that the sphere of man is very contracted, and that certain blessings that were in the power of man to receive in ancient days, are beyond the reach of man in this our day.

It is admitted that if a person complies with the rules of a science in all respects, that he will become as perfect as the rules themselves are; likewise, if a man obeys the gospel in all respects, he will be perfect as far as the law or the gospel will allow him to be. Therefore, we set it down as a fact that no man is perfect, no not even in his own sphere, except he obeys the gospel; and in vain may we talk about being perfect, sanctified or holy, if we have not obeyed the gospel, nay if we have not obeyed every principle of it.

Now, according to the scriptures, the matter stands thus—we are commanded to be perfect as our Father who is in heaven is perfect; and as there is order and perfection in all his works, or as he has adopted certain rules, and conforms to them, so must we conform to the law of the Lord or the gospel, in all respects, or it cannot be said in truth that we are perfect.

But let us more particularly enquire what men must do to be perfect in their sphere.

It is positively affirmed in the Bible, that before obedience to the perfect law of liberty, men are foreigners, aliens and strangers to God; therefore, in order for them to be assimilated unto the likeness of God in the least degree, and be perfect as he is, it is necessary for them to obey the perfect law which is: first, to repent of their sins; or, in other words, forsake them; and, in a word, break off from sin, and work righteousness; second, to be baptized for the remission of sins, (see Acts ii. 38,) and for the adoption into the kingdom of God, and so take up their cross and follow Christ in the work of the regeneration; third, receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands. (See Acts viii. 17. do. xix. 6.)

The above are what the apostle terms the (first) principles of the gospel, and it is self-evident that no person can be perfect in any science without learning the elementary principles of the same. Neither will it answer for him to learn the first principle, but pay no attention to the second: he must learn them in rotation, and according to order, or he cannot make any proficiency in the science; so it is, a man cannot make any proficiency in the religion of heaven, except he obeys every principle of it according to order. It is the very height of folly for any man to talk about being perfect, holy or sanctified, if he has not repented of his sins, and been baptized for the remission of them, and received the Holy Spirit by the laying on of hands.

But obeying the first principles of the gospel is not all. The apostle says, that the church was organized with apostles, prophets, &c., for the perfecting of the saints, and the work of the ministry. Thus they anciently had inspired men among them, who could receive revelations from the Lord, and thus instruct the church with things of importance, which increased their knowledge. The more intelligence a man receives, the nearer he comes to perfection.

And it is said, "the Lord is the same yesterday, to-day and forever;" consequently he has not contracted the sphere and agency of man, nor decreed that he will in the future refuse to bestow the same blessings upon those who become his saints, that he bestowed anciently upon his people. Surely, the people of God are as susceptible of attaining to the high standing now-a-days, as they were formerly.—

The blessings that the ancients received, and which are for us, are the Spirit of prophecy or revelation, visions, administration of angels, &c.; therefore, we conclude that the profession of perfection, of those who deny that these gifts and graces of the gospel are for us, is hypocritical. These gifts are for the people; therefore, they cannot be perfect without them: for it is by the Spirit of prophecy or of revelation, that we can obtain a knowledge of God: "No man can say that Jesus Christ is the Lord, except it is by the Holy Ghost." The more of the Spirit that the prophets received, the more they were like God. When the saints had visions of heavenly things, their knowledge was increased.

Some of the saints of ancient days were in a great degree, if not fully, perfect in their sphere of action, because they sought and obtained that which was for them. But Oh! how changed the scene! Men now profess to be saints, and even to be holy and sanctified, and some to be perfect, without receiving any such blessings, or even obeying the first principles of the gospel of Christ. Awake! awake! to righteousness, and sin not, O ye nations, kindreds, and people of the earth, and put away such delusive notions, and keep the commandments of the Great God, that you may be counted worthy to sit down in the kingdom of God with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the prophets.

We unintentionally omitted the notice of the death of JAMES M. GREIG last week. He died on the 2d inst. of erysipelas, after a short but painful illness of about six days, and leaves a wife and six children to mourn his loss. He was an estimable citizen, kind and affectionate, a lover of peace and good order, and his loss is felt by all who knew him.

He was a native of N. Y., and from there he removed to Penn., where he resided for several years. He became acquainted with the gospel of truth at Pittsburgh, in the early part of his life, and since he embraced it has been an able defender of the same to the end of his days; and departed this life with the assurance of a resurrection with the just, to reign with Christ a thousand years.

STILL THEY COME.

On Monday evening last that favorite Prop. Lady of the Lake landed here a company of settlers from Jefferson Co., N. Y., numbering about thirty-three. They are in good health and spirits.—The last two days aboard were spent in one of the severest gales experienced this season, the boat having to run into the St. Mary's River to make a harbor. The company express themselves better pleased than they anticipated, and seem to be of the substantial sort.

We learn by a gentleman from Mackinac that the Indian agent has talked of removing the place of payment to Grand Traverse, where the liquor law is enforced in a summary way, on account of the quantity of liquor sold to the Indians, and keeping them in a continual state of intoxication. Why do not the officers of the law at Mackinac see that the law is observed? Shame on the men who will thus falsify their official oaths!

SOUND ARGUMENT.

Henry C. Carey says, there is one greater invention than that of the Railroad, to wit: that which brings the market to the farmer's door, and thus destroys the need for transportation even by railroad. What is it that makes land valuable? What has made it every where valuable? Proximity to market; bringing the consumer to the side of the producer. The land of Belgium is of the highest value of any in the world, because there the consumer and producer are most completely in connection with each other. That of France has enormously increased in value, as the consumer has more and more taken his place by the side of the producer.

What destroys the value of land? The separation of the consumer from the producer; for that is invariably followed by exhaustion of the land, and its abandonment. For the last two centuries, no effort has been spared to prevent their coming together on the land of Ireland, but all efforts failed, until at the Union, provision was made for the abolition of all protection, the result of which is seen in the fact, that a large portion of that country is now on sale for the mere amount of money that, in better times, was lent to the owners on mortgage security.

In India, British free trade has annihilated the domestic manufacturer, and, with each step in the progress of the operation, land has lost its value, because, as in Ireland, the people have been more and more compelled to depend on the distant market. Everywhere land acquires value and its owner becomes enriched, as the owner is more and more brought to take his place by the side of the consumer; and every where it loses in value as the producer is more and more compelled to depend upon the distant market, because the cost of transportation constitutes the first tax to be paid by both land and labor, and because the cost of going to market must be paid for by the man who has either labor or its products to sell.

A PASSING THOUGHT.—Rothschild is forced to content himself with the same sky as the poor news-writer, and the great banker cannot order a private sunset, or add one day to the magnificence of night. The same air swells all lungs. Each one possesses, really, only his own thoughts and his own senses, soul and body—these are the property which a man owns. All that is valuable is to be had for nothing in this world. Genius, beauty, and love are not bought and sold. You may buy a rich bracelet, but not a well turned arm to wear it—a pearl necklace, but not a pretty throat with which it shall vie. The richest basket on earth would vainly offer a fortune to be able to write a verse like Byron. One comes into the world naked and goes out naked; the difference in the fineness of a bit of linen for a shroud is not much. Man is a handful of clay, which turns quickly back again into dust.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY.—A PERPETUAL LIGHT.—A most curious and interesting discovery has just been made at Langres, in France, which we have no doubt will cause a searching scientific inquiry as to the material and proportions of the perpetually burning lamps, said to have been in use by the ancients. Some working men were recently excavating for a foundation for a new building, in a debris evidently the remains of Gallo-Roman erection, when they came to the roof of an underground sort of cave, which time had rendered almost of metallic hardness. An opening was, however, effected, when one of the workmen instantly exclaimed that there was a light at the bottom of the cavern. The parties present entered, when they found a bronze sepulchral lamp of remarkable workmanship suspended from the roof by chains of the same metal. It was entirely filled with a combustible substance, which did not appear to have diminished, although the probability is the combustion had been going on for ages. This discovery will, we trust, throw some light on a question which has caused so many disputes among learned antiquaries, although it is stated that one was discovered at Viterbo in 1540, from which, however, no fresh information was afforded on the subject.

"THE GREATEST SPEED."—The sad results, so often accompanying the mad strife for pre-eminence in speed, on the part of our steam-craft, is thus eloquently and touchingly summed up by the New York Times:—

"What has been the result? There are dead in the graveyards, and dead swept over by the waves or driven far out on the seas. There is the darkness of mourning in many a late cheerful home. Familiar voices are absent from family converse; familiar forms are missed from family circles; accustomed counsel no longer warns and guards; affectionate arms embrace and cherish no more. By many a darkened hearth, which late glowed brightly sit Woe and Penury, and Happiness and Comfort have been suddenly chased away. There is a wail of agony in households, in which wives have been made husbandless, husbands wifeless, children orphaned, and parents childless. There are those whose paths in life might have been bright and happy, who now see only a stern and blank before them. If all this has happened—that boats may attain to the perfection of speed, the end has been sought at a terrible and costly price."

MARKED FISH.—The Scotch commissaries of fisheries have been adopting an ingenious device for learning the migrations of the salmon. They have marked a large number of fish hatched from the spawn deposited last year in the Tweed, by placing around them a belt or ring of India Rubber, numbered and dated. One of the fish was caught, two days after being thus marked and let go a hundred miles from the mouth of the Tweed. All fishermen taking such marked fish are desired to note the weight, the place and date of capture, various other particulars named in the directions. The idea is a novel and amusing one. It may lead to valuable scientific discovery. For our part, we should like to know what master fish thinks of his belt. He has no hands with which to take it off, and it is doubtful whether any of his companions will have the politeness to offer any assistance. They may look askance at their little belted brother, and be shy of his society.

POETRY.

Is God's own liberty at last,
To be a privilege that's past,
And evermore be banish'd?
No! no! the darkest hour is just Before the rising sun has burst
On high to show the night has vanish'd.

No! Freedom is a deathless thing,
And ecstasies at churning priest and king,
As we at insects crawling—
The truth is God, and who can stay
The great Almighty on his way
With flimsy frowns or fimsier bawling?

As well with breath impede the earth,
As boys do bubbles in their mirth,
As round the sun it rolls careening,
As well with arrows pierce the sun,
And say, too long that orb has shone,
Each planetary surface cheering!

The very God of Heav'n shall fight,
To rend the veil of mortal night
That hangs o'er millions groaning,—
And at His flashing sword shall free
The myrmidons of tyranny,
The guilt of centuries atoning.

Is earth a hell, and Satan here,
To blacken still from year to year
This planet Pandemonium?
Is God dethron'd, and chain'd to see,
In shape of man, this enemy
Of old the faggots blowing?

No! no! in destined moment mark—
A hand shall light another spark,
A mystic hand outstretched from Heaven!
A spark that, like prairie fire,
Shall ev'ry patriot breast inspire,
To strive till ev'ry chain is riven!

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

The public authorities of the State of Missouri, and, indeed, all the principal people, except those at Jackson County, were scandalized at these lawless proceedings, and sympathized with the efforts made by the Mormon leaders to obtain redress. The Attorney-General of the State wrote to say that if the Mormons desired to be re-established in their possessions, an adequate public force would be sent for their protection. He also advised that the Mormons should remain in the State, and organize themselves into a regular company of militia, in which case they should be supplied with public arms.

Joseph was now on a dangerous territory, and chose twenty men for his body-guard, appointing his brother Hyrum Smith as their captain, and another brother, George Smith, as his armor-bearer. He also appointed a "general," who daily inspected the little army, examined their fire-locks, and drilled them on the prairies.

The people of Jackson County, by this time, were informed of Joseph Smith's arrival with his army. A deputation of them, who were in Clay County, to submit a proposal for the purchase of all the Mormon lands in Independence, no sooner heard that the Prophet was in the field in person, then they returned towards their own county to raise a force with which to meet and chastise him.

One of their leaders, named Campbell, swore, as he adjusted his pistols in his holsters, "that the eagles and turkey buzzards should eat his flesh if he did not, before two days, fix Joe Smith and his army, so that their skins should not hold shucks."

Joseph, who relates this story, adds, that Campbell and his men "went to the ferry and undertook to cross the Missouri river after dusk; but the angel of God saw fit to sink the boat about the middle of the river, and seven out of the twelve that attempted to cross were drowned. Thus suddenly and justly," he adds, with great complacency, "they went to their own place by water."

"Campbell was among the missing. He floated down the river some four or five miles, and lodged upon a pile of drift wood, where the eagles, buzzards, ravens, crows, and wild animals, ate his flesh from his bones, to fulfil his own words, and left him a horrible-looking skeleton of God's vengeance, which was discovered about three weeks afterwards by one Mr. Purtle."

At a popular election in 1838, at Gallatin, in Davis County, the old ill-feeling having arisen with more than its usual virulence, the mob would not allow any Mormons to exercise their privilege of voting; and that a desperate fight, in which two men were killed, and as many persons seriously hurt, was the result. Both parties armed to defend themselves, and carried on a guerilla warfare for several weeks. The cry was raised by the anti-Mormons, that there would be no peace in the country as long as a single Mormon was allowed to remain within it.

Early in the September of that year, the mob assembled at a place called Millport, near Adam-On-Dialman—"and," to use the words of Hyrum Smith, "commenced making aggressions upon the Mormons, taking away their hogs and cattle, and threatening them with extermination, or utter extinction; saying that they had a cannon, and there should be no compromise only at its mouth: frequently taking men, women, and children prisoners, whipping them and lacerating their bodies with hickory withes, and tying them to trees and depriving them of food until they were compelled to gnaw the bark from the trees to which they were bound, in order to sustain life; treating them in the most cruel manner they could invent or think of, and doing everything they could to excite the indignation of the Mormon people to rescue them, in order that they might make that a pretext of an accusation for the breach of the law, and that they might the better excite the prejudice of the populace, and thereby get aid and assistance to carry out their hellish purposes of extermination."

We continue the narrative as given in Hyrum Smith's evidence: "Immediately on the authentication of these facts, messengers were dispatched from Far West to Austin A. King, Judge of the district, and Major-General Atchison, Commander-in-Chief of that division, and Brigadier-General Doniphan, demanding immediate assistance."

"General Atchison returned with the messengers, and went immediately to Di-Ahman, and from thence to Millport, and he found the facts were true as reported to him;—that the citizens of that county were assembled together in a hostile attitude to the amount of two or three hundred men, threatening the utter extermination of the Mormons, he immediately returned to Clay County, and ordered out a sufficient military force to quell the mob.

"Immediately after they were dispersed, and the army returned, the mob commenced collecting again soon after. We again applied for military aid, when General Doniphan came out with a force of sixty armed men to Far West; but they were in such a state of insubordination that he said he could not control them.

"The presiding Judge of the County Court issued orders—upon affidavits made to him by the citizens—to the sheriff of the county, to order out the militia of the county to stand in constant readiness, night and day, to prevent the citizens from being massacred, which fearful situation they were exposed to every moment.

"It was on the evening of the 30th of October, according to the best of my recollection, that the army arrived at Far West the sun about half an hour high. In a few moments afterwards, Cornelius Gillum arrived with his army, and formed a junction.—This Gillum had been stationed at Hunter's Mills for about two months previous to that time—committing depredations upon the inhabitants—capturing men, women and children, and carrying them off as prisoners, lacerating their bodies with hickory withes.

"The army of 'Gillum' were painted like Indians, some of them were more conspicuous than others, and were designated the red spots; he, also, was painted in a similar manner, with red spots marked on his face, and styled himself the 'Delaware Chief.' They would whoop, and hollow, and yell as near like Indians as they could, and continued to do so all that night.

"In the morning early, the Colonel of Militia sent a messenger into the camp with a white flag, to have another interview with General Doniphan. On his return he informed us that the Governor's orders had arrived.—General Doniphan said that 'the order of the Governor was, to exterminate the Mormons; but he would not obey that order, but General Lucas might do what he pleased.' We immediately learned from General Doniphan that 'the Governor's order that had arrived was only a copy of the original, and that the original order was in the hands of Major-General Clark, who was on his way to Far West, with an additional army of six thousand men.'

"Immediately after this, there came into the city a messenger from Haun's Mill, bringing the intelligence of an awful massacre of the people who were residing in that place, and that a force of two or three hundred, detached from the main body of the army, under the superior command of Colonel Ashley, but under the immediate command of Captain Nehemiah Compstock, who, the day previous, had promised them peace and protection, but on receiving a copy of the Governor's order, 'to exterminate or to expel' from the hands of Colonel Ashley, he returned upon them the following day, and surprised and massacred the whole population, and then came on to the town of Far West, and entered into conjunction with the main body of the army.

"The messenger informed us that he himself with a few others fled into the thickets, which preserved them from the massacre, and on the following morning returned and collected the dead bodies of the people, and cast them into a well. There were upwards of twenty who were dead or mortally wounded. One of the name of Yocum, has lately had his leg amputated, in consequence of wounds he then received. He had a ball shot through his head, which entered near his eye, and came out at the back part of his head, and another ball passed through one of his arms.

"The army, during all the while they had been encamped in Far West, continued to lay waste fields of corn, making hogs, sheep and cattle common plunder, and shooting them down for sport. One man shot a cow, and took a strip of her skin, the width of his hand, from her head to her tail, and tied it around a tree, to slip his halter into, to tie his horse to.

"The city was surrounded with a strong guard, and no man, woman or child was permitted to go out or come in, under the penalty of death. Many of the citizens were shot in attempting to go out to obtain sustenance for themselves and families."

It was not to be expected that the Mormons, exposed to a series of persecutions and outrages like these, and in a country so utterly lawless, should not take measures to defend themselves. As it was unsafe for a Mormon to stir abroad, a body of them, instituted expressly for the defence of the sect, and possibly on the recommendation of the Governor of Missouri given to them some years before organized under the name of the "Danite-Band," or, as they were sometimes called, the "Destroying Angels.

TREASURE IN NEW JERSEY

The Mount Holly Mirror, N. J., tells an almost incredible story, that some of Capt. Kid's treasure has been found among the Pines, and that the occupants of that region are in a state of intense excitement. A man dreamed for several nights successively that he should find this treasure, the place to be indicated by four iron bars projecting from the earth. He went and found his dream realized. Two hundred and forty thousand dollars are said to have been discovered up to Monday night, buried in iron chests, and the people have turned out with their pickaxes in further search for the treasure.

A SPRING OF WATER.

"There!" "there is the liquor which God, the Eternal, brews for all his children. Not in the shimmering sult, over smoky fires, choked with poisonous gasses, surrounded with the stench of sickening odors and corruptions, doth your Father in heaven prepare the essence of life—the pure cold water; but in the green glade and grassy dell, where the red deer wanders, and the child loves to play, there God brews it; and down, low down in the deepest valleys, where the fountain murmurs and the rills sing, high upon the mountain tops, where the naked granite glitters like gold in the sun, where the storm cloud broods and thunder storms crash, and away far out on the wide wild sea, where the hurricane howls music, and the big waves roll the chorus, sweeping the march of God—there he brews it, that beverage of life, health-giving water. And every where it is a thing of life and beauty—gleaming in the dew-drop; singing in the summer rain; shining in the ice gem, till the trees all seem turned to living jewels, spreading a golden veil over the setting sun, or a white gauze around the midnight moon; sporting in the cataract; dancing in the hail shower; sleeping in the glacier; folding its bright snow curtains softly about the wintry world, and weaving the many colored sky, that seraph's zone of the syren, whose warp is the rain drops of earth, whose woof is the sunbeam of heaven, all checked over with celestial flowers, by the mystic hand of refraction. Still always it is beautiful—that best life water! no poison bubbles on its brink; its foam brings not madness and murder; no blood stains its liquid glass; pale widows and starving orphans weep not burning tears in its depths; no drunkard's shrinking ghost, from the grave, curses it in words of eternal despair! Speak out, my friends, would you exchange it for the demon's drink, alcohol?"

OLD ROGERS AND SPITPOONS.—The money spent annually for tobacco, one of the nastiest and most useless of all the weeds grown in this country, amounts to a sum sufficient to build the Mississippi and Pacific Railroad in two years! From the last census it appears that the tobacco crop, for the year 1850, amounted to nearly 200,000,000 of pounds. Of this 200,000,000, 81,000,000 were consumed at home. The census also informs us that our "chewing" is on the increase. In 1840, the consumption per head in the United States, amounted to 2 lbs. 13 oz. In 1850, to 3 lbs. 8 oz., which shows that our taste for it, has increased 70 per cent. in that short period of ten years. The spittle made per year, by our smokers and chewers, would, it is estimated, fill a reservoir as long, wide and deep, as the Erie Canal, while the amount of short-cut annually masticated by our people would, if thrust down the throat of Vesuvius, keep the crater vomiting for the next two centuries. Why is there not a society for the suppression of this abuse of the salivary glands?—Where's 'Bones' of "The whited Sepulchre?"

The N. J. Sam Patch, George Garabant of Patterson, leaped from a mast 90 feet high, into the Passaic, this morning, in the presence of about 1,000 spectators, who covered the bridge, wharves and vessels, and filled a large number of boats on the river. The leap was successful. Garabant descending perfectly straight into the water, remaining under but a moment, and upon his reappearance, swimming very leisurely around the river.—Newark Ad.

A Jerseyman was taken sick, and was not expected to recover. His friends got around his bed, and one says—"John, do you feel willing to die?"

John made an effort to give his views on the subject, and answered with his weak and feeble voice—
"I—I—think—I'd—rather—stay—where—I—am—better—acquainted."

A Justice in Arkansas lately married a young couple, addressing the bridegroom as follows:—

"You, T—P—, take this young woman, whom you hold by the right hand, to be your lawful wife, and you now promise to cleave unto her and all other women, so help me God!"

Who says that chap isn't married? Not us.

The wives along the Mississippi never blow up their husbands. They leave that to the steamboats, which are sure to do it sooner or later.

JOE SMITH AND THE DEVIL.

A DIALOGUE.

[From the New York Herald.]

[Enter Devil with a bundle of handbills, which he is in the act of posting.]

WANTED IMMEDIATELY,

All the liars, swindlers, thieves, robbers, incendiaries, murderers, cheats, adulterers, harlots, blackguards, drunkards, gamblers, bogus makers, idlers, busy bodies, pickpockets, vagabonds, filthy persons, hireling clergy, and their followers, and all other infidels, and rebellious, disorderly persons, for a crusade against Joe. Smith and the Mormons. Be quick, be quick, I say, or our cause will be ruined, and our kingdom overthrown by that d-d fool of an impostor and his associates, for even now all earth and hell is in a stew.

[Joe. Smith happens to be passing, and hails his Majesty.]

Good morning, Mr. Devil.—How now, you seem to be much engaged; what news have you got there?

Devil (slipping his bills into his pocket with a low bow).—O! good morning, Mr. Smith; I hope you are well, sir. Why—I—I was just out—out on a little business in my line; or, finally, to be candid, sir, I was contriving a fair and honorable warfare against you and your impositions, wherein piety is outraged, and religion greatly hindered in its useful course. For to be bold, sir, (and I despise anything underhanded,) I must tell you to your face that you have made me more trouble than all the ministers, or people of my whole dominion, have for ages past.

Smith.—Trouble! what trouble have I caused your Majesty? I certainly have endeavored to treat you, and all other persons, in a friendly manner, even my worst enemies; and I always aim to fulfill the Mormon creed, and that is, to mind my own business exclusively. Why should this trouble you, Mr. Devil?

Devil.—Ah! your own business, indeed. I know not what you may consider your business, it is so very complicated; but I know what you have done, and what you are aiming to do. You have disturbed the quiet of christendom, overthrown churches and societies, you have dared to call in question the truth and usefulness of old and established creeds, which have stood the test of ages; and have even caused tens of thousands to come out in open rebellion, not only against whole-some creeds, established forms and doctrines, well approved and orthodox, but against some of the most pious, learned, exemplary, and honorable clergy, whom both myself and all the world love, honor and esteem; and this is not all. But you are causing many persons to think who never thought before, and you would fain put the whole world a thinking, and then where will true religion and piety be? Alas! they will have no place among men, for if men keep such a terrible thinking and reasoning as they begin to do, since you commenced your business, as you call it, they never will continue to uphold the good old way in which they have jogged along in peace for so many ages; and thus, Mr. Smith, you will overthrow my kingdom, and leave me not a foot of ground on earth, and this is the very thing you aim at. But I, sir, have the boldness to oppose you by all the lawful means which I have in my power.

Smith.—Really, Mr. Devil, your Majesty has of late become very pious; I think some of your christian brethren have greatly misrepresented you. It is generally reported by them that you are opposed to religion. But—

Devil.—It is false; there is not a more religious and pious being in the world than myself, nor a being more liberal minded. I am decidedly in favor of all creeds, systems and forms of christianity, of whatever name or nature; so long as they leave out that abominable doctrine, which caused me so much trouble in former times, and which, after slumbering for ages, you have again revived; I mean the doctrine of direct communion with God, by new revelation. This is hateful, it is impious, it is directly opposed to all the divisions and branches of the christian church. I never could bear it. And for this very cause, I helped to bring to condign punishment all the prophets and the apostles of old, for while they were suffered to live with this gift of revelation, they were always exposing and slandering me, and all other good pious men, in exposing our deeds and purposes, which they called wicked, but which we considered as the height of zeal and piety; and when we killed them for these crimes of dreaming, prophesying, and vision seeing, they raised the cry of persecution; and so with you miserable, deluded Mormons.

Smith.—Then, your most Christian Majesty is in favor of all other religions but this one, are you?

Devil.—Certainly. I am fond of praying, singing, church building, bell ringing, going to meeting, preaching, and, withal, I have quite a missionary zeal. I like also long faces, long prayers, long robes, and learned sermons; nothing suits me better, than to see people who have been for a whole week oppressing their neighbors, grinding the face of the poor, walking in pride and folly, and serving me with all their heart, I say nothing suits me better, Mr. Smith, than to see these people go to meeting on Sunday, with a religious face on, and to see them pay a portion of their ill-gotten gains for the support of a priest, while he and his brethren pray with doleful groans and awful faces, saying, "Lord, we have left undone the things we ought to have done, and done the things we ought not;" and when service is ended, see them turn again to their business and pursue it greedily all the week, and the next Sunday at the same things. Now, Mr. Smith; do you not see that these, and all others, who have a form and deny the power, are my good christian children, and that their religion is a help to my cause?

Smith.—Certainly, your reasoning is clear and obvious as to these hypocrites, but you would not be pleased with people getting converted either at camp meeting, or some where else, and then putting their trust in that conversion, and in free grace to save them—would you not be opposed to this?

Devil.—Why should I have any objection to that kind of religion, Mr. Smith? I care not how much they get converted, nor how much they cry Lord, Lord, nor how much they trust to free grace to save them, so long as they do not do the works that their God has commanded them; I am sure of them at last, for you know all men are to be judged according to their deeds. What does their good old Bible say?—Does it not say, "Not every one that saith Lord, Lord, shall enter into my kingdom, but he that doeth the will of my Father, which is in heaven." No, no, Mr. Smith, I am not an enemy to religion, and especially to the modern forms of christianity, so long as they deny the power, they are a help to my cause; see how much discord, division, hatred, envy, strife, lying, contention, blindness, and even error and bloodshed, has been produced as the effect of these very systems. By these means I gain millions to my dominion, while at the same time we enjoy the credit of being pious christians; but you, Mr. Smith, are my enemy, my open and avowed enemy; you have even dared in a sacrilegious manner to tear the veil from all these fine systems, and to commence an open attack upon my kingdom, and this even when I had almost all christendom, together with the clergy, and gentlemen of the press, in my favor. How dare you venture thus to commence a revolution without reserve, and without aid or success, and in the midst of innumerable hosts of my subjects?

Smith.—Why, sir, in the first place, I knew that I had the truth on my side, and that your systems and forms of christianity were so manifestly corrupt, that one had only to lift the veil from your fooleries on one side, and to present plain and reasonable truth on the other, and the eyes of the people could at once distinguish the difference so clearly that, except they chose darkness rather than light, they would leave your ranks and come over to truth. For instance, what is easier than to show from the history of the past, that a religion of direct revelation was the only system ever instituted by the Lord, and the only one calculated to benefit mankind? What is easier than to show that this system saved the church from blood, famine, flames, war, division, bondage, doubt and darkness, many times, and that is the legitimate way and manner of God's government of his own peculiar people in all ages and dispensations.

Devil.—To be candid with you, Mr. Smith, I must own that what you have now said, neither myself nor my most able ministers have been able to gainsay by any argument or fact. But then you must recollect that tradition and custom, together with fashion and popular clamor, have in all ages had more effect than plain fact and sound reason—Hence, you see, we are yet safe, so long as we continue the cry from press and pulpit, and in Sunday schools, that all these things are done away and no longer needed. In this way, though God may speak, they will not hear; angels may minister, and they will not believe; visions may reveal, and they will not be enlightened; prophets may lift their voice, and their warnings pass unheeded; so you see we still have them as safe as we had the people in olden time. God can communicate no message to them which will be examined or heard with any degree of credence or candor. So for all the good they get from God, all communication being cut off, they might as well be without a God.

Thus you see I have full influence and control of the multitude by a means far more effectual than argument or reason, and I even teach them that it is a sin to reason, think or investigate, as it would disturb the even tenor of their pious breathings and devout groans and responses.

Smith, you must be extremely ignorant of human nature, as well as of the history of the past, to presume that reason and truth would have much effect with the multitude. Why, sir, look how effectually we warded off the truth at Ephesus, when Paul attempted to address them in the theatre. Strange, that with all these examples before you, you should venture to raise the hue and cry which has so oft been defeated, and this with no better weapons on your side than reason and truth. Indeed, you may thank my christian spirit of forbearance that you have escaped so far without a griliron; but take care for the future, I may not always be so mild.

Smith.—But why is your majesty so highly excited against me, and my plans of operation, seeing that you consider that you have the multitude perfectly safe? and why so enraged and so fearful of the consequences of my course, and the effect of my weapons, while at the same time you profess to despise them as weak and powerless? Alas! it is too true that you have the multitude safe to all appearance at present, and that truth can seldom reach them: why not then be content, and leave me to pursue my calling in peace? I can hardly hope to win to the cause of truth any but the few who think, and these have ever been troublesome to your cause.

Devil.—True, but then you are, in spite of all my efforts, and that of my fellows, daily thinning our ranks by adding to the number of those who think, and such a thinking is kept up that we are often exposed in some of our most prominent plans, and are placed in an awkward predicament and who knows what defeat, disgrace and dishonor may befall the pious cause if you are suffered to continue your rebellious course.

Smith.—But, Mr. Devil, why, with all these other advantages on your side, do you resort to such mean, weak and silly fabrications as the Spaulding Story? You profess to be a gentleman, a christian, and a clergyman, and you ought, for your own sake, and for the sake of your cause, to keep an outward appearance of honor and fairness. And now, Mr. Devil, tell the truth for once: you know perfectly well that your Spaulding Story, in which you represent me as an impostor, in connection with Sidney Rigdon, and that we were engaged in palming Solomon Spaulding's romance upon the world as the Book of Mormon, is a lie, a base fabrication, without a shadow of truth, and you know that I found the Original Records of the Nephites, and translated and published the Book of Mormon from them, without ever having heard of the existence of Spaulding, or his romance, or of Sidney Rigdon either. Now, Mr. Devil, this was a mean, disgraceful and underhanded trick in you, and one of which even you have reason to be ashamed.

Devil.—Well, Mr. Smith, to be candid, I acknowledge that what you say is true, and that it was not the most honorable course in the world. But it was you who commenced the war, by publishing that terrible book which we readily recognized as a complete expose of all our false and corrupt christianity, not even keeping back the fact that we had continued during the dark ages, to rob the scriptures of their plainness, and we feel the utmost alarm and excitement, and without much reflection, in the height of passion, we called a hasty council of clergy and editors, and other rascals, in Painesville, Ohio, and, thinking that almost any means was lawful in war, we invented the Spaulding Story, and fathered it upon the poor printer, Howe, of Painesville, although Doctor Hulbert (thanks to my aid) was its real author. But mark, Mr. Smith, mark one thing, we had not a face so hard, nor a conscience so abandoned, as to publish this Spaulding Story at the first as a positive fact; we only published it as a conjecture, a mere probability, and this, you know, we had a right to do; without once thinking of the amount of evil it would eventually accomplish. But, sir, it was some of my unfortunate clergymen who, more reckless, hardened and unprincipled than myself, have ventured to add to each edition of this story, till at last, without my aid or consent, they have set it down for a positive fact, that Solomon Spaulding, Sidney Rigdon and yourself have made up the Book of Mormon out of a romance! Now, Mr. Smith, I am glad of this interview with you, as it gives me the opportunity of clearing up my character. I acknowledge with shame that I was guilty of a mean act in helping to hatch up and publish the Spaulding Story as a probability, and that I associated with rascals far beneath my dignity, either as a sovereign prince, or religious minister, or even as an old, honorable and experienced Devil, and for this I beg your pardon. But, really, I must deny the charge of having assisted in making the additions which have appeared in the latter editions of that story, in which my former probabilities and mean conjectures are set down for positive facts. No, Mr. Smith, I had no hand in a trick so low and mean; I despise it—as the work of priests and editors alone, without my aid or suggestion, and I do not believe that even the meanest young devils in our dominion would have stooped to such an act.

Smith.—Well, I must give your majesty some credit for once at least, if what you say is true, but how can you justify your conduct in dishonoring yourself so far as to stoop to the level of the hireling clergy, and their followers, in still making use of this humbug story, (which you affect to despise,) in order to still blind the eyes of the people in regard to the origin of the Book of Mormon?

Devil.—O! Mr. Smith, it does take so readily among the pious of all sects, that it seems a pity to spoil the fun, and I cannot resist the temptation of carrying out the joke, now it is so well rooted in their minds. And you can't think how we devils shake our sides with laughter when we get up in the gallery in some fine church, put on our long face, and assist in singing, and in the devout responses; this done, the Spaulding Story is gravely told from the pulpit, while the pious old clergyman wears a face as long as that of Balaam's beast.—All is swallowed down for solid truth by the gaping multitude, while we hang our heads behind the screen, and laugh and wink at each other in silence, as anything overheard would disturb their worship: and as bad as I am, I never wish to disturb those popular modes of worship, which decency requires us to respect.—

So you see, Mr. Smith, we have our fun to ourselves, at your expense; but, after all, we do not mean any hurt by it, although I must acknowledge, upon the whole, it serves our purpose.

Smith.—Well, we will drop this subject, as I want to inquire about some of your other stories which have had an extensive circulation by means of your editors and priests. For instance, there is the story of my attempting to walk on the water and getting drowned; the numerous stories of my attempting to raise the dead as a mere trick of imposition, and getting detected in it; and the stories of my attempting to appear as an angel, and getting caught and exposed in the same; and besides this, you have me killed by some means, every little while. Now, you old hypocrite, you know that none of these things ever happened, or any circumstance out of which to make them; and that so far from this I deny the principle of a man's working miracles, either real or pretended, as a proof of his mission, and contend that miracles, if wrought at all, were wrought for benevolent purposes, and without being designed to convince the unbeliever.—Why, then, do you resort to such silly stories in your opposition to me, seeing that you have many other advantages? Not that I would complain of such weak opposition, as if it were calculated to hinder my progress, but rather to mention it as something well calculated to injure your own cause, by betraying your weakness, folly and meanness.

Devil. (laughing).—Hah, hah, hah, eh, c, O! Mr. Smith, I just put out these stories for a joke, in order to have my own fun, and without the most distant idea that any being on earth would be so silly as to give any credence to them; but judge my surprise and joy, when I found priests, editors and people, so depraved in their judgment and tastes, so in love with lies, and so ready to catch at everything against their common enemy, as they call you, that these jocose stories of ours, actually took in their credulous cranium for grave truths, and were passed about by them and sought after and swallowed by the multitude as greedily as a young robin swallows a worm when it is dropped into its mouth, which is stretched at full width, while its eyes are closed. So you see, Mr. Smith, that without meaning any particular harm to you, I have my fun, and am besides so unexpectedly fortunate as to reap great advantages from circumstances where I had neither expected nor calculated. So I hope you will at least bear my folly, nor set down aught in malice, where no malice was intended. You know we devils are poor miserable creatures at best, and were it not for our fun, and our gambling, and our religious exercises, we would have nothing to kill time.

Smith.—Well, well. I see plainly you will have a creep out some how or other, rather than bear the disgrace and stigma which your conduct would seem to deserve. But forgetting the past, let me enquire what course you intend to pursue in future, and whether this warfare between you and me will still be prosecuted? And if so, what course you intend to pursue hereafter. You know my course. I have long since taken the field at the head of a mere handful of brave patriots, who are true as the pole star, and firm as the rock of Gibraltar. They laugh at and despise your silly stories, and with nothing but a few plain simple weapons of truth and reason, aided by revelation, we boldly make war upon your whole dominion, and will never quit the field, dead or alive, till we win the battle and deprive you of every foot of ground you possess. This is my purpose; and although I am bold and generous enough to declare it. So you see I am not for taking any unwary advantage, notwithstanding all your pious tricks upon me and the public.

Devil.—Mr. Smith, I am too much of the gentleman not to admire your generous frankness and your boldness, and too much of a christian not to appreciate your honesty; but as you commenced this war, and I only acted at first on the defensive, with the pure motive of defending my kingdom, I think this ought in some degree at least to excuse the means I have made use of. And that you may have no reason to complain in future, I will now fully open to you the plan of my future campaign. Here (pulling out his bundle of hand bills) is what I was doing this morning, when by chance we met; and by the reading of which you will see my course. Heretofore I have endeavored to throw contempt upon your course, in hopes to smother it and to keep it under, as something beneath the notice of us well informed christians.—For this cause I have generally caused it to be represented that you was an ignorant, silly man, and that your followers were made up of the unthinking and vulgar, and not worthy of notice. But the fact is, you have made such rapid strides, and have poured forth such a torrent of intelligence, and gathered such a host of talented and thinking men around you, that I can no longer conceal these facts under a bushel of burning lies, and therefore I now change my purpose and my manner of attack. I shall endeavor to magnify you and your success from this time forward, and to make you appear as much larger than the reality, as you have heretofore fallen short. If my former course has excited contempt, and caused you to be despised, and thus kept you out of notice, my future course will be to excite jealousy, fear and alarm, till all the world is ready to arise and crush you, as if you were a legion of Sampsons, commanded by Bonaparte. This, I think, will be more successful in putting you down, than the ignoble course I have heretofore taken—so prepare for the worst.

Smith.—I care as little for your magnifying powers, as I have heretofore done for your contempt; in fact, I will endeavor to go ahead to that degree, that what you say in regard to my great influence and power, though intended by you for falsehood, shall prove to be true, and by so doing I shall be prepared to receive those whom you may excite against me, and to give them so warm a reception, that they will never discover your intended falsehood, but will find all your representations of my greatness to be a reality—so do your worst. I defy you.

Devil.—Well, time will determine whether the earth is to be governed by a prophet and under the sway of truth, or whether myself, and my christian friends will still prevail. But remember Smith, remember, I beseech you for your own good beware what you are doing. I have the Priests and Editors, with a few exceptions, under my control, together with wealth, popularity and honor. Count well the cost before you again plunge into this warfare. Good bye, Mr. Smith, I must away to raise my recruits and prepare for a campaign.

Smith.—Good bye to your Majesty.

(They both touch hats and turn away.)

Devil (Recollecting himself and suddenly turning back.) O! say, Mr. Smith, one word more if you please, (in a low and confidential tone, with his mouth close to his ear,) after all, what is the use of parting as enemies; the fact is, you go in for the wheat and I for the tares. Both must be harvested; are we not fellow laborers? I can make no use of the wheat, nor you of the tares, even if we had them; we each claim our own, I for the burning, and you for the barn. Come, then, give the poor old Devil his due, and let's be friends.

Smith.—Agreed; I neither want yours, nor you mine—a man free from prejudice, will give the Devil his due. Come here is the right hand of fellowship, you to tares, and I to the wheat—(they shake hands cordially.)

Devil.—Well, Mr. Smith, we have talked a long while, and are agreed at last—you are a noble and generous fellow; and would not bring a railing accusation against even a poor old Devil, nor cheat him of one cent.—Come, it is a warm day, and I feel as though it is my treat.—Let us go down to my many Brewer's cellar and take something to drink.

Smith.—Agreed, Mr. Devil, you appear very generous now.

(They enter the cellar together.)

Devil.—Good morning, Mrs. Brewer; I make you acquainted with my good friend, Mr. Smith, the prophet. (The land-lady smiling and looking a little surprised,) why, Mr. Devil, is that you, sit down, you're tired; but you don't say this is Mr. Smith, your greatest enemy?—I am quite surprised. What will you have, gentlemen, for if you can drink together, I think all the world ought to be friends.

Devil.—As we are both temperance men, and ministers, I think perhaps a glass of spruce beer a-piece will be all right—what say you, Mr. Smith?

Smith.—As you please, your Majesty.

(They now take the beer.)

Devil.—(Holding up his glass) Come, Mr. Smith, your good health, I propose we offer a toast. Smith.—Well, proceed.

Devil.—Here's to my friend, Joe Smith, may all sorts of ill luck befall him, and may he never be suffered to enter my kingdom, either in time or eternity, for he would almost make me forget that I am a devil, and make a gentleman of me, while he gently overthrows my government, at the same time that he wins my friendship.

Smith.—Here's to his Satanic Majesty; may he be driven from the earth, and be forced to put to sea in a stone canoe with an iron paddle, and may the canoe sink, and a shark swallow the canoe and its royal freight, and an alligator swallow the shark, and may the alligator be bound in the north-west corner of hell, the door be locked, key lost, a blind man hunting for it.

(Exit Devil, Prophet, and all.)

SECTARIAN SERMON.

You will find my text in the Old Spellingbook, on the 83d page. The passage reads thus: "An old man found a rude boy upon one of his trees stealing apples, and desired him to come down, but the young saucer told him plainly he would not.—Wont you, said the old man; then I will fetch you down: so he pulled up some tufts of grass and threw at him, but this only made the youngster laugh, to think the old man should pretend to beat him down from the tree with grass only. Well, well, said the old man, if neither words nor grass will do, I will try what virtue there is in stones. So the old man pelted him heartily with stones, which soon made the young chap hasten down from the tree and beg the old man's pardon."

Our text leads us, firstly, to examine the two characters mentioned. And the use we shall make of this for our present purpose, is, to show the striking resemblance this subject bears between God and the poor, impenitent sinner. The aged man typifies very early the character of God while dispensing his mercy and judgments toward the ungodly. He is the most aged or ancient of all, and is the owner not only of the tree spoken of, but of all the trees in this vast universe; yea, also the cattle upon a thousand hills are his, and he has the most unaltered right not only to prohibit this rude sinner from eating his fruit, but all others who remain in an unregenerate state.

No less the hardness and impenitency of this almost incorrigible sinner. He plants himself firmly in the middle of the tree and bids defiance to all the entreaties of his kind benefactor, still intent upon his own way, and his everlasting destruction. And while his kind friend is using the most mild and harmless means, such as the grass, which would not hurt even the infant, the youth has the impudence to smile as with contempt in his face without even one single sigh of penitence.

Fit emblem this of the manner in which God deals with the impenitent. He stretches out his arm of mercy all the day long, and pleads with the poor sinner in the most tender manner; but, alas! he too often turns his back upon all the solemn warnings, not only of God and the holy scriptures, but also the strong cryings of his ministers and friends, and chooses his own way down to the bottomless pit, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth forever and ever.

But, notwithstanding the hardness of heart manifested by the rude sinner under consideration, he at last repented, and begged pardon of him whom he had before slighted, and was forgiven. So there are a certain number of sinners whom God has elected from all eternity, that he will finally save, though all are alike hardened, all hate him; nevertheless, when the great stone of the gospel smites the sinners in the heart, then all those that are elected will certainly yield unto God and be converted, but all the rest will follow their own evil ways; and the stone pointed by the same friendly hand will unavoidably fall upon the rest, and grind them to powder.

Although you are all in the same state, and have not the least disposition, nor can you by any exertion that you can make of yourselves get any to repent; yet you are all called sincerely and alike: and if you do not repent and turn to God without delay, you will surely be damned. The reason why I am thus plain with the poor sinner is, I wish him to use the means which God in his great mercy has provided, specially of latter years.

The improvements have been great, very great, in getting religion, and none need despair.—Revival ministers are now sent for from almost every part of the globe, protracted meetings are held, anxious benches are erected, friends are ready to pray for you, and thousands are being converted every day. Come, poor sinner, come and accept of this glorious plan of salvation, before it is forever too late. It may be before to-morrow morning you may be lifting up your eyes in everlasting torment; therefore, turn ye, turn ye, while these glorious blessings are held out to your view; for why will you die?—Amen. R. P.

The above is a fair specimen of sectarian preaching—rather flat.

NEWSPAPERS IN THE U. S.

The census statistics of 1850 present some interesting facts touching the number and circulation of newspapers in the United States. It appears that the total circulation of newspapers is 3,825,647. Total of periodicals, 946,049. Total of both, 4,771,696. New York ranks first in the number and circulation of newspapers, the number being 403, and circulation 983,486.—Pennsylvania is next, having 272 newspapers, and 796,297 circulation. Massachusetts third in circulation, 530,144, but fourth in number of papers, 170. Ohio is third in number of papers, 272, but fourth in circulation, 213,717. The papers of Ohio are thus classified: Whig, 101; Democrat, 87; Free Soil, 18; Neutral and Independent, 20; Literary and Musical, 10; Religious, 11; not specified, 27.

The difference in favor of the circulation of newspapers in the free States over the slave States is quite as great as the difference in the number of journals published. The total published in the several States is as follows: Pennsylvania, 272; Massachusetts, 170; Maine, 52; Connecticut, 45; New Jersey, 58; Maryland, 64; Mississippi, 56; Alabama 60; North Carolina, 51; South Carolina, 40; New Hampshire, 36; Vermont, 34; Rhode Island, 20; Georgia, 40; Florida, 11; Delaware, 11; New York, 403; Arkansas, 16; Wisconsin, 47; Tennessee, 57; Kentucky, 63; Michigan, 61; Missouri, 73; Illinois, 113; Indiana, 120; Ohio, 272; Virginia, 91; Texas, 37; Iowa, 30; Louisiana, 59; District of Columbia, 10; California, 7.

The Sacs and Fox Indians, now on a visit to Washington, visited the Department of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, when Major Dix, the chief clerk, in the absence of Col. Lea, assured them that their Great Father would give them a formal interview after the adjournment of Congress, and, in the mean time, every attention would be paid to them.

The Sacs number at this time about 1,300 souls, the Foxes about 700. The tribe still retains its love of savage life and manners beyond almost all others of the removed Indians on our borders. They dislike schools, missionaries, and even dwellings, and many of them yearn to go farther west, that they may be sent more away from civilization, as well as nearer the buffalo and other game.—Their efforts at cultivation have been very feeble, though they inhabit a fine country, well adapted to successful agriculture.—The tribe has a fund of $30,000.—Weekly Times.

FROM THE PLAINS.

Col. George E. Blodget has arrived at St. Joseph from the Plains. He left St. Joseph about May 1st, to accompany his express train for California as far as Devil's Gate on Sweet Water river, from which point he started on his return on the 27th of July. The Col. met many different companies on the way, the last being that of James Moore, of Platte county, Mo., which was met about five miles this side of Fort Laramie, on the 5th August, driving about 10,000 head of sheep, which, from bad water and continued travel, were dying at the rate of forty to forty-five daily. He aimed to winter at Salt Lake and not leave in the spring till after taking their fleece, the product of which he supposed would pay the expense and loss.

Col. Blodget has handed the St. Joseph's Gazette a list containing the names, time of death, and former residence of some hundred and fifty persons whose graves he saw on the roadside on the North side of Platte, between Devil's Gate and Missouri river. There are many graves off the road he did not see, the majority who die are buried at the different camping places, sometimes four and five miles off the main trail. He describes the scene along the entire road as truly heart rending; from the imperfect manner in which the dead are buried, the wolves soon scent and drag them from their shallow graves, strewn the trail with human bones. He estimates the emigration this year at 40,000 people, with 8000 wagons, and about 600 head of cattle.

WEATHER AND WATER.

Since the summer of 1846 there has not been in this northern region as dry and warm a season as the present. Very little rain has fallen for two months past and the ground is parched with heat and thirst. Destructive fires have swept through many portions of the forest country and at the same time an extensive fire is raging among the hills in the distance on the Canada side.—This dry clear weather has already had its effect on the waters of the lake and the river below, and notwithstanding the vast extent of this inland sea this continued absence of rain, by which its thousand streams are in a measure dried up, causes its waters to subside and serves also to correct the erroneous popular impression that this, as well as all the other lakes, rises and falls once in seven years. When we have around the great basin of the lakes, dry and clear seasons like this the water will be observed, we think, to invariably fall, and vice versa.—Lake Superior Journal.

A PROBLEM FOR THE SCIENTIFIC.

There are observable at Rye Beach, near the Ocean House, at extreme low water, the stumps of a forest thickly studding the sand. They are the remains of trees of a large growth, but what kind, the change wrought in them by time and the action of the sea renders it impossible to determine—at least upon cursory examination. We do not learn that they have ever been seen before the present season, the severe storms of last Spring apparently having washed the sand from them and left them distinctly exposed to view. There appears to be no account of them from history or tradition. How is the phenomenon to be explained? Was the bed of the ocean in this quarter once verdure covered earth, which some mighty convulsion of nature sunk beneath the waters, at a period to which the "memory of man runneth not?" The subject is certainly deserving the attention of both the curious and the scientific.—Portsmouth (N. H.) Gazette.

INDIAN PAYMENT.

The Ojibwas of this vicinity were paid their annuities at this place last Monday and for a day or two they were a rich people. We have never witnessed a more quiet, orderly gathering of this kind in the Indian country.—There was no drunkenness, no noise, no disturbance of any kind; the Indians who wanted to spend their money, bought what they wished, and departed for their homes in peace.—There has been a manifest improvement in this respect, as well as in the general conduct of the Indians, within a few years past. At this payment several hundred dollars have been laid aside for investment in land, and it seems to be their intention to provide for themselves resting places and homes against the day when their annuities will cease, and they will be deprived of even the tender mercies and protection of the government.—Lake Superior Journal.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Advices have been received from the Cape of Good Hope to the 14th June, sixteen days later. The papers are filled with accounts of outrages and murders in various parts of the Colony.

The warfare had assumed a guerrilla character and there appeared to be no safety for life in traversing any of the public roads. Armies of Kaffirs, 2,000 strong, were located in the mountains from which they descended to plunder, murder and destroy. Some of the Colonists are so disheartened that they are about selling off their possessions and emigrating to Australia.

General Cathcart was about to make a general onslaught upon the Caffirs in their strong holds. Fifty-one Caffir women, who had acted as spies, had been captured by the English.

CURE FOR INTEMPERANCE.

We have seldom met with a more striking instance of the union of simplicity and wisdom, for which the Quakers are remarkable, than the following:—A man addicted to habits of intoxication, was suffering the usual miserable consequences, and, in a moment of repentance said he would give anything to cure himself.

"It is as easy as to open thine hand," said a Quaker.

"Convince me of that," replied the inebriate, "and I will persevere in the experiment."

"When thou takest the tempting glass into thine hand," replied the Quaker, "before thou liftest the liquor to thy lips, open thine hand, and keep it open, and thou wilt be cured."

A complete reformation ensued. How simple, easy and effectual a rule! Try it.

EVERY good act, says Mehomot, is charity. Your smiling in your brother's face is charity; an exhortation of your fellow men to virtuous deeds is equal to almsgiving; your putting a wanderer on the right road, is charity; your removing stones and thorns and obstructions from the road, is charity. A man's true wealth hereafter is the good he does in this world to his fellowmen. When he dies, people will say, "what property has he left behind him?" But the angels who examine him in the grave, will ask, "what deeds hast sent before thee?"

A WARNING.—Dr. Howe has examined carefully almost the entire number of cases of Idiocy known in Massachusetts, and the result is that in all but four instances, he has found the parents of these idiots were intemperate, addicted to sensual vices, scornful, predisposed to insanity, or had intermarried with blood relations.

The distressing Montreal conflagration, appears to have destroyed over 1,000 houses, and left some 6,000 persons homeless and destitute. An era of one square mile is burnt over. Meetings for the relief of the sufferers are being called in various parts of the country. The loss is estimated at near $3,000,000.

A TEMPERANCE SONG.

Who shall talk of strength and freedom,
With a loud and fevered breath,
While they let a full cup lead them
To the slavery of death?
Bravery that needs inspiring
By the grape and barley corn,
Only gives the random firing,
Cunning foes may laugh to scorn.

Do ye hope to march the faster
To the summit of your claims,
While you let such tyrant master
Strike your limbs in staggering shame?
Do ye find the hot libation,
Poured so wildly on the heart,
Make it sifter for his station,
Whatsoever may be its part?

Father, husband, wife or mother?
Can ye do the work ye should,
While the fumes of sadness smother
Human love and human good?
Wonder not that children trample
All fair precept in the dust,
When a parent's foul example
Robs a home of peace and trust.

Who shall reckon all the anguish—
Who shall dream of all the sin,
Who shall tell the souls that languish
At the spectre shrine of Gin?
Never shall we find a surer
Portal to the beams and cell,
Where the poor becometh poorer,
Where earth seems akin to hell.

"Be ye sober!" they who struggle
For the better lot below,
Must not let the full cup juggle
Soul and body into woe.
"Be ye sober!" if ye covet
Healthful days and peaceful nights;
Strong drink warpeth those who love it Into sad and fearful sights.

"Be ye sober!" cheeks grow haggard,
Eyes turn dim, and pulse tide blood
Runs too fast or crawleth laggard
When there's poison in the flood.
Will ye let a demon bind ye
In the chain of Helot thrall?
Will ye let the last hour find ye
In the lowest pit of all?

Oh! stand back in godly terror,
When temptation's joys begin;
Tis such wily maze of error,
Few get out who once get in.
Shun the "dram" that can but darken,
When its vapor gleam has fled;
Reason says, and ye must hearken,
"Lessened drinks brings double bread."

Though your rulers may neglect ye,
"Be ye sober!" in your strength,
And they must and shall respect ye,
And the light shall dawn at length.
But let none cry out for freedom,
With a loud and fevered breath,
While they let a full cup lead them
To the slavery of death.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

"O God! where art thou?
and where is the pavilion that covereth thy hiding-place? how long shall thy hand be stayed, and thy pure eyes behold from the heavens the wrongs and sufferings of thy people, and of thy servants; and thine ears be penetrated with their cries? How long, O Lord! shall they thus suffer, before thine heart shall be softened towards them, and thy bowels be moved with compassion towards them?"

"O Lord God Almighty, maker of heaven, earth, and seas, and of all things that in them is, and who controleth and subjecteth the devil and the dark and benighted dominions of Satan, stretch forth thy hand, let thine eye pierce, let thy pavilion be taken up, let thy hiding-place no longer be uncovered, let thine ear be inclined, let thine heart be softened, and thy bowels move with compassion towards thy people; and let thine anger be kindled against our enemies, and in thy fury let fall the sword of thine indignation, and avenge us of our wrongs. Remember thy suffering Saints, O our God! and thy servants will rejoice in thy name forever.

"Dearly beloved brethren, we realize that perilous times have come, as have been testified of in ancient days, and we may look with certainty and the most perfect assurance for the rolling in of all those things which have been spoken of by all the holy prophets: lift up your eyes to to the bright luminary of day, and you can say, Soon thou shalt veil thy blushing face, for at the behest of him who said, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' thou shalt withdraw thy shining. Thou moon, thou dim-mer light, and luminary of night, shalt turn to blood. We see that the prophecies concerning the last days are fulfilling, and the time shall soon come when the 'Son of man shall descend in the clouds of heaven, in power and great glory.'

"We do not shrink, nor are our hearts and spirits broken at the grievous yoke which is put upon us. We know that God will have our oppressors in derision, that he will laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh. We think we should have got out of our prison house, at the time Elder Rigdon got a writ of habeas corpus, had not our own lawyers interpreted the law contrary to what it reads, and against us, which prevented us from introducing our witnesses before the mock court; they have done us much harm from the beginning; they have lately acknowledged that the law was misconstrued, and then tanzalized our feelings with it, and have now entirely forsaken us, have forfeited both their oaths and their bonds, and are co-workers with the mob. From the information we received, the public mind has been for some time turning in our favor, and the majority is now friendly, and the lawyers can no longer browbeat us by saying, that this or that is a matter of public opinion, for public opinion is not willing to brook all their proceedings, but is beginning to look with feelings of indignation upon our oppressors.
We think that truth, honor, virtue, and innocence, will eventually come out triumphant.

"We know that there cannot be any charge sustained against us, and that the conduct of the mob—the murders at Haun's Mill, the exterminating order of Governor Boggs, and the one-side, rascally proceedings of the Legislature, have damned the State of Missouri to all eternity. General Atchison has proved himself to be as contemptible as any of our enemies. We have tried a long time to get our lawyers to draw us some petitions to the supreme judges of this State, but they have utterly refused; we have examined the laws, and drawn the petitions ourselves, and have obtained abundance of proof to counteract all the testimony that is against us, so that if the judges do not grant us our liberty they have got to act contrary to honor, evidence, law, or justice, merely to please the mob;
but we hope better things, and trust that before many days, God will so order our case, that we shall be set at liberty, and again enjoy the society of the Saints.

"We received some letters from our friends, last evening,
one from Emma, one from D. C.
Smith, and one from Bishop Pat-ridge, all breathing a kind and consoling spirit; we had been a long time without information from our friends, and when we read those letters they were refreshing to our souls, as the gentle air and refreshing breeze, but our feelings of joy were mingled with feelings of pain and sorrow on account of the sufferings of the poor and much injured Saints, and we did not say unto you that the flood-gates of our hearts were open, and our eyes were a fountain of tears.

"Those who have not been inclosed in the walls of a prison, without cause or occasion, can have but little idea how sweet the voice of a friend, or one token of friendship is, from any source whatever, and how it calls into action every sympathetic feeling of the human heart; it brings to review everything that has passed, it seizes the present with the velocity of lightning, and grasps after the future with fond anticipation; it fills the mind with tenderness and love, until all enmity, malice, hatred, past difference, misunderstandings, and mismanagements, are entirely forgotten, or are slain victims at the feet of love.—
When the heart is sufficiently contrite, then the voice of inspiration steals along and whispers, My son, peace be unto thy soul;—thine adversity and thy afflictions shall be but for a moment; and then, if thou art faithful and endure, God shall exalt thee on high, thou shalt triumph over all thy foes, thy friends shall stand by thee, and shall hail thee again with warm hearts: thou art not yet as Job, thy friends do not contend against thee, neither do they charge thee with transgression; and those who do charge thee with transgression, their hope shall be blasted, and their prospects melt away, as the hoar frost melteth before the rays of the rising sun. It likewise informs us that God has set his hand to change the times and the seasons, and to blind the minds of the wicked, that they may not understand his marvellous workings, that he may take them in their own craftiness, because their hearts are corrupt, and the distress and sorrow which they seek to bring upon the saints, shall return upon them double; and, not many years hence, they and their posterity shall be destroyed from under heaven. Cursed are all those that shall lift up the heel against mine anointed; saith the Lord, for they have not sinned before me, saith the Lord, but have done that which was meet in mine eyes, and which I commanded them, saith the Lord. Those who cry transgression do it because they are the servants of sin, and are the children of disobedience themselves, and swear falsely against thy servants, that they may bring them into bondage and death.

"Woe unto them, because they have offended my little ones;
they shall be severed from the ordinances of mine house, their basket shall not be full, their houses and their lands shall be empty, and they themselves shall be despised by those who have flattered them. They shall not have right to the priesthood, nor their posterity after them, from generation to generation; and it would have been better for them that a mill-stone had been hung about their necks, and they drowned in the depths of the sea.

"Woe unto all those who drive, and murder, and testify against my people, saith the Lord of hosts, for they shall not escape the damnation of hell: behold mine eye seeth, and I know all their works, and I have in reserve a swift judgment in the season thereof, and they shall be rewarded according to their works.

"God has said he would have a tried people, and that he would purify them as gold is purified;
now, we think he has chosen his own crucible to try us, and if we should be so happy as to endure and keep the faith, it will be a sign to this generation, sufficient to leave them without excuse; and that it will be a trial of our faith equal to that of Abraham or any of the ancients, and that they will not have such cause to boast over us, in the persecutions and trials they endured.

"After passing through so much suffering and sorrow, we trust that before long a ram may be caught in the thicket, so that the sons and daughters of Abraham may be relieved from their fears and anxiety, and that their faces may once more be lighted up with joy and salvation, and be enabled to hold out unto everlasting life.

"If anything should have been suggested by us, or any name mentioned except by commandment, or 'thus saith the Lord,'
we do not consider it binding;
therefore we shall not feel grieved
if you should deem it wisdom to make different arrangements.
We would respectfully advise the brethren to be aware of an aspiring spirit, which has frequently urged men forward to make foul speeches, and beget an undue influence in the minds of the Saints, and bring much sorrow and distress in the church.
We would likewise say, be aware of pride: for truly hath the wise man said, 'Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall.'

MOTHER.

How sweet the recollection in after years of a mother's tender training. It were well that to a mother this duty should be confided, if it only were for the delicious pleasure of musing on it after many long years of struggle with the cold realities of life.
Who is there that finds no relief in recurring to the scenes of his infancy and youth, gilded with recollection of a mother's tenderness? And how many have nobly owned that to the salutary influence then exerted they must ascribe their future success, their avoidance of evil when no eye was upon them, but when rested on the heart the warnings, the prayers and tears of a mother.

EDUCATION.

Accustom a child as soon as it can speak, to narrate his little experiences, his chapters of accidents, his fears, his hopes; to communicate what he has noticed in the world without, and what he feels struggling in the world within. Anxious to have something to narrate, he will be induced to give attention to objects around him, and what is passing in the sphere of his instruction, and to observe and note events will become one of his first pleasures, and this is the ground of a thoughtful character.

STRANGE!—As long as a man can get six dollars a week he can live, and get along rather quietly and contented; but as his wages reach twelve a week he needs twenty-four—gets in debt and breaks up, at that. Man is a high-pressure engine, vanity is the steam, money the fuel—apply the principle, and you have the facts. Make a note of it.

PATENT LOVE LETTER.

My Deare Friend—While wandering round from place to place, I sit down to write you a few lines to let you know that I am somewhat out of health, and I hope these few lines will find you the same. My deare to tell you the truth, this world seems to me like a wilderness of woe to me since you have treated me as you have; I think of you where ever I go, and O if I could recall the past, quick would I give this world—if I had it to give—but it is gone, and I can't recall it, so adieu my dearest of all dears, and the sweetest of all sweats;
but O I must go down to the grave in sorrow and regret; but O if I could see your lovely face once more and thy pretty form, and have one sweet kiss of thy sweet lips, it would cure me of sorrow and care; but O I am afraid it never can be; but my love and my deare (O Jerusalem!) and the only one on earth that I ever did place my affections on, it seems hard to be without thee, and if you have any com-passions on such a fellow-sinner as I am do forgive the past, for my heart lies heavier than the sun on the sea! and if you can't forgive the past, hear is the last adieu. M. O.

True Courage.—An officer of distinction and tried valor refused to accept a challenge sent by a young officer, but returned the following characteristic answer:—"I fear not your sword, but the sword of my God's anger. I dare venture my life in a good cause, but cannot incur my soul in a bad one. I will charge up to the cannon's mouth for my country, but I want courage to storm hell."

"MEZZER'S DARLIN' BOY."—The Editor of the Blue Hen's Chickens thus barbarously dis-coursed about babies:—
It strikes us that more fine are told about babies, than anything else in the world. We all say they are sweet, yet everybody who can smell knows they are sour; we all say that they are lovely, yet nine babies in ten, have no more pretensions to beauty than a pug dog;
we praise their expressive eyes, yet all babies squint; we call them doves, though one of them makes more noise than a colony of screech owls.

"Ma," said a little girl to her mother, "do the men want to get married as much as the women?"

"Pshaw! what are you talking?"

"Why, no, the women who come here are always talking about getting married, the men don't do so."

Mr. Wood writes:—Louis Napoleon is a man of most decided ability. He has not, as may be supposed lived a life of indol-gence. He has a well disciplined mind, and is well read in the principles of government.
He works hard and keeps those about him at work.

Miss Nancy says, that white folks are inventing this and inventing that, she wishes to gracious! somebody would invent something for bringing up children, and then she would get married right off.

A lawyer, after a little reflection, remarked that he had said he believed the Court could be bought with a peck of beans; that he had said it without reflecting, and wished to take it back, adding: "if I had put it at half a bushel, I never would have taken it back in the world!"

"There's our Gettosh," said Mr.
Sheldon, "he must go off to the city to make a living by his wits." "Well how did he make out?" asked a friend. "Ah!" said the old man with a sigh, tapping his forehead significantly, "he failed for want of stock."

A THRIVING TRADE.—The following reply is said to have been given by a little boy in London, to the question asked him by a gentleman:—"What occupation does your father pursue for a living?" He answered, "he is a dreadful accident maker, sir, for newspapers."

Abundance is a trouble, want a misery, honor a burden, and advancement dangerous, but competency is happiness.

It is an extraordinary fact that those who get to high words generally use low language.

THE MUTE WITNESS;

OR, THE DOG AND THE ASSASSIN.

While traveling in 1787 through the beautiful city of Leipzig, I observed, about half a league from the gates of the town, a few rods from the highway, a wheel and the bones of a chained corpse exposed to the gaze of every passer.

The following is the history of that criminal, as I learned it from the lips of the judge who conducted the trial, and condemned him to be broken alive.

A German butcher being benighted in the midst of a forest, lost his way, and while endeavoring to gain the road, was attacked by three highwaymen.—He was on horseback, and accompanied by a large dog. One of the robbers seized the horse by the bridle, while the two others dragged the butcher from the saddle and felled him. The dog leaped immediately upon one of them and strangled him; but the other wounded the animal so severely that he rushed into the thicket, uttering the most fearful howls.

The butcher, who by this time had disengaged himself from the grasp of the second robber, drew his knife and killed him. But at the same moment he received a shot from the pistol of the third, who had just wounded the dog, and falling, was despatched by the thief, who found upon him a large sum in gold, a silver watch, and a few other articles of value. He plundered the corpse, leaped upon the horse and fled.

The next morning two woodcutters, happening in that path, were surprised to find three dead bodies and a large dog, who seemed to be guarding them.—They examined them and endeavored to restore life, but in vain. One of them dressed the wounds of the dog, gave him some food, and sought some water for him, while the other hastened to the nearest village to inform the magistrate of their discovery. The officer, accompanied by several attendants, was soon on the spot; a surgeon examined the wounds of the three bodies; they drew up a verbal process, and interred them.

The dog dragged himself, in the course of the night, when all was quiet, to the corpse of his master, where he was found the next morning. He allowed his new friends to dress his wounds, and as if foreseeing that he must not live that he might one day avenge the murdered, he ate and drank, but would not leave the spot.—He looked on quietly while they dug the grave, and allowed them to bury the bodies; but as soon as the turf was placed, he stretched himself upon it, howled mournfully, and resisted all the efforts of the bystanders to induce him to move.

He snapped at all who came near him, except the woodman, who had tended him. He bore his caresses, but no sooner did the man attempt to take his paws to remove him from the grave, than he gnashed his teeth, and would have wounded him severely, if he had not quickly fled. Every one admired the fidelity of the dog, and when the woodman offered to carry him food and drink every day, that he might not perish, the magistrate proposed taking up a collection to remunerate the man, who was poor, and the father of a large family. With difficulty he was induced to accept the money, but finally he did, and from that moment burdened himself with the care of his new pensioner.

The details of this horrible event were published in the principal journals of the country. J. Meyer, a brother of the butcher, reading some time afterwards the advertisement of the magistrate, hastened instantly to his presence, saying he had fears which he believed now were only too well founded, that his brother had fallen into the hands of robbers; as he had left home with a large sum in gold, for the purchase of beeves, and had not since been heard from. His suspicions were only too sadly confirmed, when the magistrate related to him the singular conduct of a dog, which he described.—M. Meyer, accompanied by the officer and several others, repaired to the grave.

As soon as the dog perceived his master's brother, he howled, lapped his hands, and evinced numerous other demonstrations of grief and joy. By different parts of his dress, M. Meyer recognized the body of his brother, when they disinterred it. The absence of his watch, the wounds of the butcher and his dog, those of the two other bodies, together with the disappearance of the horse, convinced the magistrate and the witnesses that the deceased had not only been assailed by the two, but also by one or several others, who had fled with the horse and the plunder.

Having obtained permission, M. Meyer removed his brother's corpse to his native village and interred it in the adjoining cemetery. The faithful dog followed the body, but by degrees became attached to his new master.

Every effort was made by the most diligent search, and the offer of immense rewards, to discover the culprits. But in vain; the horrible tragedy remained an enigma.

Two years had passed away, and all hope of solving the mystery vanished, when M. Meyer received a letter urging him to repair without delay to Leipzig, to close the eyes of his maternal uncle, who desired to see him before he died. He immediately hastened thither, accompanied by his brother's dog, who was his companion at all times. He arrived too late. His relative had deceased the previous evening, bequeathing him a large fortune. He found the crowd, it being the season of the great fair, held regularly once a year.

While walking one morning on the public square, attended as usual by his dog, he was astonished to behold the animal suddenly rush forward like a flash. He dashed through the crowd and leaped furiously upon an elegantly dressed young man, who was seated in the centre of the square upon an elegant platform, erected for the use of those spectators who desired more conveniently to witness the popular show.

He held him by the throat with so firm a grasp, that he would soon have strangled him, had not aid been promptly rendered. They immediately chained the dog, and thinking of course that he must be mad, strove to kill him. But M. Meyer, rushing through the crowd, arrived in time to rescue his faithful friend, calling eagerly on the meantime upon the bystanders to arrest that man, for he believed his dog had recognized in him the murderer of his brother.

Before he had time to explain himself, the young man, profiting by the tumult, escaped. For some moments they thought Meyer himself was mad, and he had great difficulty in persuading those who had bound the dog that the faithful creature was not in the least dangerous, and begged earnestly of them to release him that he might pursue the assassin. He spoke in so convincing a manner, that his hearers finally felt persuaded of the truth of his assertions, and restored the dog his freedom, who joyously bounded to his master, leaped about him a few times, and then hastened away.

He divided the crowd, and was soon upon the enemy's track.—The police, which on these occasions is very active and prompt, were immediately informed of this extraordinary event, and a number of officers were soon in pursuit. The dog became in a few moments the object of public curiosity, and every one drew back to allow him to pass. Business was suspended, and the crowd collected in groups, conversing of naught but the dog and the murder which had been committed two years before.

After a half hour's expectation, a general rush indicated that the search was over. The man had stretched himself upon the ground, under the folds of a double tent, and believed himself hidden.—But in spite of his fancied security, the avenger had tracked him, and leaping upon him he bit him, tore his garments, and would have killed him upon the spot, had not the assistants rushed to his rescue.

He was immediately arrested, and led with M. Meyer and the dog, then carefully bound, before the judge, who hardly knew what to think of so extraordinary an affair. Meyer related all that had happened two years before, and insisted upon the imprisonment of the man, declaring that he was the murderer of his brother, for his dog could not be deceived.

During all this time, it was found almost impossible to hold the animal, who seemed determined to attack the prisoner.—Upon interrogating the latter, the judge was not satisfied with his replies, and ordered him to be searched. There was found upon him a large sum in gold, some jewels, and five watches, four of them gold and very valuable, while the fifth was an old silver one, of but little consequence.

As soon as Meyer saw the last, he declared it to be the same that his brother wore the day he left home, and the description of his watch, published months previously, corroborated his assertions. The robber had never dared expose it, for fear that it would lead to his detection, as he was well aware it had been described very minutely in all the principal journals of Germany.

In short, after most minute and convoluted legal proceedings of eight months, the murderer was condemned to be broken alive, and his corpse to remain chained upon the wheel as an example to others.

On the night preceding his execution, he confessed, among other crimes, what till then he always denied, that he was the murderer of Meyer's brother.—He gave them all the details above related, and declared that he always believed the accursed dog died of his wounds.

"Had it not been for him," repeated he, several times, "I should never have been here.—Nothing else could have discovered me, for I had killed the horse and buried him with all that he wore."

He expired upon the wheel, and this was the corpse which I beheld before entering the city of Leipzig.

REFORM SHOULD BEGIN AT HOME.

A DOMESTIC CHAT.

"This is pleasant!" exclaimed the young husband, taking his seat easily in the rocking chair, as the things were removed.—The fire glowed in the grate, revealing a pretty and neatly furnished sitting-room, with all the appliances of comfort. The fatiguing business of the day was over, and he sat enjoying what he had all day been anticipating, the delights of his own fireside.

His pretty wife, Esther, took her work and sat down by the table.

"It is pleasant to have a house of one's own," he said again, taking a satisfactory survey of his little quarters. The cold rain beat against the windows, and he thought he felt really grateful for all his present comforts.

"Now if we only had a piano," exclaimed the wife.

"Give me the music of your sweet voice before all the pianos in creation," he declared complacently, besides a certain secret disappointment, that his wife's thankfulness did not happily chime with his own.

"Well, but we want one for our friends," said Esther.

"Let our friends come and see us, and not to hear a piano," persisted the husband.

"But, George, every body has a piano, now-a-days—we don't go any where without seeing a piano," persisted the wife.

"And yet I don't know what we want one for—you will have no time to play one, and I don't want to hear it."

"Why, they are so fashionable—I think our room looks nearly naked without one."

"I think it looks just right."

"I think it looks very naked—we want a piano shockingly," protested Esther, emphatically.

The husband rocked violently.

"Your lamp smokes, my dear," he said, after a long pause.

"When are you going to get an astral lamp? I have told you a dozen times how much we needed one," said Esther, pettishly.

"Those are very pretty lamps—I never can see by an astral lamp," said the husband. "Those lamps are the prettiest of the kind I ever saw—they were bought in Boston."

"But, George, I do not think our room is complete without an astral lamp," said Esther, sharply. "They are so fashionable! Why, the Morgans and Millers and Thornes all have them, I am sure we might too."

"We ought to, if we take pattern by other people's expenses, and I don't see any reason for that."

The husband moved uneasily in his chair.

"We want to live as well as others live," said Esther.

"We want to live within our means, Esther," exclaimed George.

"I am sure we can afford it as well as the Morgans and Millers, and many others I might mention—we do not wish to appear mean."

George's cheek crimsoned.

"Mean! I am not mean!" he exclaimed angrily.

"Then we do not wish to appear so," said the wife. "To complete this room, and make it look like other people's, we want a piano and an astral lamp."

"We want—we want!" muttered the husband. "there is no satisfying a woman's wants, do what you may;" and he abruptly left the room.

"How many husbands are in a similar dilemma! How many houses and husbands are rendered uncomfortable by the constant dissatisfaction of a wife with present comforts and present provisions! How many bright prospects for business have ended in bankruptcy and ruin, in order to satisfy this secret hankering after fashionable necessities! Could the real cause of many a failure be made known, it would be found to result from useless expenditures at home—expenses to answer the demands of fashion, and "what will people think."

"My wife has made my fortune," said a gentleman of great possessions, "by her thrift, prudence and cheerfulness, when I was just beginning."

"And mine has lost my fortune" answered his companion, "by useless extravagance, and repining when I was doing well."

What a world does this open to the influence which a wife possesses over the future prosperity of her family! Let the wife know her influence, and try to use it wisely and well.

Be satisfied to commence on a small scale. It is too common for young housekeepers to begin where their mothers ended.—Buy all that is necessary to work skilfully with; adorn your house with all that will render it comfortable. Do not look at richer homes, and covet their costly furniture.

If secret dissatisfaction is ready to spring up, to go a step further and visit the homes of the poor and suffering; behold dark, cheerless apartments, insufficient clothing, an absence of all the comforts and refinements of social life then return to your own with a joyful spirit.

You will then be prepared to meet your husband with a grateful heart, and ready to appreciate the toil and self-denial which he has endured in his business-world to surround you with the lights of home; then you will be ready to co-operate cheerfully with him in so arranging your expenses, that his mind will not be constantly harrassed with fears lest family expenditures may encroach upon public payments.

Be independent; a young housekeeper never needed greater moral courage than she now does to resist the arrogance of fashion. Do not let the A's and B's decide what you must have, neither let them hold the strings of your purse. You know best what you can and ought to afford; then decide, with a strict integrity, according to your means.—Let not the censure or the approval of the world ever tempt you to buy what you hardly think you can afford. It matters little what people think, provided you are true to yourselves and family.

VEGETABLE SERPENT.

According to some Italian journals, a new organized being has been discovered in the interior of Africa, which seems to form an immediate link between vegetable and animal life. This singular production of nature has the shape of a spotted serpent.—It drags itself along the ground. Instead of a head it has a flower shaped like a bell, which contains a viscous liquid. Flies and other insects, attracted by the smell of the juice, enter into the flower, where they are caught by the adhesive matter. The flower then closes, and remains shut until the prisoners are bruised and transformed into a chyle. The indigestible portions, such as the head and wings, are thrown out by two aspired openings.—The vegetable serpent has a skin resembling leaves, a white and soft flesh, and instead of a bony skeleton a cartilaginous frame filled with yellow matter. The natives consider it delicious food.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, OCT. 14, 1852.

ELECTIONS.

The first general election under the New Constitution was held on the 28th ult., and the county canvass the Tuesday following. Mackinac county has one Representative in the State Legislature. Mr. Alexander Toll, of Mackinac, fills the seat.

The county officers elect are as follows: J. P. King, Esq., Judge of Probate; Wm. M. Johnston, Clerk; Charles Grove, Treasurer; Wm. Norman McLeod, Circuit Court Commissioner; G. T. Wendell, Register of Deeds; George Miller, Sheriff; R. F. Mills, Inspector of Fish.

The vote was light, owing to the confused state of the election district law, conflicting with the 19th article of the New Constitution. The matter can only be understood by those who are acquainted with the geography of the country, and know the almost utter impossibility of making due returns.

One county of the Upper Peninsula (Emmett) has to make returns to two different counties in the Lower Peninsula, and those two counties situated far from here, one in the eastern part of the State, and the other in the South-western, viz., Lapeer and Newago.

Emmett is an unorganized county, lying a small portion on the south shore of the straits of Mackinac, and including all the Islands in Lake Michigan lying west of the Waugoshance light, and extending south to include all the Islands except the Manitous. There is in the county one organized township, which, for judicial purposes, is attached to Mackinac county.

The Propeller Ohio stops regularly at this place on her trips from Buffalo and Chicago. She is manned by a civil and gentlemanly crew. Capt. Steele, his Clerk, Mates and Steward are always ready to do a favor for those who want, as well as kind and attentive to their passengers. We say the men who want to travel in good company, and be well used, cannot do better than go on the Ohio. She will be here on her way up next Sunday or Monday.

We learn from Mr. Egerton, the Clerk of the steamer Michigan, that on the last trip down of the Sultana a fire was discovered in her hold, which came near proving fatal to the boat and all on board.

The particulars, as given to us, are, that on board had gone into the hold to broach a barrel of spirits and filled a coffee pot. On the discovery that the liquor was high wines, or by some mishap spilled some, and by some means it caught fire from the lamp and produced the alarm. A hatch was found in the hold, but no one on board.—So says our informant.

Considerable anxiety is manifested by gentlemen passing here to know how the Mormons are going to vote this fall. We have been told to say that the votes of the Mormons, when cast and counted, will tell for whom they vote. They are at ninety-nine per cent discount, and slow at that. The people here are of one mind, and their whole ambition is in the commandments of their heavenly Father, knowing that he is doing alone they have left his mercy and protection.

We understand that a fire has consumed a portion of the State Penitentiary at Jackson, including the carpenter and paint shops. The extent of the loss we have not learned.

The "Dollar Weekly Times," published at Cincinnati, Ohio, "independent in all things, and neutral in nothing," is decidedly the best, cheapest and most instructive paper in the West. It contains articles on all subjects, and is truly a paper for the "million." Terms, one dollar per year.

The weather for a few days past has been gloomy, and strongly reminds us of the near approach of winter. On Tuesday there was the first appearance of snow. Some light squalls passed over the lake, but none fell to lay on the ground. The thermometer at 38 deg.

The following just comment on the course and character of the United States government is from the London Times of September 6th:—

It has ever been the delight of historians and philosophers to trace and work out an analogy between the peculiarities of climate and scenery, and the character and dispositions of nations. There is something singularly wild and extreme in the physical phenomena of the American continent.

The mountains literally pierce the clouds, and pour down from their snow-capped summits rivers that sweep their uncontrollable course for thousands of miles, and bear with them, as trophies of their might, trees of a girth and growth unknown to the European observer. The seasons are as strongly marked.

A summer of raging and almost intolerable heat is succeeded by a winter of little less than Arctic severity. All things there tend to represent the course of nature as the result of a series of violent and uncontrollable impulses, and to conceal those silent and unvarying laws which regulate alike the fall of a drop of rain and the course of the mighty Father of Waters.

There never probably was, since the beginning of the world, an instance of such solid, sudden, and dazzling prosperity as has been achieved within the last fifty years by the United States of America. By peaceful industry and bold and well weighed enterprise, they advanced to a degree of material well being which, to those who only know the world from books, must appear almost incredible. They have but to persevere in the same course, and there is no limits to the triumphs that lie before them.

They have still a boundless territory to occupy and improve, in the possession of which they are without a neighbor, and a mission of civilization and consolidation to execute as noble a never devolved upon the sons of men. But the previous triumphs of their industry and their enterprise have been so rapid and portentous that they would seem to have a tendency to turn aside the nation from its steady onward course, and to enlist it in more brilliant but far less certain schemes of aggrandizement.

A nation of hard headed traders and speculators, struggling day by day with praiseworthy perseverance and intensity for the possession of the "almighty dollar," this people so shrewd and calculating in its private transactions, becomes, when it touches on public affairs, wild and extravagant, boundless in its aspirations, and insatiable in its cupidity. It possesses a will as uncontrollable as the powers of nature which surround it, and spurns the control of law to which these mighty agencies so humbly submit themselves.

There are at present two courses of policy open to the United States—the policy of commerce and the policy of conquest. It is open to them to throw down commercial restrictions, to stimulate the spirit of traffic, to give up aspirations of military glory, and found a power like that of their mother country, relying rather on arts than arms; or they may substitute the military for the commercial spirit, seek to establish within themselves a world of their own, and to enlarge a territory already too vast for unity by the forcible annexation of lands too weak to resist the onset of the mighty confederation. Never had a people good or evil set so fairly before them, and never was the choice more doubtful and momentous.

It is now just a year since the piratical expedition to Cuba, resulting in the sanguinary execution of fifty American citizens and ignominious death of the "unprincipled adventurer" by whom the descent was planned. We had hoped that this severe lesson—a single reverse amid so much prosperity and progress—would have taught the United States the folly and wickedness of such unwarrantable enterprises, and finally decided the balance in favor of the policy of justice and moderation. There is much reason to fear we are mistaken.

A sort of "guild" or "order" has been formed at the south, consisting, we suppose we must say, not of unprincipled adventurers, but of many of the most "worthy and influential merchants, lawyers and politicians of the country." The object is the extension of American influence over the western hemisphere and the islands of the Atlantic and Pacific. The first booty on which they have cast their eyes is Cuba, and from that island they propose to sweep away every vestige of Spanish authority before two suns have risen and set on the invaders. "Enlightened public opinion in the United States," it is said, will sanction this measure, seeing that there are many reasons why Americans require possession of the island.

In the first place, they wish to substitute for the iron rule of Spain, the republican system of government; next, they anticipate assistance from the discontented Creoles—a fallacious hope, if we may judge of the experience of Lopez. They see in the acquisition of this island, a guarantee for the permanency of the institution of slavery. Fourthly, such a conquest would extend their commerce. Fifthly, the rich and luxurious covet this gem of the Antilles, as an agreeable and accessible retreat from the severities of a New York winter, and long to exchange the frozen breezes of the North for enchanting visions of orange trees and sherry cobbiers.

The sum and substance of all these reasons is, that without pretending a shadow of right to this possession of the crown of Spain, the Americans desire it, and therefore will have it. Whatever the Americans can take, belongs to them according to this new school of ethics; and come peace or come war, they will not permit the intervention of any European power between them and any friendly ally whom they are determined to plunder.

It is no little question that is raised by these avowed intentions—nothing less than whether one of the first rate powers of the world shall declare itself exempt from the provisions of the law of nations—shall deny the existence of any right except that of the stronger, and claim to set no bounds to its aggressions except the limits assigned by its boundless cupidity and lust of dominion. Shall there arise in the middle of the nineteenth century, a piratical state, bound by no laws, recognizing no rights, and avowedly basing its policy on principles which in the case of individuals this very same society would visit with the penitentiary or the gibbet?

There was a time when, intoxicated like the United States with its enormous prosperity, ancient Athens laid down for itself the same rule of conduct, and boldly professed that while justice might regulate claims between equals, the stronger had a right to impose everything to which the weaker might be compelled to submit.

After a few years the vicissitudes of events placed this arrogant State in the very position it had described, and rendered it dependent on the contemptuous clemency of a conqueror for that very existence to which, upon its own principles, it had lost all right when it became unable to defend it. Suppose we were to apply a similar reason to the

the extension over the land and the Pacific, which is Cu- they pro- very ves- ty before d set on ned pub- States," this mes- are many s require y wish to rule of y anti- discon- hope, expe- in the a guar- y of the Fourthly, lly, the over this an agree at from w York change the North for ange trees e of all without right to crown of desire it, t. land of Laderia. Nothing would be easier than to take it from the feeble power to whom it belongs. It is not too well governed by the Portuguese, it is a commanding commercial position, and its climate is regarded as a specific for the national disease of consumption. We have, therefore, many reasons to desire it. Why, then, do we not make it our own? For two reasons, which our American friends will do well to consider. We will not violate the principles of eternal justice, to tarnish the lustre of our arms, and disgrace our character for fairness and moderation, by wresting his property from our ally, because he is unable to keep it. And if we wish to do this we dare not. We dread the retribution which follows on such acts, and have learnt that, sooner or later, the force of public opinion will put down any power which claims to emancipate itself from the control of conscience and the practice of justice. We commend these considerations in no unfriendly spirit to our friends across the Atlantic, and trust that they will see, on calmer reflection, that in this case, as in all others, their duty is identical with their interest, and that enlightened public opinion in the States, instead of supporting "worthy and influential" men, who form themselves into secret societies for the purpose of piracy and buccaneering, will declare that such objects are unworthy, and that their promoters ought not to be influential. TELEGRAPHS IN THE UNITED STATES. There are now in operation in this country about 12,000 miles of telegraph line, most of them having two, and many three or even four wires. The instruments used in registering the messages on the various lines are Morse's, House's and Bain's. Morse's instrument records by means of dots and marks pressed upon a ribbon of paper, by means of a point. Bain's instrument records also by dots and marks on a circular piece of paper, but they are colored chemical, instead of mechanical emblems, like those of Morse. House's instrument, on the other hand, prints the message in Roman characters upon the paper ribbon. Each system has its advantages and disadvantages, its advocates and opposers, and all obtain a portion of the public patronage. Those lines will be most successful which transmit the messages most faithfully and promptly, preserve their integrity in regard to confidential communications, and afford the greatest facilities to the public. Electric telegraphing, young as it is in years, is fast becoming an enormous business, involving the expenditure of large sums, and is assuming the position of an absolute necessity to the news and commercial world. Giant as it is in infancy, what may we expect of it in riper years? We have no doubt that developments will yet be made in regard to the subtle fluid, which will surpass the wildest dreamer on the subject in our time. The fact that a physical agent, sent a thousand miles over an isolated wire, connected at the further extremity with the earth, will perform its circuit, or in other words, will pass the length of the wire, and find its way back over mountain and through forest, lake and river, instantaneously, would be beyond the credibility of man, did we not see it verified day by day. A locomotive thundering over the plain, with its long train of cars, impress its might and velocity upon the senses. The huge steamship plunging her way down the harbor, conveys to the looker-on a true idea of majesty and power, but the subtle fluid does its wonderful work as silently and far less conspicuously than the snow flake of heaven falls upon the soil. THE TORNADO IN MAINE. A correspondent of the Congregationalist, writing from Brooks, Me., furnishes the following account of the severe tornado which occurred in that region on the 18th ult:—"The northern part of this (Waldo) county was visited by a tornado on Thursday last. Its general course was to the south-east. Its width seemed to have been from three to five miles, though as a shower of rain it was much more than this. It was the most terrific storm ever witnessed here. It was dark, almost as night, with vivid lightning, and heavy thunder, rain and hail, which has wrought fearful destruction to the crops and windows. In a ride of some six miles I passed in sight of six barns blown down, several others unroofed, and two dwelling houses nearly destroyed. On many farms the fences were nearly all laid prostrate, and fruit trees, and large trees of the forest, are uprooted. One man estimates the damage to his orchard and pine timber lot at $2,000. The towns, so far as I know, which have suffered most, are Troy, Thorndike, Jackson, North Castle, and Brooks."

A FAIR OFFER. Make a full estimate of all you owe, and all that is owing to you. Reduce the sum to note. As fast as you collect, pay over to those you owe; if you can't collect renew your note every year and get the best security you can. Go to business diligently, and be industrious—lose no time; waste no idle moments—he very prudent and economical in all things—disregard all pride but the pride of doing justly and well—be faithful in your duty to God, by regular and hearty prayer, morning and night—attend church and meeting regularly every Sabbath, and "do unto all men as you would they should do unto you."

If you are too needy in your own circumstances, to give the poor, do whatever else you have in your power, to do for them cheerfully—but if you can, always help the worthy poor and unfortunate. Pursue this course diligently and sincerely for seven years, and, if you are not happy, comfortable, and independent in your circumstances, come to me and I will pay all your debts.—Dr. Franklin.

ANCIENT ROMAN INN. In one of the streets of Pompeii, a house was excavated, and now remains, (though the town was covered by an eruption of Mt. Vesuvius, nearly 2000 years ago, and was not brought to light again for about 1800 years!) that is thought to have been an inn. Chequers are exhibited on the sides of the doorway, of a large size, and rings for tying horses are excavated. The bones of horses were also found in the stables, and in the cellars were discovered large earthen vessels for holding wine. Three cars were also found, the wheels of which were light and dished, with ten spokes; and the bodies of the cars were similar to the carriages or chaises used in Naples. The yard of this curious house of antiquity were two fountains. Such accounts of an ancient town must be highly interesting to the antiquary.

STEAMERS WITH T CHIMNEYS. They are now beginning to make steamboats coal-without chimneys. This, it is said, can be done in all boats using hard coal under the funnels. The chimneys now generally employed in steamboats are not only unsightly, but present an obstacle to a head wind, occupy considerable space upon deck.

A steamer without chimneys, having instead of them, flues opening into the wheel-houses will not only be free from the objections referred to, but possess the very great advantage of being made capable of navigating streams and rivers, which are crossed by bridges, and railroad tracks; and from which streams and rivers they have heretofore been almost entirely excluded.

We are not aware that any such steamer has been built in this country, but we would hazard the assertion, that there are shipbuilders and machinists in this vicinity, who can construct steamboats, not only without upright chimneys, but with all the machinery below deck; so that the upper deck shall be entirely free from obstructions so invariably presented by the marine engines of the ferry and other steamers now in use.—Ed.

MECHANISM OF THE HUMAN FOOT. There is nothing more beautiful than the structure of the human foot, and perhaps any demonstration which would lay a well educated person to desire more of anatomy than that of the foot. The foot has the structure, all the fine appliances that you see in a building. In the first place, there is an arch in whatever way you regard the foot; looking down upon it, we perceive seven bones coming round from the astragalus, forming an entire circle of surfaces in the foot. If we look at the profile of the foot, we find it is still manifest, of which the posterior is formed by the heel, and the anterior by the ball of the great toe; and in front we find the arch, in a traverse arch; so that instead of standing, as might be imagined, upon a flat base, we stand upon an arch, composed of a series of bones, which are united by the most curious provisions for the elasticity of the foot; hence, when we jump from a height directly upon the heel, a severe shock is felt, and so if we alight on the ball of the foot, where an elasticity is found in the whole foot, and the weight of the body is thrown upon an arch, and the shock avoided.

THE HUMAN STATURE. The idea that the original progenitor of the human race were exceedingly large and tall in stature, is still held by some European writers. Not many years since, a French author published a work in which he endeavored to prove that there has been a gradual precession in the size of man, from the commencement of the world, downwards, and that the same lessening control will continue to exert its influence until the end of time. A corresponding decrease in the age of mankind may be observed, it is alleged by enquiry into the longevity of the human race, in the several centuries of the world. Some contend, also, that the deficiency in the number of years between various personages noticed in the ancient sacred writings and those of our day, more than counter balanced by the great increase of our species throughout the world, and that in the place of accumulated years, we have accumulated numbers, whose existence is brief, that the earth may not be filled to overflowing. All these are curious speculations, not without interest to the opening mind.

A French author, an academicien of some note, calculated that Adam was 123 feet 6 inches in height, Noah a little more than 100 feet, Abraham 80, Moses 30, Hercules 10, Alexander 6, Caesar less than 5. Progressing in this ratio, in a few years hence the world would be filled with a race of Lilliputians.

ETYMOLOGY OF THE NAMES OF COUNTRIES. The following countries were named by the Phoenicians, the greatest commercial people in the ancient world. These names, in the Phoenician language, signify something characteristic of the places which they designate: Europe signifies a country of white complexion, so named because the inhabitants there were of a lighter complexion than those of either Asia or Africa. Africa signifies the land of corn ears. It was celebrated for its abundance of corn, and all sorts of grain. Siberia signifies thirsty or dry; very characteristic of the country. Spain, a country of rabbits and conies. This country was once so infested with those animals that they snail Augustus for an army to destroy them. Italy, a country of pines, from its yielding great quantities of black pine. Calabria, also for the same reason. Gaul, modern France, signifies yellow haired, as yellow hair characterized its first inhabitants. The English of Caledonia, is a high hill. This was a rugged mountain province in Scotland. Hib-ria is almost, or last habitation; for, beyond this, westward, the Phoenicians never extended their voyages. Britain, the country of tin; as there was great quantities of lead and tin found on the adjacent islands. The Greeks called it Albion, which signifies in the Phoenician tongue, either white or high mountains, from the whiteness of its shores, or the high rocks on the western coast. Sardinia signifies the footsteps of man, which it resembles. Rhodes, serpents or dragons, which it produces in abundance. Sicily, the country of grapes. Scylla, the whirlpool of destruction. Charybdis, the hole of destruction. Etna signifies furnace, or dark, or smoky. Syracuse signifies bad savor, called so from the unwholesome marsh upon which it stood. The above are gathered from a very ancient history of Britain.

Going to dinner the other day, we saw a little codger about two years old, sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself. It struck us that many people in this world are caught in the same act, and we shall always think hereafter.

When we see a business man trusting everything to his clerks, and continually seeking his own amusement; always absent from his counting house, and expecting to get along—he's sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself.

When we see a professional man better acquainted with every thing else than his profession, always starting some new scheme and never attending to his calling, his wardrobe and credit will soon designate him as sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself.

When we see a farmer with an over-abundance of hired help, trusting everything to their management, his fences down, implements out of repair, and land suffering for want of proper tillage; too proud or too lazy to work himself, he's sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself.

When we see a mechanic run half a square every day to borrow a newspaper, and may be have to wait ten or fifteen minutes before he can get it, we shall suspect that the time he loses would soon pay the subscription, and consider him sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself.

When we see a man busily engaged in circulating scandal concerning his neighbor, and infer that he is pretty deep in the mud himself, and is sitting on a wheelbarrow and trying to wheel himself.

HUMBLE WORTH.

Tell me not that he's a poor man,
That his dress is coarse and bare;
Tell me not his daily pittance
Is a workman's scanty fare;
Tell me not his birth is humble,
That his parentage is low;
Is he honest in his actions?
That is all I want to know.

Is his word to be relied on?
Has his character no blame?
Then I care not if he's low born—
Then I ask not whence his name.
Would he from an unjust action
Turn away with scornful eye?
Would he, than defraud another,
Sooner on the scaffold die?

Would he spend his hard gained earnings
On a brother in distress?
Would he succor the afflicted,
And the weak one's wrongs redress?
Then he is a man deserving
Of my love and my esteem:
And I care not what his birth-place
In the eye of man may seem.

Let it be a low thatched hovel—
Let it be a clay-built cot—
Let it be a parish workhouse—
In my eye it matters not.
And if others will disown him,
As inferior to their caste,
Let them do it—I befriend him
As a brother to the last.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

In the course of a few months after their expulsion from Missouri, the number of Mormons that found refuge in Illinois amounted to fifteen thousand souls, including men, women, and children. Many of these had never resided in Missouri, but flocked to the new location of the sect from all parts of the Union, and even from England, to make a last stand against oppression and to support their prophet against his enemies. The organization of the sect began to be more fully and admirably developed; and the Mormons were even at this early period of their career, a pre-eminently industrious, frugal, and pains-taking people. They felt the advantages of co-operation.

Though robbed and plundered, they did not lose their time in vain repinings, but set themselves to repair the calamities they had suffered. The needy were aided by the more affluent in the purchase of land, and in the ploughing of their farms.

The building of the temple was immediately commenced.—The site chosen was exceedingly fine, being on a hill commanding a magnificent view on every side. It was built of a polished white lime-stone, almost as hard as marble, and is described as having been 138 feet in length by 88 in breadth. It was surmounted by a pyramidal tower, ascending by steps 170 feet from the ground, and the internal decorations were very costly.

A letter signed Veritas, published in the New York Herald, described not only the general appearance, but gave some particulars of the physical as well as moral weight of the leading Mormons at this time:—

"It may not be uninteresting to you to have a few lines from your correspondent in Zion—the city of the Saints—the 'nucleus of a western empire.' In this communication I purpose giving you a description of the first presidency of the Mormon hierarchy, which consists of four dignitaries, to wit, a principal prophet, a patriarch, and two counsellors.

"Joseph Smith, the president of the church, prophet, seer, and revelator, is thirty-six years of age, six feet high in his pumps, weighing two hundred and twelve pounds. He is a man of the highest talent and great independence of character, firm in his integrity, and devoted to his religion; in one word he is a perse, as President Tyler would say; as a public speaker, he is bold, powerful, and convincing, possessing both the suaviter in modo and the fortiter in re; as a leader, wise and prudent, yet fearless; as a military commander, brave and determined; as a citizen, worthy, affable, and kind; bland in his manners, and of noble bearing. His amiable lady, too, the Electa Cyria, is a woman of superior intellect and exemplary piety; in every respect suited to her situation in society, as the wife of one of the most accomplished and powerful chiefs of the age.

"Hyrum Smith, the patriarch of the church and brother of Joseph, is forty-two years of age, five feet eleven and a half inches high, weighing one hundred and ninety-three pounds. He, too, is a prophet, seer, and revelator, and is one of the most pious and devout Christians in the world. He is a man of great wisdom and superior excellence, possessing great energy of character, and originality of thought.

"Sidney Rigdon, one of the counsellors, prophet, seer, and revelator, is forty-two years of age, five feet nine and a half inches high, weighing one hundred and sixty-five pounds; his former weight, until reduced by sickness produced by the Missouri persecution, was two hundred and twelve pounds. He is a mighty man in Israel, of varied learning, and extensive and laborious research. There is no divine in the West more deeply learned in biblical literature, and the history of the world, than he; an eloquent orator, chaste in his language, and conclusive in his reasoning; any city would be proud of such a man. By his proclamation, thousands on thousands have heard the glad tidings and obeyed the word of God; but he is now in the 'sear and yellow leaf,' and his silvery locks fast ripening for the grave.

"William Law, the other counsellor, is thirty-two years of age, five feet eight and a half inches high, weighing one hundred and seventy-five pounds.—He is a great logician and profound reasoner; of correct business habits, and great devotion to the service of God. No man could be better fitted to his station—wise, discreet, just, prudent—a man of great suavity of manners and amiability of character.

"All these men are Boanerges of the church, thundering in the western forests, and hurling arguments and reasons against the sectaries of the age, like the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Their wives and children present, likewise, a pleasing spectacle of intellect, goodness, hospitality, and kindness seldom witnessed."

Nobody is ever satisfied in this world. If a legacy is left a man, he regrets that it was not larger. If he finds a sum of money, he searches for more.—If he is elected to a high office, he wishes for a better one. If he is rich and wants for nothing, he strives for more.—If he is a single man, he is looking out for a wife; if married for children.—Man is never satisfied.

CHANGE OF FORTUNE.

Some years ago a servant girl, who had robbed her mistress, a milliner in London, was transported to Sydney for a term of years. Since the discovery of the Bathurst convict, the female convict has won to her former mistress that colony was a good place; as she now kept her carriage, she was happy to return to the amount which she had stolen with interest; that she earnestly recommended her to come and set up shop; and that in the case she should be happy to reward her patronage to a lady to whom she had so great esteem.—London Paper.

DON'T GRUMBLE.

He is a fool that grumbles at every little mischance. Put the best foot forward, is an old and good maxim. Don't run about and tell acquaintances that you have been unfortunate. People do not like to have unfortunate people for acquaintances. Add to a vigorous determination, a cheerful spirit; if reverses come, bear them like a philosopher, and get rid of them as soon as you can. Povey is like a panther—look it bravely in the face and it will turn from you.

AN INCIDENT WITH A MORAL.

For some weeks past (says the New York Express) a long Indian tent has been standing on the western slope of Fox Hill, Hoboken, the inmates of which were an old Indian, his squaw, and a son. They are wanderers, we believe from some Canada tribe, and came to that neighborhood about two months ago. On Sunday last, the chief of the wigwam, who had been ailing for some time, was gathered to the land of his fathers.

A few days previously, the squaw had set out for the State of Maine to bring two children she had on the frontier, to the tent, to see the old man before the Great Spirit called him home; but her husband, alas! it turned out, was overtaken too late.—The scene at the tent, as soon as it was known the Indian was dead, was curious and affecting. The son sat mutely and moodily on the ground, with his arms folded, and his eyes sorrowfully fixed upon the corpse of his dead sire.

It seemed strange to him that they should put the body into a coffin, instead of interring it after the manner of his own people.—As soon as the body was carried away by the undertaker, the tent was helplessly rifled of most of its contents, beads, baskets, and other trinkets, the Indians had been making for a livelihood, by some pale faced vagabonds in the vicinity, spite of the remonstrances of some kind hearted women, who, with those tender and humane impulses native to the sex, had all along been attentive to the wants of the dying stranger.

The tent itself was carried away even, leaving the surviving Indian to make his bed on the cold, damp earth, with only the sky above for a covering. And there he was sitting last night waiting, in silent sorrow, the return of his absent relative from her pilgrimage to the East. It was a sad suggestive incident, the death of the long Indian on the hill. His epitaph is the epitaph of a race in this region of the country, once all their own.

"Alas, for them! their day is o'er,
Their fires are out from shore to shore;
No more for them their wild deer bounds—
The plough is on their hunting grounds,
The pale man's axe rings through the woods,
The pale man's sails skim o'er their floods,
Their pleasant springs are dry;
Their children, look, by power oppressed
Beyond the mountains of the West,
Their children go to die.

CONJUGAL HARMONY.

A man in Germany advertised that he had an organ that would play any tune out of an enumerated set at the command of any one of the audience; this made a great noise at the time, and puzzled all the conjurers and philosophers of the place. The organ was placed on a table with its back against the wall, the company were invited to examine it, then ask for a tune, which was immediately played, and if any one desired it to stop, it was instantly silent.

This went on for a long time, and the ingenious inventor was making a rapid fortune, and the secret would have been buried with him, had he not behaved most inharmoniously towards his loving wife one day, just before the performance was about to commence. The room was crowded, as usual, and a tune was called for, but not a note was heard; the owner became uneasy, and said, in a soothing, coaxing tone, "do blay, my coot organs;" still not a sound was heard; he got out of patience, and threatened to smash the instrument to pieces, when a hoarse female voice was heard to growl out—"Ay, do, you tyvel, preak de organs, as you proke my head dis morning." This was too much for the choleric German; he took a chair, and gave the instrument such a whack, that it drove it through a paper partition in the wall, carrying with it another organ, which had been placed close at the back of the sham one, at which sat the obstinate grinder—his wife!

THE MISER SILENCED.

One cold winter when the ground was covered with snow, and the little birds could not get anything to eat, the little daughter of a miserly rich man gathered up all the crumbs she could find and was going to carry them out and scatter them on the snow. Her father saw her, and asked her what she was going to do? She told him; and he said, "What good will that do? The crumbs will not be enough to feed one in a hundred of the birds."

"I know it, dear father," said she, "but I shall be glad to save even one in a hundred of them, if I cannot save them all." The father thought a moment; he knew that many poor persons were suffering in his village, and he had refused to help any, because he could not help them all. His conscience struck him, and he told his little daughter to break a loaf of bread into crumbs for the birds, while he went to scatter a purse of money amongst the poor villagers.

MAMMOTH BONES.—We yesterday saw in the possession of a man from Kentucky river, portions of the remains of a mammoth. They were taken from the bed of Little Kentucky river. One was apparently a shoulder bone. It was three feet in length, and at the socket or joint was three and a half feet in circumference. It was found imbedded among the roots of a sycamore tree. The other bone was a portion of the upper jaw of the animal, as two teeth, or grinders, on either side were still in the jaw. The two teeth occupied a space of eleven inches across the surface, and the length of the jaw was three feet. The bone was fully eighteen inches in diameter at the ends of the snout. What a mouth the creature must have had.—Louisville Journal 21st ult.

TIT FOR TAT.—A conceited coxcomb was introducing to a large company on a large terrace whose face was not very prepossessing. Thinking to be extremely clever, he thus addressed the company who rose at his entrance: "I have the honor to introduce to you Mr. who is not so great a fool as he looks to be." "Therein," retorted the young man introduced, "therein consists the difference between my friend and me."

A friend, in speaking of California, says if you call a physician to relieve you, he generally does it; if not of the disease, of your pocket book. For three "ahems" and a "ha," in June last, he paid, he says, twenty-seven dollars. Nice country for Rimbarr, that.

A little girl who had been visiting in the family of a neighbor, hearing them speak of her father being a widower, on her return home, addressed him thus:—"Pa, are you a widower?" "Yes my child. Don't you know your mother's dead?" "Why, yes, I knew ma was dead, but you always told me you was a New Yorker."

How NATURAL!—"What is he running for?" said a friend to us this morning, on seeing us part with a gentleman with whom we had just been shaking hands.

"For no office whatever," was replied, "why did you ask the question?" "Why, he was so dovish about it, I thought maybe, he was a candidate."

The daughter of Themistocles had two lovers, the one a coxcomb, the other an honest man. The first was rich, the second was poor. He took the honest man for a son-in-law: "for I had rather," said he, "have a man that wants wealth, than wealth that wants a man."

More and Less.—It is a very singular thing," said a tailor's apprentice to his master, as the master was pressing a hot-tail coat, "that the more of some things there is, the less there is."

"How can that be?" said the tailor. "Why, there's that hot-tail coat—the less you make the tail the more hot it is."

Maybe the goose didn't fly about that time.

Men here of Congress pass some bills with remark-able facility. Last week, for instance, they voted an appropriation of $123,000 worth of books for their own use. It was passed without a word of debate. Is comment necessary?

Keep a stiff upper lip, and with the sun, look on the bright side of everything. If you are kicked out of your neighbor's house, console yourself with the idea, that a man cannot help what is done behind his back.

The New York Times says that a blind man of his acquaintance, can travel all over that city with little danger of being lost, being guided by his keen perception of the various odors emitted from the several localities.

A Chaplain at one of our State prisons, was asked by a friend how his parishioners were.

"All under conviction," was the answer.

Dobbs says, the difference between old bachelors and murderers, is more imaginary than real. In his opinion, the guilt of keeping people out of the world is just as great a crime as thrusting them out after they have got in. Sinners will please notice.

Siah says that he once saw a fellow who could lie down and jump over himself, stand up and jump under himself, turn round and jump beside himself, then turn back and jump Jim Crow! We should call that a gymnastic exercise.

The man who returned his neighbors borrowed umbrella, was seen lately walking with the young lady who passed a looking-glass without taking a peep. We believe they are engaged.

THE PATRIOT'S STRATAGEM;

OR, A SPIRITED SLEIGH RIDE.

BY CHARLEY CLEWLINE.

Now I do not claim that every particular incident in the story which I am about to tell you, did actually occur; nevertheless, they might have done so under the circumstances, and still have been less strange than a thousand other events of the period and people of which and of whom I am going to write.

The long pent up fires of Canadian discontent had finally burst forth throughout the two provinces, in a flame of revolution, which threatened, ere long, to crush the galling yoke of British rule from off the tax and tithe-bowed necks of enslaved Canadians; and had Papineau possessed the energy, McKenzie the honesty, or five out of every twenty of the patriot leaders the courage of Dr. Wolfred Nelson—than whom no braver man or truer patriot ever drew his sword in any cause—it is almost certain that before six months of the struggle, commenced in 1837, had gone by, the last red-coated minion of England would have been driven from the country, and the free flag of a new Republic would have floated from every flag-staff and fortification from Quebec to Penetengoshene, in the place of the crimson banner of St. George.

The gallant Nelson, with two hundred hastily armed Habitans, had met, engaged and defeated more than double that number of Britain's best and bravest veterans, at St. Dennis; and had the patriots generally throughout the Canadas followed the doctor's example and struck home for liberty, the rebellion of St. Dennis would have been the first well fought battle in a successful Canadian revolution.

But all was apathy, indecision and treacherous cowardice among those who had lighted the flame, and very soon the victor of St. Dennis found himself a hunted fugitive, followed by human blood hounds, set on by brute demagogues, clamorous for his blood.

Out lawed, driven from his home, a price set on his head, a wanderer in the very depths of an inclement Canadian winter, and hunted night and day as he was by British myrmidons, it is not in the least strange that Dr. Wolfred Nelson should have met with adventures, some of which, if well told, would amply repay the reader for the time expended in their perusal. One of these I will tell in the briefest possible manner, merely remarking again, as a preface, that if the incidents are not all true, they might have been.

For ten days and nights, almost without intermission, the hue and cry had been kept up, and the hunted patriot driven hither and thither among the wild mountain passes, serried crags and dark ravines between the Ottawa and St. Lawrence, assuming various disguises, and subsisting as best he might upon the humble fare obtained at the hands of the rude, but honest habitans, among whom he was extensively acquainted and universally beloved; when one cold, blustering morning, as he was traversing the highway leading towards the river Maurice, he was overtaken by a young Canadian who had served under him at St. Dennis, who came dashing along the road, driving a pair of spirited ponies tandem before a "pung," loaded with two tierces, one containing brandy, and the other good old St. Croix, which he was conveying to a dealer in the article, who owned a store some fifteen leagues ahead.

"Jump on, Doctor!" shouted Antoine—"jump on quick, for twenty of the red hounds are on your track not five miles behind," and in an instant the ex-patriot chief was seated astride one of the casks as one sits on horse back, while, bestriding the other in like manner, Antoine plied his whip until he had his animals going once more at the top of their speed, when he again addressed his companion:—

"Doctor, I shall carry you safe off from your pursuers, and you must pay me well for it."

"Certainly, Antoine; any price that you may name. I have not much money about me now, but —"

"Peste, doctor! Who speaks of money? Not Antoine Lafrenier. No, doctor, you must do me a great favor."

"Most certainly I will, Antoine; but what is it you wish?"

"I'll tell you, doctor. You see, about two leagues further on is the inn of Louis Lablanc, who will marry his daughter the day after to-morrow, to the English trader at Boisblanc, whom Ceceile hates, while she loves me very much. And now, doctor, you must help me to get Ceceile from her father."

"But how am I to do that, Antoine?"

"Ah! that is what I really don't know, doctor; but get her we must, or I shall have no heart to drive my ponies farther on.—You will be taken, Ceceile will be married to a man she hates, and I shall go home and shoot myself with two razors, or cut my throat several times with some small guns—what you shall call pistols."

"I have it, Antoine!" exclaimed the doctor, as an idea flashed suddenly upon his brain, while the young Canadian was speaking. "I have thought of a plan that will serve our purpose, to drive on to the inn as fast as you can."

Forty minutes later the equipage of Antoine Lafrenier drove into a close shed in the rear of a substantial inn, kept by Louis Lablanc, one of the wealthiest habitants of the district.

The doctor was well known to the proprietor of the inn, who met him with a welcome at the door, and offered to conceal him as long as he chose to remain under his roof. But Nelson informed the host that he dared not tarry with him, as he was closely pursued by a party of royal cavalry, who would soon arrive at the inn, and concluded by begging of Lablanc to furnish him with some disguise by which he might escape the argus eyed scrutiny of his enemies, if overtaken by them on the road.

The landlord retired to procure the disguise, and in a moment the refugee was whispering to Ceceile, who entered the apartment as her father left it, urging her instantly to join Antoine, who had remained in the shed.

Within ten minutes from the moment he entered the inn, the patriot chief emerged from a door next the shed, so completely disguised in the grey capote, long over hose, fur gloves, cap and scarlet sash of a Canadian habitan, that it is extremely doubtful if even his own wife would have recognized him arrayed as he was, as her polished, noble looking husband.

Louis Lablanc was very busy with some guests just arrived from Boisblanc, who had come to the wedding of his daughter, which was to take place on the morrow, and so the doctor entered the shed alone, where he found Antoine and Ceceile with the rum cask emptied of its contents and one head out, which Antoine had accomplished in obedience to instructions previously received from the doctor.

"Jump in!—in with you both!" cried Nelson, as he entered the shed, and in less than ten minutes, Antoine and Ceceile were headed up in the rum cask, which was placed on the pung, with the bung out for air, and square down for concealment, in palpable violation of all known laws of stowage; and the doctor mounted astride the empty cask of lovers as a driver. Away dashed the tandem team of Antoine, gaining the inn yard gate at the very moment that twenty British dragoons flung themselves from their reeking steeds, overriden in pursuit of the outlawed patriot.

"Ho, there! you fellow. What do you carry in those two casks?" inquired the commander of the troop, and bringing the doctor to a halt, and bestowing a lusty kick on the head of the cask of lovers, which gave back a hollow sound like that of a huge muffled drum.

"That one is empty, sir, but this other is filled with brandy for Mac. Grigor, at Au Crux," replied the doctor, speaking half in English and half in the Canadian patois of the districts.

"Ha! brandy, say you? And for the Scotch merchant at Au Crux, too? Then, by St. George, my men, we'll help ourselves to a gallon or so of this same—ah, yes; Seignette brand I see.—Donald, Mac. Grigor is famous for his brandies, and we shall find a better article here than at the bar inside the inn there; so go for a gimlet and bucket one of you directly."

The order was obeyed, and without one word of remonstrance from the driver, some two gallons of the liquor was withdrawn from the cask, after which, the British commander bade the habitan be off about his business, which order he was not slow in obeying, and in less than ten seconds the two ponies were covering the ground at a speed which gave the lie direct to the Yankee slander, which says, "a Canadian pony will trot all day in a peck measure."

It was almost dark, full eight miles to the next inn, and the doctor had just come to the very positive conclusion that the dragoons would remain over night at Louis Lablanc's, when he happened to look behind him after he had arrived at the outskirts of a forest, some four miles from the inn, he beheld the whole troop coming thundering on in pursuit not a mile distant.

In an instant the suspicion flashed upon his mind that Louis Lablanc had betrayed him, and giving vent to some few words that sounded very much like a curse upon all traitors, he applied the lash with might and main, and soon had his pung and ponies literally flying over the level ground.

In a few minutes he entered the dusky shadows of the forest, and almost immediately thereafter came to where the road branched out in the form of a Y, and on he dashed along the right hand fork, which seemed to be much the less frequented thoroughfare of the two, and ran along a narrow ridge of land, which descended each way to a springy bay, or swail, which never froze, while the other road, as far as he could see, led through a ravine skirted on either hand with a dense growth of pines of a diminutive species.

A quarter of an hour after entering upon the ridge road, the doctor heard the clashing of cavalry trapping, and hurried tramp of furiously ridden steeds as the troop of British dragoons dashed on along the valley road.

The doctor felt much relieved, as you may well suppose, but still he plied the lash, and on flew the spirited ponies with their spirited load for another mile, when suddenly the pung struck against some obstruction in the road, and over it went in an instant, sending the cask of brandy down the steep bank to the right, rocketing and turning somersaults until it was almost down to the marsh, when it struck square against a stout tree and smashed all to pieces in a second.

The ponies stood still, while the cask of lovers went pitching end over end, and waltzing down the left hand bank, missing all the trees in its mad antics, until it finally lit in the pond with a swash, bung up, which was remarkably lucky for its contents, which otherwise might have got watered far below proof.

The astonished doctor gave one forlorn glance down at the wreck of the brandy cask, and then away he went down after the headed up lovers, nearly running over himself in his eager headlong course.

"Antoine!" he called out, as he waded into the slough, and applied his lips to the bung hole — "Antoine!"

No response came back from the cask.

"Antoine!" he shouted again, but all was silent as the grave.

"Why bless me! they must have been smothered or killed, rolling down the bank!" and the alarmed doctor began kicking furiously at the head of the cask, which was soon driven in, and in with it went a young flood of water, and out floated Antoine and Ceceile fast locked in each others arms, and both dead drunk from the fumes of the rum.

With much difficulty the doctor disengaged the unconscious lovers from the loving embrace, carried them up the bank, and placing them on the pung, on he went again, towards an inn kept by one of his friends, which he gained an hour later; and where his medical skill was called into requisition to sober the drunken lovers, which he effected before daylight, saw them married before noon; and, although the hero of St. Dennis was afterwards captured, yet he escaped that time by a most spirited flight.

THE TRUE USE OF RICHES.

BY M. M. NOAH.

In an old newspaper file we find one of the off hand, happy efforts of the late M. M. Noah, than whom few writers of our country, have thrown more of the best impulses of his heart, more or kindly and benevolent feeling into their compositions. When we would cast off the politician and interests himself with domestic scenes, the affairs of the fire side, social—the welfare and happiness of his fellow men, his essays had much of the charm about them that in later years has made those of Mr. Dickens so universally popular. The following, though written some years since, is not inapplicable to the present time.—Editors Union.

Why am I not a rich man? I said a very intelligent person to me, while looking at a splendid equipage which rattled down Broadway.

It was the equipage of a man of wealth—a man of yesterday; a parvenu in the most fashionable phrase—who made a fortune suddenly, by buying farms and selling them out in lots, and who was determined by his house, the magnificence of his entertainments, and richness and variety of his liveries, his loud talk and consequential air, to show that he did not belong to the quiet families of some hundred years distinction and wealth who never offended by ostentation, nor exhibit a heraldry to which they are not entitled.

We gazed at several of similar growth the riches which sprung up over night, like Jonah's gourd some by speculation, others by concession; some by fortunate marriages, and some creditably, by a mechanical labor and ingenuity. Why am I not a rich man? said my friend. I must purchase somewhere in the west, or in the moon—no matter where; I must plunge in the current of speculation, and swim on to fortune and eminence—must be rich; every body tries to be rich—why shall I not be rich?

I am liberal in my disposition, hospitable and free. I should like to have such a coach and pair—a house of corresponding magnificence. I should like to throw it open several times a year for the gay and fashionable throng; I should like you to dine with me twice a week, punish a few of old, very old, Madeira. Why am I not a rich man? I deserve to be, said he musing, and at intervals dropping his voice, as he slowly withdrew his eyes from the long cavalcade of coaches and phaetons, and whiskered footmen.

Hundreds no doubt, thought as he did; hundreds expressed the same feelings, and felt the same desires, and all under the same delusion that money is wealth—that sheer palpable gold and silver constitute riches, and that it is under this delusion that thousands of our citizens are racking their brains by night thoughts by day, toiling and sweating, and managing, and twisting, and turning out of the common, settled and regular order of things to get gold and silver, under the impression that with their possessions they will be rich.

Statesmen, politicians, nay the government itself, is inoculated with the same mania, and if all could succeed, we shall be compelled to blacken our own boots and wait upon ourselves at table. The delusion, however, consists in this, in considering a piece of gold the only representative of wealth. We are for the most part rich, without exactly knowing it.

The anvil of the blacksmith is to him, with his handicraft, a valuable, mighty lump of gold; he lives by it, and to his mind, habits and wishes, as well as he lives who pays out his eagles and half eagles in the market—so with the planter—so with the professional man the sculptor, the musician, the man of talents; all who possess the means of acquiring wealth are actually wealthy; for if temper and industrious all these faculties are convertible into wealth; nay, are more valuable and durable, and available, than the mere man of gold and silver.

Let such a man swim to the shore from his shipwrecked vessel, with the machine and man of mind, and see who can succeed in earning that morsel of bread necessary to sustain life. What does the man of princely income do, which gives to him so many supposed advantages and opens the door to such mooted happiness? He rises late, turns into day night, dandles his time away in trifling employment; drives his horses and coaches; gives grand dinners for ostentation, and large parties for fashion; and is at best a poor, discontented dyspeptic patrician, respected only for his gold and silver, and of no possible use to the community.

Take the man of moderate means, and he employs his life as life ought to be employed: a mixture of employment and recreation, of rational pleasure and discreet hospitality; go down to what is called the poorer classes, which we call the substantially rich—the hardy mechanic, and see how he enjoys life. Rising with the sun his labors do not cease until the sun sinks into the west. He returns to his little family and tenement at night, and finds an ample board spread by a frugal wife: the smoking steak, the good cup of coffee, the white bread and butter, and an appetite sharpened by labor.—His repast is over; he takes his chubby boy upon his knee, pinches his dirty, rosy cheeks, and runs his fingers through his matted hair; talks with his wife upon household affairs; reads the paper, converses with his neighbor on the best means of serving the common-wealth; and when the hour of rest arrives, he stretches himself upon his hard but healthy bed, and soon his senses are steeped into forgetfulness and his sleep is sweet and sound until the shrill clarion of the cock awakens him on the morrow to renew his labor.

But he has no coach—has he not? He has only to go into the street and hold up his finger, and a splendid omnibus and four elegant horses drives up to the side walk, and he jumps in; it is his coach while he occupies it, and he leaves it when and where he pleases. Can the man of gold or silver do more?—it is all an error, a misconception, a delusion. We are all rich when we possess within ourselves the means of acquiring wealth. We have no poor except the idler and the drunkard.

HARVESTING TURNIPS.

Pulling turnips and cutting off the tops by hand and knife, which is almost the universal practice among American farmers, is about as far behind the age of improved husbandry as digging up the land with a hoe, instead of plowing.

In England, turnips are almost invariably planted in drills; at pulling time the laborer passes along the row with a sharp light hoe, with which he dexterously cuts off the tops, throwing them by the same motion into the hollow between two rows.

Another person follows with another hoe, which he strikes below the bulb so as to cut off the root, throwing the turnips of the two rows together, ready for the gatherer to basket and carry to the pile or cart for storage.—Sometimes one hand performs both operations of topping and digging, but two work to the best advantage.—Scientific American.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, OCT. 21, 1852.

It is now past the middle of October, and winter is rapidly approaching. The season of navigation, will close in about six weeks at the most, and probably sooner; when we shall be as it were, shut out from the rest of the country for a season—there being no regular mode of conveyance in this region in the winter season.

So far the weather has been very dry, until of late, and heavy winds have prevailed almost constantly for nearly two months past. We are informed by men who have followed sailing on the lakes for nearly all their lives, that they never have, in their recollection, known a fall to commence so rough and windy, and still continue without scarcely an hour's intermission.

People living here are all anxious to secure an ample supply of provisions for the winter. The weather has been so rough of late that it was almost impossible for fishermen to lift their nets.—Our traders are busily engaged in securing their winter assortment of goods, and by laying in a good stock they will ensure an enlarged business in the wooding line, and secure to this place the advantage of a large supply of well seasoned wood for market next summer.

The increase of population the past summer by emigration will give an increased means of making wood for the market, and thus secure more of the trade.—Wood and fish is the principal staple of the Island at the present time.

The time is now so short until the close of navigation, that it is highly important that all the means that can be brought to bear in providing for winter should be put in requisition for that purpose, and secure a sufficient supply of flour, clothing, &c., for consumption during the winter.

We learn by Capt. Napier, of the brig C. B. Blair, that on Sunday night, Oct. 11th, he ran on Middle Island, in lake Huron. The vessel was under such headway that she ran hard on, raising her nearly a foot. Capt. Napier informs us that he threw overboard some sixty tons of railroad iron (his entire deck load) in order to lighten off. No other damage.

On Sunday evening last a second party arrived, per Propeller Michigan, from Council Bluffs. And by elder Hickey we learn that there is a great deal of sickness all along the route which they traveled; and that there had news reached the Bluffs of a division between the Mormons in the Salt Lake Valley, one party for Brigham Young, and the other for Orson Hyde. This division is said to have been in consequence of the appointment of Hyde to the Governorship of Utah.

THE RESURRECTION.

According to divine revelation, all, both saint and sinner, will have a resurrection; but that of the saints will be a thousand years at least before that of the wicked. The former will take place at the coming of Christ, but the latter at the end of the Millennium.

The idea of a glorious resurrection inspired the prophets with energy; and they esteemed it a greater treasure than all the wealth and aggrandisement that this world can afford; and, indeed, as the apostle says, some were tortured and would not accept of deliverance when proffered, for the sake of that they might obtain a better resurrection. The deliverance proffered, no doubt, was on condition that they would deny the faith. But to proceed.

The first portion of the sacred volume that we will call the attention of the reader to, reads as follows: "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.—But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." 1 Cor. xv. 21-23.

Paul dilates upon this subject to some extent, in order to show the propriety of the resurrection, and thus do away the erroneous opinions that some had imbibed, that there was no resurrection of the dead. He plainly sets forth the radical change in the transition from mortality to immortality. He describes all as being sown in mortality, but when raised, immortal; but he makes a distinction in the glories that they shall receive.

We infer from his reasoning that it was a doctrine of the church, and an immutable decree of Jehovah that all should be raised from the dead; but in addition to this, the Lord has made a certain sure promise, that all who obey the gospel shall receive a glory when raised, that the unrighteous will not receive, because of disobedience.

This decree that all shall be raised, is for the purpose of redeeming the human race from the consequences of the fall; but the Lord has decreed that there shall be a rest, or a Sabbath of creation, that all may share in on condition that they obey the gospel; therefore, those that do not obey the gospel will not share in this rest. When this rest commences those that have obeyed the gospel, and held out faithful to the end, will be raised out of their tombs in order to enjoy it; but the wicked through disobedience render themselves unworthy of it; therefore, they will not be raised when the righteous are.

The resurrection from the dead is not only a distinctive feature of the doctrine of Christ, but was considered by the ancient saints a great treasure, which would amply reward them for all their toils and privations that they endured while engaged in the work of God. To secure unto themselves the right of this glorious resurrection was one of the grand objects they had in view: hence, Paul declares that those that are Christ's shall have a resurrection at his coming.

Some dispute that there will be a literal resurrection of the body; but we are satisfied in our own minds that the scriptures are so plain, positive and directly to the point, that there is no room for controversy; however, for the benefit of the bewildered mind, we will give some of our reasons for believing as we do.

First, we believe in the literal resurrection of the body, because that Christ's body came forth out of the tomb, and he is the first fruits of them that slept, and also the example, which we will now prove.

The scripture says: "Now upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them.—And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre. And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus.—And it came to pass that two men stood by them in shining garments, who said, why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen." Luke xxiv. 1-6. See also Matt. xxviii. 1-6. Mark xvi. 1-6. John xx. 1-8.

Christ said after his resurrection: "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken, he showed them his hands and his feet." Luke xxiv. 39, 40. Thus Jesus had flesh and bones after his resurrection.

But, says one, did not Paul say that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven? We answer in the affirmative; but he did not say that flesh and bones could not inherit the kingdom of heaven. Flesh and blood constitute the mortal life of man; but when the blood is gone and the spirit of God takes its place, then the man is immortal. Blood is natural; therefore, the human system becomes weak through old age; but the spirit is eternal; therefore, it preserves, and is not subject to pain. It will invigorate the human system with power, and cause it to act without weariness to all eternity.

Christ did not say that he had flesh and blood, but that he had flesh and bones. We read also that Jesus appeared unto his disciples upon the shores of the sea of Tiberias, and even condescended to dine with them on broiled fish and honey comb which he had prepared himself.

O ye proud priests of the present day, who roll in luxury, and lean upon your places of ease, and would consider it too low an undertaking to condescend to cook food for yourselves and followers, here is a lesson for you. Christ our Redeemer, who spoke as never man did, condescended to prepare food, and dine with his disciples after his resurrection!

This proves to a demonstration that his body was raised from the dead; therefore, seeing that he is the example, not only in respect to piety and godly conduct, but in the resurrection from the dead, as he came forth, as far as the literality of the resurrection is concerned, so must we.

John is plain upon this: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii. 2. Paul says: "For our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself." Phil. iii. 20, 21.

Second, there is no partiality with God; for he respects his saints in one age of the world as much as he does in another; therefore, it would be an unjust thing for him to translate the bodies of Enoch and Elijah to heaven, and change them from mortality to immortality, and not suffer others to possess their bodies in eternity.

It is said that when Christ was crucified, that the earth did quake, and the rocks rent: "And the graves were opened; and many of the bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." Matt. xxvii. 52, 53. In the above it is said that the bodies (not spirits) of the saints arose; therefore, if God raised many of his saints at that time, why will he not raise all in his own due time?

THE PHILOSOPHY OF BUSINESS.

Few things of any importance are ever accomplished without trial. If we make up our minds that nothing can be done in business, fold our hands and sit down under that belief, without making any exertion, we may rest assured that the result cannot be otherwise than in accordance with our gloomy anticipations.

There is a philosophy in business which should be studied by all who are dependent upon it for support. The mechanic has but half learned his trade, who, if he be a shoemaker, tailor or hatter, knows only how to make a good shoe, coat or hat.

True, he is capable of rendering himself useful as a journeyman to his employer while dependent upon him for a head, but if he understand nothing of the principles of trade, he is incapable of turning to his own account, except through the agency of some second party, and of course but partially, the advantages of his superior mechanical knowledge. Something else besides the mere knowledge of the forms of business is required to constitute the active and prosperous business man.

If a man is a storekeeper, and discovers that the prices of his goods must come down, he obviates a great loss by submitting in time to a small one, and makes up his profit by other purchases and sales at the cheaper rates.

He never relaxes his efforts to do business, nor does he permit his stock to depreciate on his hands, by holding it above its market value, but maintain an active traffic; regulates his purchases and sales by the market and the time; makes cash the medium, both of his sales and purchases; and although his profits may be light in individual transactions, they will give him in the aggregate a competency, if they do not produce him a fortune.

The whole secret of the superior success of some merchants and traders over others, lies in the accuracy of their knowledge and their activity in making that knowledge available. It is in vain for a man to go to sleep in any employment, and hope to dream himself into a prosperous condition. He must make a business, not wait for it. He must guard against the broker, the sheriff and the insolvent court, by commencing on the cash principle.

He can maintain the most active of enterprise even in the dull season, and attract purchasers by his advertisements, and by offering his goods at moderate profits. If he possesses a knowledge of the wants of the community, and pursues this course, he must be successful. We repeat, then, let every man study the philosophy of business, and let him try to make a business, if he has not already done so, and he may safely calculate upon escaping ruin and poverty, if he should not attain prosperity and wealth.

RUINS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

We have lately looked over some drawings made by a traveler, recently returned from Central America, representing the ruins of an ancient city, not yet visited by any traveler, which are perhaps more remarkable than even those visited by Stephens and Catherwood. They have the same general character, but their preservation in some respects is more perfect. The principal of these ruins are at a place called Chichen, situated in the midst of a vast plain, almost midway between the two oceans.

On the tops of the pyramids, resembling those which Mr Stephens met with in other places, and which he conjectured to be the bases of public buildings, this traveler actually found massive edifices in a state of tolerable preservation. Among them was one differing from the rest in possessing a circular form and in being rounded at the top in a manner somewhat resembling a dome.

He found walls, vaults and floors, covered with a hard composition bearing a high finish, colored interior walls, sculptured in bold relief, stone rings for the hanging of large doors, and various other evidences of art and skill in the construction of habitations. We understand that it is the intention of Mr. Norman, the traveler in question, to publish an account of his visit to Yucatan, and a description of those curious remains.—Ec.

HOW SCHOLARS ARE MADE.

Costly apparatus and splendid cabinets have no magical power to make scholars. As a man is in all circumstances, under God, the master of his own fortune, so he is the maker of his own mind. The Creator has so constituted the human intellect that it can only grow by its own action, and by its own action it will certainly and necessarily grow.

Every man must, therefore, educate himself. His books and teachers are but helps; the work is his. A man is not educated until he has the ability to summon, in an emergency, all his mental powers in vigorous exercise to effect its proposed object.

It is not the man who has seen the most, or read most, who can do this: such an one is in danger of being borne down, like a beast of burden, by an over loaded mass of other men's thoughts.—Nor is it the man that can boast merely of native vigor and capacity. The greatest of all warriors that went to the siege of Troy, had not the pre-eminence, because nature had given strength and he carried the largest bow, but because self-discipline had taught him how to bend it.

SINGULAR DISEASE.

The following is a translation of an item of news given in the last number of the Turkish newspaper of Constantinople:—Many persons in Koufia and Adisheher, who have eaten lately of eggs and chickens, have been attacked with the Little Snake disorder. On opening the fowls after they had died or have had their throats cut, worms were found in their stomachs resembling snakes; and the newspapers from Persia mention that the same thing has been occurring here."

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The London correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer says that "the recent news from the Cape of Good Hope is most painful. The Caffers are as insolent as ever, and, despite the vigorous measures of Gen. Cathcart, they do not seem to give way in the slightest degree. They are now encamped within thirteen miles of Graham's Town, and their fires can be seen from our headquarters. The other day they attacked a party of thirty-four sappers and miners, killed seven and wounded nine others, took fifty three new Minié rifles, and thirty thousand rounds of ammunition. A treaty has been made with the emigrant Boers on the other side of the Vaal river, recognizing the settlement as independent, and declaring that no more treaties are to be entered into with the colored people north of the new State.

"The termination of the war cannot even be hoped for for a long time; it seems to be spreading rather than otherwise, and at the present time, a tract of country from one hundred to one hundred and fifty miles in length, and extending fifty miles on each side of the frontier, is one great battle-ground."

RISE AND FALL OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

There is a periodical rise and fall in the waters of this lake, well known to masters of vessels and others who live at ports on its shores, and to account for which, many theories have been advanced. The water commences rising above or below the Ste. Marie Falls, in June every year, and continues to rise very gradually till the last of August, it then slowly falls till the following May, at which time it is at its lowest ebb. The highest regular flow is not more than three or four feet.

The most plausible explanation that we have seen is the following:—During the winter season there is no rain in the region of the lake, it being situated in a high northern latitude; and hence, while its supplies are nearly all cut off, the rapids of the Ste. Marie are constantly lessening its volume. The rains commenced and snow begins to melt about the 1st of April, and the immense basin of Lake Superior becomes gradually filled, faster than its outlet suffers the water to escape. Thus the great extent of the lake both prevents a sudden rise and serves to prolong it after the immediate cause has been removed.—L. S. Journal.

LATE FROM MEXICO.

The New Orleans Picayune has advices from the city of Mexico to the 31st ult. The Indians were still committing depredations on the frontiers and murdering the defenceless inhabitants, while crime of every grade prevails throughout the country. The diligence between the capital and different points is regularly stopped and plundered by brigands.

HINTS TO MECHANICS.

Avoid giving long credits, even to your best customers. A man who can pay easily, will not thank you for delay, and a slack, doubtful paymaster is not too valuable a customer to dun sharply and seasonably.

A fish may as well attempt to live without water, or man without air, as a mechanic without punctuality and promptness in collecting, and paying his debts. It is a mistaken and ruinous policy to attempt to keep or get business by delaying collections. When you lose a slack paymaster from your books, you only lose the chance of losing your money; and there is no man who pays more money to lawyers than he who is least prompt in collecting for himself.

We are but passengers of a day, whether in a stage-coach or in the immense machine of the universe. Then why should we not make the way as pleasant to each other as possible? Short as our journey is, it is long enough to be tedious to him who skulks in his corner, sits uneasy himself, and elbows his neighbor to make him uneasy also.

MIND.

When first the mighty power of God,
Spread the wide arch of heaven abroad,
And bade the earth appear;
Chaos and all pervading night
Discerned creation's morning light,
And fled with fear.

The noblest work by God designed
Was placed in man, IMMORTAL MIND,—
The soul will upward soar
When Time's great cycle shall be filled, Creation's breathing heart be still'd
To throb no more.

Ages have pass'd, how dimly now
The stars gleam o'er the night's dark brow;
Some gems are missing there:
Where are the Pleiades, whose beams
Cheer'd the Chaldeans' midnight dreams
In the desert air?

Mind endures, her strength abides,
From roaring thunder clouds it glides
The messengers of fire,—
O'er the wide earth and wat'ry deep,
Subdued by mind, the lightning's leap,
Fulfilling its desire.

That wondrous power, whose mighty force
Keeps the mighty planets in their course,
Within mind's orbit lies,—
The blazing star, whose track appears Lost in the maze of distant years,
It traces in the skies.

HOUSE OF GOD.

BY R. P.

The sound of the Church-going Bell
Calls loudly on all to attend,
And wake from the slumbers of hell,
And fly to their Savior and friend.

To the house of our God we'll repair,
And listen with longing desire;
Perchance we may catch a glimpse there
Of the sacred celestial fire.

'Tis there the soul is refresh'd,
And fed from the ocean of love—
'Tis there that the weary find rest,
And assume the mild form of the dove.

Come Jacob and Ephraim, now come,
And offer your gift to the Lord;
Why tarry ye longer from home,
When God is revealing his word?

A telegraph straight from the skies,
Glad tidings to you will now bring;
And fill you with joyful surprise,
Whilst loud hallelujahs you sing.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

An account of Joseph was published about this time by a Methodist preacher of the name of Prior:—

"I will not attempt," said this writer, "to describe the various feelings of my bosom as I took my seat in a conspicuous place in the congregation, who were waiting in breathless silence for his appearance. While he tarried, I had plenty of time to revolve in my mind the character and common report of that truly singular personage. I fancied that I should behold a countenance sad and sorrowful, yet containing the fiery marks of rage and exasperation.

"I supposed that I should be enabled to discover in him some of those thoughtful and reserved features, those mystic and sarcastic glances, which I had fancied the ancient sages to possess.—I expected to see that fearful, faltering look of conscious shame which, from what I had heard of him, he might be expected to evince. He appeared at last; but how was I disappointed when instead of the heads and horns of the beast and false prophet, I beheld only the appearance of a common man, of tolerably large proportions.

"I was sadly disappointed, and thought that, although his appearance could not be wrested to indicate anything against him, yet he would manifest all I had heard of him when he began to preach. I sat uneasily, and watched him closely. He commenced preaching, not from the Book of Mormon, however, but from the Bible; the first chapter of the first of Peter was his text.

"He commenced calmly, and continued dispassionately to pursue his subject, while I sat in breathless silence, waiting to hear that foul aspersion of the other sects, that diabolical disposition of revenge, and to hear that rancorous denunciation of every individual but a Mormon.

"I waited in vain; I listened with surprise; I sat uneasy in my seat, and could hardly persuade myself but that he had been apprized of my presence, and so ordered his discourse on my account, that I might not be able to find fault with it; for instead of a jumbled jargon of half-connected sentences, and a volley of imprecations, and diabolical and malignant denunciations, heaped upon the heads of all who differed from him, and the dreadful twisting and wresting of the Scriptures to suit his own peculiar views, and attempts to weave a web of dark and mystic sophistry around the Gospel truths, which I had anticipated, he glided along through a very interesting and elaborate discourse with all the ease and happy facility of one who was well aware of his important station, and his duty to God and man."

The same writer thus describes Nauvoo:—

"At length the city burst upon my sight. Instead of seeing a few miserable log cabins and mud hovels, which I had expected to find, I was surprised to see one of the most romantic places that I had visited in the west. The buildings, though many of them were small, and of wood, yet bore the marks of neatness which I have not seen equalled in this country.

"The far-spread plain at the bottom of the hill was dotted over with the habitations of men, with such majestic profusion, that I was almost willing to believe myself mistaken, and instead of being in Nauvoo of Illinois, among Mormons, that I was in Italy at the city of Leghorn, which the location of Nauvoo resembles very much. I gazed for some time with fond admiration upon the plain below. Here and there arose a tall majestic brick house, speaking loudly of the genius and untiring labor of the inhabitants, who have snatched the place from the clutches of obscurity, and wrested it from the bonds of disease; and in two or three short years, rescued it from a dreary waste to transform it into one of the first cities in the west.

"The hill upon which I stood was covered over with the dwellings of men, and amid them was seen to rise the hewn stone and already accomplished work of the Temple, which was now raised fifteen or twenty feet above the ground. The few trees that were permitted to stand were now in full foliage, and were scattered with a sort of fantastic irregularity over the slope of the hill.

"I passed on into the more active parts of the city, looking into every street and lane to observe all that was passing. I found all the people engaged in some useful and healthy employment. The place was alive with business—much more so than any place I have visited since the hard times commenced.

"I sought in vain for anything that bore the marks of immorality, but was both astonished and highly pleased at my ill success. I could see no loungers about the streets nor any drunkards about the taverns. I did not meet with those distorted features of ruffians, or with the ill-bred and impudent. I heard not an oath in the place, I saw not a gloomy countenance; all were cheerful, polite, and industrious."

WHAT ARE TREES MADE OF?

From the "Life of a Tree" we got this answer to the question, where does wood come from, or what are trees made of?

If we were to take up a handful of soil and examine it under the microscope, we should probably find it to contain a number of fragments of wood, small broken pieces of the branches, or leaves, or other parts of the tree. If we could examine it chemically, we should find yet more strikingly that it is nearly the same as wood in its composition.

Perhaps, then, it may be said, the young plant obtains its wood from the earth in which it grows? The following experiments will show whether this conjecture is likely to be correct or not. Two hundred pounds of earth were dried in an oven, and afterward put in a large earthen vessel; the earth was then moistened with water, and a willow tree, weighing five pounds, was planted therein.

During the five years the earth was carefully watered with rain water or pure water. The willow grew and flourished, and to prevent the earth being mixed with fresh earth, blown upon it by the winds, it was covered with a metal plate full of very minute holes, which would exclude every thing but air from the earth below it. After growing in the earth for five years, the tree was removed, and on being weighed, was found to have gained one hundred and sixty-four pounds.

And his estimate did not include the weight of the leaves of dead branches which in five years fell from the tree. Now came the application of the test. Was all this obtained from the earth? It had not sensibly diminished; but in order to make the experiment conclusive, it was again dried in an oven and put in the balance. Astonishing was the result—the earth weighed only two ounces less than it did when the willow was first planted in it! yet the tree had gained a hundred and sixty-four pounds.

Manifestly, then, the wood thus gained in this space of time was not obtained from the earth; we are, therefore, compelled to repeat our question, "Where does the wood come from?" We are left with only two alternatives; the water with which it was refreshed, or the air in which it lived. It can be clearly shown that it was not due to the water; we are, consequently, unable to resist the perplexing and wonderful conclusion, it was derived from air.

Can it be? Were those great ocean spaces of wood, which were as old as man's introduction into Eden, and waved in their vast and solitary luxuriance over the fertile hills and plains of South America—were these all obtained from the thin air?—Were the particles which unite to form our battle-ships, Old England's walls of wood, ever borne the world about, not only on wings of air, but actually as air themselves? Was the firm table on which I write, the chair on which I rest, the solid floor on which I dwell, once in a form which I could not so much as lay my finger on, or grasp in my hand! Wonderful truth! all this is air.

FARMING.

Some people think that farming is an employment of which all men possess a knowledge—that it is natural for a man to become a skillful agriculturist without having any previous knowledge of farming, as it is natural for a river to flow down stream. But in this they are greatly mistaken.

Agriculture is a science, and a thorough knowledge of all its branches is indispensable to him who would follow it successfully. The farmer must not only know how to treat the soil and its productions, but he must also have some knowledge of the manner of raising stock. To this end, he must be acquainted with the diseases to which they are subject, and which often defy the skill of the most experienced men.

The farmer must be a man of enterprise, industry and economy, too, if he expects to make anything more than a bare living.—He must be up in the morning with the lark, ever keeping an eye upon his business, and not depend upon Tom, Dick and Harry to do his work for him. The farmer need never lie still for want of business, as is the case in many other professions. Thus we see that the farmers, after all, combine more of science and economy than we are generally willing to admit.—Union Cultivator.

HOW TO ACQUIRE HIGH HEALTH.

Walker, in his "Original," lays down the following rules for obtaining high health. They are worth remembering, particularly his advice to wives and husbands:—

First study to acquire a composure of mind and body. Avoid agitations of one or the other, especially just before and after meals, and whilst the process of digestion is going on. To this end, govern your temper, endeavor to look at the bright side of things, keep your mind as much as possible the unruly passions, discard envy, hatred and malice, and lay your head upon your pillow in charity with all mankind.

Let not your wants outrun your means. Whatever difficulties you have to encounter, be not perplexed, but only think what is right to do in sight of Him who seeth all things, and bear without pining the result. When your meals are solitary, let your thoughts be cheerful; when they are social, which is better, avoid dispute or serious argument, or unpleasant topics.

"Unquiet meals," says Shakespeare, "make ill digestions;" and the contrary is produced by easy conversation, a pleasant project, welcome news, or a lively companion. I advise wives not to entertain their husbands with domestic grievances about children or servants, nor to ask for money, nor propound unreasonable or provoking questions, and advise husbands to keep the cares and vexations of the world to themselves, but to be communicative of whatever is comfortable, cheerful and amusing.

Nor Slow.—An exchange tells a good story of a wag, who, to raise the wind, advertised that on a certain day he would crawl into a bottle. A large audience collected to witness the wonderful feat, when, after getting all the cash in his pocket, and seeing a clear chance to make good his retreat, the performer came forward and apologised to the audience for disappointing them but said it was impossible to perform the feat, as he could not find a bottle large enough. Immediately after this apology he left.

"FATHER, look ye here. 'Tis the reason you and mother's alters a quarrelling?"

"Silence, boy. Do you know what you're talking about?"

"Yes sire, I do. I was just a wonderin' wot you'd do if you had as many wives as old Solomon."

"Bah! go to bed."

"Yes, it's very well to say go to bed. Solomon had mo'n a hundred wives, all on 'em a living in the same house, a eaten' together and ne'er a fight."

"Go to bed."

"Now wot a time you'd have if you'd half as many. Why, you'd kick up sich a rumpus as 'ud fetch up the police—and knock things to thunder."

A broomstick interrupted the loquacious youth, and very suddenly suggested to him the idea of traveling, which he did.

An author of a love story, in describing his heroine, says:—

"Innocence dwells in the rich clusters of her dark hair."

A waggish editor suggests that a fine tooth comb would bring it out.

JUDICIAL PUN.—During the trial of the licence cases last week, one of the defendants who argued his own case, on rising to address the jury, apologised by saying that he was not educated a lawyer, but had spent seven years in learning the tailor's trade. To which the judge responded, "You certainly ought then to be able to manage a suit."—Ex.

"The longer I live in the world," says Goethe, "the more certain I am that the great difference between the great and insignificant, is energy, invincible determination, and honest purpose, once fixed, and then victory." That quality will do anything that can be done in the world, and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunity, will make without it.

An old gentleman who had dabbled all his life in statistics, says he never heard of more than one woman who insured her life. He accounts for this by the singular fact that one of the questions on every insurance paper is—"what is your age?"

THE SOFTER SEX.—Women are called the "softer sex" because they are so easily humbugged. Out of one hundred girls, ninety-five would prefer ostentation to happiness—a dandy husband to a mechanic.

A young lady who talks eloquently about love, is probably, incapable of feeling much of it. Deep feeling does not overflow in words. Many a young woman sincerely believes that she is capable of never-ending attachment, when she likes only the excitement of having a lover and hearing her virtue extolled by others.

THE SMART TO LIVE LONG.—A teacher of one of the Sunday Schools, was lecturing a class of little girls on the influence of pious example and pious instruction in the formation of youthful character.

"Ah, Miss Caroline," said he to one of the class, "what would you have been without your good father and mother?"

"I suppose, sir," answered Miss Caroline, "I would have been an orphan."

Penny-wise is the man who pays a shilling for four cigars, and borrows his neighbor's paper.

If you wish oaks, plant acorns; if you wish a fortune, plant dollars; if you prefer happiness, sow the seeds of virtue, and cultivate them with charity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM J. S. COMSTOCK TO MR. CURTIS.
Cayuga, Sept. 21st, 1852.

DEAR SIR:—The remark which you made at the close of our conversation yesterday is the occasion of my dropping these few lines to you this morning. You said you knew that you were building upon the right foundation. Now, if it be true that you know it, can you admit it possible for any man to know that assertion to be false?

If you can, it will be of no avail for one to reason with you who might be of a different mind, or possessed of knowledge differing from yours. But I trust you are not so unreasonable as to allow of such a contradiction in truth. Therefore I do not yet pray to be entirely delivered from you as an unreasonable man. Yet to accede to your remark as being truth, would require stronger faith, if it might be called faith, than I can call into exercise.

I will not now be so impolite as to assert positively that I know it to be false, lest I should offend. But still I trust you will be so liberal as to allow me to know something, if I am able to prove it, even though I should chance to differ from you. I know you will be compelled to allow it, but I want you to admit of it, if you can, without making me your enemy. If you cannot, I can only say, without expecting any reply, "am I, therefore, your enemy because I tell you the truth?"

And now, sir, let me reason with you a word or two upon what I deem the absurdity of your affirmations. If you know you are building upon the right foundation, which God has laid for the erection of his church, while you remain a minister of the Wesleyan Methodist order, then why may I and the rest of God's people not know it also?—I for one certainly do not know it, and cannot so much as believe it, but am confident that the great weight of argument is against it. Both reason and revelation unite to overthrow it, and I verily am persuaded that there is no foundation in truth for such knowledge to rest upon.

And, sir, I defy you or any other man to show it by the light of God's word. You even flee from your own and every other visible organization upon earth, whenever you are called upon to do it. That is, to show to us the church of Jesus Christ. You say it is a city, so called in sacred writ, which cannot be hid. Then if it cannot be hid, why are you so blind to describe it? You don't even pretend to say publicly, neither privately to me, that it is exclusively the Wesleyan Methodist church that we should look to.

But that, you say, is anti-slavery to eternal. No, you dare not say that that is the church of Christ, and no other, for fear of contending parties. And I presume you do not believe it. But you continue to affirm to me it is a city well watered, as by hydraulic power, and is found in various organized bodies of different names, too numerous for you to particularize; at least you did not, so as I could know where you would separate acceptable Protestantism from rejected Romanism.

Yet you would not be thought so outrageous as to deny but the body of Christ is one body undivided. So, to turn the attention of astonished beholders from so dreaded an absurdity as appears, you take the liberty to disorganize your own body and all others, and point the inquiring mind to an invisible organization which you say God has organized. But the principle or the law of that invisible organization you keep from us the inquiring people. I must say you present a dark picture to me, for a light to the world.

Now we both claim to be ministers of the gospel of Christ, yet we differ so essentially that what you hold forth to be the body of Christ I proclaim as Anti-Christ, and am able to prove it even so, with this difference, that you reject the old mother of harlots as a part of your body, while I affirm verily she is the progenitor of all Protestantism. She is the very root of Anti-Christ, and Protestantism the branches. Thus we have it full of names. Is not Anti Christ also spoken of as a city? Is she not watered also as by hydraulic means? Excepting that water with you don't mean water when men are required to be born of the water. But I never yet could learn what they would have it mean—some mystery I suppose.

Anti-Christ is sometimes spoken of as a man. But the multifarious body over whom he presides is called woman. Christ is also called man, but the one true church is the bride, the Lamb's wife, having in it no divisions, and not full of names. The priesthood of this woman full of names is derived from Anti-Christ, and is no priesthood of any validity, because it derives its own origin and contends against the power that bestowed it. And inasmuch as Paul said, I suffer not a woman to teach, so she should acknowledge her rightful head.

But Protestantism, in consequence of denying its own origin, is driven to the necessity of assuming in each separate branch to be of itself the original head.

But, like the fabled Kilkenny cats, they dare not maintain it by argument, lest each should swallow up the other in the contest. So, like the false prophets of old, they can only live by crying peace, peace.

Why, sir, dare you reason, as a man of God, upon the question now before us? Dare you show to this generation the whole organized body of Anti-Christ? Can you? Do you not fear the exposure? I say, dare you come before the public in a discussion contrasting the two organized bodies of the present day, Christ and Anti-Christ? If you dare venture, I will engage with you before the public, either written or oral.

If you dare not, you are not worthy of Christ. If you cannot, you are not an able minister of the New Testament by any means. Will you confine Anti-Christ to p'pery proper, excluding all Protestantism? What then will you make of the blasphemous names, of which the woman is full?

You spoke of the city of Detroit in your last sermon, of its being watered by hydraulic power, &c. Not many years ago the dead body of a man lay putrid and wasting his rotten body to be drained through the suction of those pipes, and carried about that city for the inhabitants to drink, until the stench became so strong as to lead to an examination of the cause.

This is like your bringing from the river of the gospel, as you called it, the water of life, through those aqueducts called by me sectarian bodies of Anti-Christ. I could not suck it for the stench of corruption. There may be some truth, as you said, "Did you hear me say anything but truth yesterday?" Suppose I did not, I could smell Anti-Christ at your suction pipes, and I was keen sighted enough to discover that if you did get it from the river of truth, the water was colored through the filthy channels of communication, which rendered it not only nauseous, but sickening to all but such as were so used to it.

If you are properly compared to those servants who should be paid for serving such water, ought you not to examine carefully the pipes or suction, through which you convey this water, especially after being notified?—Perhaps, however, you will say, a stranger has no legal right to notify, or his notice is of no avail. But, sir, you must know many of her citizens have left already in consequence of this complaint, which is not heeded by those dreamers who sing, all is well, amid her groanings and sighings.

And, furthermore, it has become what ought to be considered a public nuisance, against which any member of community may justly complain; and, indeed, yourself have more than once complained of the corruptions of that body, which you still hold forth publicly as a component part of the city of Zion, as you call it, where you say runs the "river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God."

You have already as much as once or twice fled from one to another part of that city, to escape its corruptions. Why did you flee? O, you could not fellowship a slaveholding church. That produced too great a stench for your endurance. But is that all the difficulty? It might be all that you discovered, and that was sufficient to frighten or drive you from that body or its dominion, yet is not that body still a part of your holy city, where your river runs, making glad your city? Does not all Methodism, as well as other slaveholding churches, help to make it glad?

But, sir, were you wholly acquainted with the corruptions of that city, you call the Zion of God, in this age, you no doubt would say of each and every part of it, as you once said of the Methodist Episcopal church, even that you would not dare to tarry in it over night. Now you felt justified in finding fault with a slaveholding church. But are you certain that this is the greatest sin of that body of whom you complain, and

And, furthermore, should another be able to show a still greater evil existing nearer the root of all, would you call him uncharitable for doing so? Certainly you ought not. Well, sir, although African slavery may be as great an evil as you deem it, yet I am not mistaken if the guilt thereof be as great in any one of those bodies, called churches, as one other that might be named.

And when you inquire what is that, you should recollect that few in the Methodist church viewed slavery as you now do, even at the time you received orders there to officiate as a priest among them. And, of course, you did not then consider that body as rejected of God, because they were ignorant of the heinous nature of that crime. Yet the crime in the sight of God was as great before you saw it as afterwards; and the amount of suffering none the less in consequence of your and others profound sleep.

But when you awoke to examine the matter your compassion for the suffering slaves led you to excise all slaveholders from the church of God or from your fellowship, and from the very few indeed who remained with you. You then, after your act of excommunication, counted them withered branches.

When, I ask, were they cut off from the true vine? Was it not until you withered them with your exposures? or were they dead before? If dead before, how could living intelligent bodies grow out of dead carcasses, as you would seem to show? But if not dead until your act of seceding from them, or of excising them from you, then verily you have occasioned the death of a part of the living body of Christ.

And is not this worse than the evil you sought to cure? worse even than modern physicians, who sometimes cut off the limbs to cure the body? But you, with your high handed acts, have cut off the body to save a limb. Surely if that may be done, then how is the age of miracles past? Yet so they will have it, notwithstanding.

But I leave this part of the work, and call your attention to what I deem a greater evil than slavery in the sectarian world, and I except no part of it, no, not Wesleyan Methodists. It is the sin of blasphemy—of which you all are guilty before God and his people. And is not blasphemy worse than slavery? If slavery be a creature of law in all slaveholding States, then the churches are guilty only of refusing obedience to the divine order in reference to that matter, which no where suggests the measures you have adopted. But your greater sin is blasphemy. To claim authority from God, whereas you only hold it from a body whose power to grant, you self have denied as being not of God.

For it is evident from the inspired writings that each separate branch of Romanism, or the old mother of harlots, inasmuch as they assume to be churches of Christ and are not, are guilty of blasphemy. Read Rev. 2nd 9th, "I know the blasphemy of those who say they are Jews and are not, but are of the synagogue of Satan."

Now if any one should call for proof of this doctrine which I proclaim respecting Anti-Christ and the Tares, as being nothing less than Romanism and Protestantism in one vine, called vine of the earth, we have it in abundance. And we pledge ourselves to bring ten good reasons in confirmation of its truth, where one cannot be found to weigh against it.

But as the negative is not required to go in advance of the affirmative, I would call upon you to prove by the light of God's word that you are building upon the true foundation, which God has laid for his church to rest upon. We want you to show it to the world. For is not Christ's church "the pillar and ground of the truth?" If you cannot publish it, write it out, and I will get it published, provided the body which your fellowship as the church will subscribe to your views of the matter.

And then we will either submit, and become one body with you, without seism, or else we will show you the utter falsity of your pretensions. Not by contradictions merely, but by strong proofs. If you refuse to comply with request, we can only believe that you are either afraid of the light of God's truth, or else deceived by the fashionable outcry that nothing can be gained by religious discussions. Why then do you preach at all? Are you accountable to none but your own company?

It may be that they love darkness, and with you hate the investigation of truth. It may be that yours and their holiness consists too much in an unholy peace, while "the wisdom that comes from above is first pure, after that peaceable." Look at the ancient servants of God.—See them contending earnestly for purity of faith and doctrine. Hear a Paul to the church of Corinth upon the evils of divisions. Hear Elijah! witness his zeal for the true order, when Israel were making long and loud prayers, and offering sacrifices as they supposed to the true God.

Just notice his more than willingness to prove his faith and order to the world. Are you of his spirit and of his faith? And dare you, like those false worshipers, come to the test of being proved? If you dare not, you are even behind those servants of Baal, and by no means like God's servants in any age of the past or present.

For all God's servants ever have and ever will contend for one and only one foundation—for one and only one faith—one and only one baptism—for one and only one body of Christ—for one and only one set of ad-

And, again, look at Jesus Christ from the age of twelve years, disputing with lawyers and doctors, and on the public stage disputing with all classes of religionists with patience and perseverance, even where they sought to stone him. And then look at yourself, and crawl off if you will under the sanctimonious pretence that religious discussions are unholy engagements, and notice how you appear by the side of one who disputed two years in the school of one Tyrannus, and daily with others.

Are you now like Christ or like his servants in this particular? If not, how and when will you become like them? Surely not until you get another spirit, and are totally dis severed from each and every anti-christian body in faith and practice, and come freely out into the open field of argument before all people; and unless you can conquer all opposition with your superior light, you are not of the true order of God, nor upon his foundation built. Truly and sincerely, J. S. C.

Oxygen.—This substance is indispensable to all vital activity, and yet most mysterious in its actions and effects. In a quiescent state it forms part of the solid muscle, which, if unattached by outside chemical agents, would endure as long as the granite rocks; and yet, strange to say, it is another portion of the same element, in an active state, which constitutes the outside chemical agent by whose action the muscle is decomposed, and made one of the most short-lived of organic compounds. Again, oxygen is indispensable to all manifestation of animal or vegetable life, and yet the process by which it brings out such manifestations, is purely one of decay and dissolution!

Oxygen gas constitutes 21 parts in 100 of the air we breathe. It was, when first discovered, called vital air. It also constitutes eightieths, by weight, of water. In every nine pounds of water there are eight pounds of this gas, very much condensed of course, because it has taken on the fluid state.

NORTHERN ISLANDER,

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, NOV. 11, 1852.

ELECTION.

The election came off here for the township of Peaine Tuesday, the 2d inst. The whole number of votes cast was one hundred and sixty five, which is about seventy-five short of the full number of voters. The canvass is as follows:

Electors of President and Vice President,	154
John S. Barry,	154
Daniel J. Campau,	154
Abraham Edwards,	154
William McCauley,	155
Salmon Sharp,	155
John Stockton,	155
Member of Congress,	157
Hector L. Stevens,	157
William H. Bradley,	1
Governor,	156
Robert McClelland,	156
Zachariah Chandler,	1
Lieutenant Governor,	157
Andrew Parsons,	157
Secretary of State,	157
William Graves,	157
Auditor General,	156
John Swegles,	156
State Treasurer,	156
Bernard C. Whittemore,	156
Attorney General,	158
William Hale,	158
Superintendent of Public Instruction,	158
Francis W. Shearman,	158
Commissioner of the State Land Office,	156
Porter Kibbee,	156
Members of the State Board of Education,	156
Isaac E. Cray, for six years,	156
G. O. Whittemore, for four years,	156
Chauncey Joslin, for two years,	158
Senator for the 29th Senate district, consisting of the counties of LaPeer, Saginaw, Tuscola, Midland, Gladwin, Aronac, Rosecommon, Ogemaw, Isosco, Algoma, Oscoda, Crawford, Otsego, Montmorency, Alpena, Presque Isle, Wyandott, Charlevoix, Emmet and Cheboygan,	165
Moses Chase,	165
Representative of the district composed of the counties of Newaygo, Ocean, Lake, Mason, Manistee, Grand Traverse, Wexford, Missaukee, Rosecommon, Ogemaw, Isosco, Algoma, Oscoda, Crawford, Kalkasha, Omeona, Leelanaw, Antrim, Otsego, Montmorency, Alpena, Presque Isle, Wyandott, Charlevoix, Emmet and Cheboygan,	165

This presents a unanimity probably no where else seen.—But it should not be inferred, therefore, that there is much liking for the Democratic party here. It is estimated much the same as the Whig party. Politically we think Whigs have quite as many adherents as the Democrats.—But the knowledge that the Whigs had persecuted us as a party measure, and the absence of any assurance that they will not do it again, lost them eighty or 100 votes. Truly, but for the fear of persecution by the Whigs, because we do not all vote their ticket, as they did heretofore, we believe the Whigs would have obtained a majority of votes.

The Apportionment law by means of which the unorganized counties of Emmet and Cheboygan are made part of the same Representative district as Newaygo is ridiculous, unless it was made for the purpose of disfranchising those two counties.—The district canvass is by law held at the distance of seven hundred miles, by any traveled route, and in the time allowed for the purpose, it is but barley possible to get the returns there in season to be canvassed. The arrangement that the votes of the electors of these two counties for Senator shall be sent to LaPeer in three weeks, and for Representative to Newaygo in one week, without giving any person any interest in forwarding them, if it was not a blunder must have been designed to disfranchise them.

As it is, the result may accomplish a very different end. Mr. Strang is probably elected.

A messenger has been sent forward from here to attend the Canvass, with the proper documents in his pocket. Some man in Newaygo who don't know that there is a human soul in Emmet County may be a little disappointed when the returns come in, and will doubtless lay it more to heart than Mr. Strang would should he be defeated.

The only thing that could possibly induce Mr. Strang to leave home at that season of the year is the pre-eminent necessity of a Representative who is acquainted with the intrests of this section of country, and who will faithfully attend to them.

If one hundred and sixty-five votes are sufficient to elect a Representative from this district, and we fully believe they are, then an attempt to disfranchise us has resulted in the election, by the voters on this Island alone, of a Representative for full one fourth the territory of the State.—We are quite sure, however, that if elected, Mr. Strang is able and disposed to faithfully represent the interests of every part of the district; better posted up in their affairs than any other man.

KNOW BEFORE YOU TEACH.

"Katinka ask'd her also whence she came—From Spain."—But where is Spain?—
Don't ask such stuff,
Nor show your Georgian ignorance—for shame!"

Said Lolah, with an accent rather rough,
To poor Katinka: "Spain's an island near Morocco, betwixt Egypt and Tangier."

The New York Courier and Enquirer is out with a criticism on "Uncle Tom's Cabin," in which he complains that the author misrepresents the laws and institutions of the slave States, especially in what she says of Legree. And to justify the criticism, quotes from the statutes of Louisiana, to show that a master is forbidden to inflict cruel punishment.

Mrs. Stow, in that remarkable work, has certainly shown herself possessed of an uncommon stock of information, both of the slave code and of the use of it.—Some few of the States have made laws forbidding cruelty.—But in every one of them, persons of color are excluded the witness stand when whites are on trial. And it is this feature of the system on which she asserts the impunity of Legree's cruelties. The following words, which she puts into the mouth of Cassy, Legree's compelled par amour, places the whole matter on the legal exclusion of the only possible witnesses, the persons of color on whom these cruelties are inflicted:—

"I've been on this place five years, body and soul, under this man's foot; and I hate him as I do the devil! Here you are, on a lone plantation, ten miles from any other, in the swamp; not a white person here, who could testify, if you were burned alive,—if you were scalded, cut into inch-pieces, set up for the dogs to tear, or hung up and whipped to death. There's no law here, of God or man, that can do you, or any one of us, the least good; and, this man! there's no earthly thing that he's too good to do. I could make any one's hair rise, and their teeth chatter, if I should only tell what I've seen and been knowing to, here,—and it's no use resisting! Did

I want to live with him? Wasn't I a woman delicately bred; and he—God in heaven! what was he, and is he? And yet, I've lived with him, these five years, and cursed every moment of my life,—night and day! And now, he's got a new one,—a young thing, only fifteen, and she brought up, she says, piously.—Her good mistress taught her to read the Bible; and she's brought her Bible here—to hell with her."

Any man can see that with the slaves, wholly subject to the master's will, nothing is easier than to always have them where there is no white witness, when any act of cruelty is to be inflicted.

Moreover, it was decided by the courts of Virginia, nearly a half century since, "that a master was not liable to indictment for cruelly and without provocation beating his slave so that his life was for a long time despaired of." And this rule of law is still retained in the slave code of nearly all the States. We think Louisiana and Texas are the only exceptions, and practically slavery is more rigorous in those States than elsewhere.

The Weekly Free Press, of Oct. 11th, contains a long and learned communication, dated Mackinac, Oct. 2d, from which we extract the following interesting paragraphs:—

My last experience in this business trip has been in Green Bay and a few days in these Straits. When we entered the Bay, the green of Summer had not passed, and the sublimely beautiful scenery stood decked out in all its livery of luxuriant verdure. What strikes one particularly is the limestone cliffs that overhang the Northern sides of the islands and form minor promontories, jutting out to the North-West, along the tongue of land that separates the Lake from the Bay, 90 miles in length. These are the terminating points of ridges that begin to rise by a gentle slope on the Lake shore, and are from one to two hundred feet in elevation when they reach the Bay, where they abruptly terminate with a prodigious depth of water at their base. As they run up into the Eastern side of that beautiful sheet of water, and extend one after the other, they look like huge leviathan heads emerging from the waves, sporting in the clear sparkling fluid, and running a race into hyperborean regions. Under their sides, and shut in by the island, are the safest and neatest harbors imaginable.

In those harbors are the fisherman's shanties, and, in not a few places, more substantial dwellings, and now and then a rural cottage. Are you aware of the extent of these fisheries? They bid fair soon to rival the Atlantic piscatory grounds, in the home market, and are fast developing under new auspices. A small fact will show how easy a little capital can give comfort and remuneration, in many places, judiciously applied. These fishermen generally have had to go a great distance to market with their labor proceeds, and then depend more upon "dicker," &c., than cash, and return in their small boats, loaded with salt and groceries, losing much valuable time.

Michigan has an interest in those islands, and why has not Congress finished those surveys of the Boundary Line, to discover the "best ship channel," between the States of Wisconsin and Michigan, a part of which has been done and the chart of the Southern part of the Bay, very accurate and a great help to us this year, was long since published and now out of print?

I had intended to speak definitely of the Bay de Noquet county, on the North of this line, which offers so great attractions to the lumbermen and miners. A word must suffice. From that bay a Railroad is contemplated across to Lake Superior, to direct trade to the South, by the way of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, now improving to St. Louis, and also to Chicago and Mobile. Some are sanguine of building a great city at Bay de Noquet. One of the finest iron mines, in a heavily wooded region, is found here. The Railroad will complete with the Sault canal. Local business already demands a steamer, to collect the fish and supply other business wants, to connect with the Buffalo and Chicago boats.

The habits of the white fish are being studied. During the warm season they go to the deep water, and we found their haunts pursuing into two or three hundred feet depth of soundings, and six to eight miles from shore, with gill nets. The fish feed on larvae of the "May fly," and other insects, which are hatched in the water and live there a long time as "worms" that finally "turn into" flies, mosquitoes, &c. These larvae live on the fungi or

"fresh water weeds" that grow on the bottom, probably over the whole under water area.—In the spring they feed near the shore, in shoal water, and gradually retire to the deep and return in autumn. They are now in the market here again. The voracious Trout pursues the suction White fish, and the nets bring game of all sorts. The rocky, broken shores afford but few places for the use of the seine, and the gill net is universally employed, being sunk and visited every morning, when the weather is good. But the daring and skill seen in the use of those skiffs, as they bound on the maddened waters in the sudden squalls, is truly admirable, and seem almost incredible even to an eye witness.

A day or two since I visited the United States surveying parties, now assiduously engaged on the lake surveys, on the main land opposite. One party is busy as a host of beavers on that most delicate and scientific operation, which Brande calls the highest in Geodetic work, the measuring a base line. This line is the base to develop a grand triangulation or instrumental measurement along the coast and to include the islands, reefs and bars, from the limits of sight in Lake Huron to Superior and across Lake Michigan and Green Bay.

An apparatus of the most delicate and complicated construction is used. It is made by a combination of metallic bars of different metals, so arranged as to counteract or compensate for change of temperature. By this means, two points in each of two tubes are placed fifteen feet apart and kept invariably there. The bars are enveloped in a double tube of tin, a stratum of air between them to keep the temperature uniform as possible and prevent sudden changes.

To use this apparatus requires ten persons. The ground is smoothed, and iron foot plates placed to receive iron trestles carrying the tubes, which latter are moved vertically, sideways, and longitudinally by the nicest motions of machinery—a transit instrument keeps them invariably in a straight line. One tube is set down and adjusted and then the next is placed nearly before it. The points are brought into contact by the screws. The contact is the difficult part. A small rod is attached to the main bar which shuts to an arm projecting from the middle of a spirit-level, which level turns on an axis of the arm and has one end weighed down very slightly. When the forward rod with an agate point touches the rear one, it pushes against the arm & brings the level horizontal. Then the two points of that bar are fifteen feet apart and that tube in position. The other is then carried to the front, put on the foot plates, already placed by the transit, and then brought into adjustment of level, lined out and the contact as before. So delicate is the level, called Bessel's method, that it shows the ten hundredth thousand of an inch, and the least jar is perceptible. When the party stops, a smooth stone block is sunk flush with the ground, a theodolite opposite and a mark made on the stone by sighting upon the agate point, and carrying the line vertically down. This is revised at starting, and done at meal times and closing of the day's work.—This tedious but beautiful process has been carried over four miles. But the labor consisted still from the nature of the ground. They have trenched about two miles in tamarack swamps, cutting peaty muck, filled with a net work of green roots in some places a foot and a half deep, and crossed a shaky marsh of some hundred feet where a bridge of strings clamped together was laid the entire way, to insure steadiness. The expedients made to evade the accidents of ground, are as ingenious as the instruments used. The country is most forbidding one for base lines, and unlike the sand beaches of the Atlantic survey.

The science of the age forbids a less accurate, or rather demands this entire accuracy of work. The astronomical part is equally elaborate on this and the Atlantic coast survey. This provokes the thought, why is it that the ocean work can get more money to repair a steamer than the lake survey obtains for a whole year's operation with a steamer to support? Or why should a half million annually be given to one, and twenty thousand only to this, which is on ground, any equal portion of which on the Atlantic does not float more of value or number of lives? I have only time to say that the officers so diligently at work, are Topographical Engineers, Captains Lee, Macomb, and Lieut. Gunnison.

But in the midst of this interesting matter occurs the following:—

In our trip we touched at King Strang's empire, on Beaver Island. Your readers may all be aware that these Mormons are fellowshipped and anathematized by the good body that go by that name. But it is so, and they are accursed by the simon pures, and a prophecy hurled forth that they must soon cease to naught, like Rigdon and others with some other seceders. And the vaticination is fast proving true, unlike many others of that singular sect. The great king came down to his usual barefooted, and on all sides we see proofs of unmistakable poverty. They do not raise provisions enough for support, and scarcely buy necessary groceries, or clothing. The neighbors complain of their robberies, and the Mormons say the gentiles steal from one another and lay all the blame of their own wretchedness on the Lord's saints. A propeller was wrecked last year and kept them from starvation last winter. Strang regarded this as act of Providence for their benefit, and tells his deluded followers that they may be sure of such kindnesses again in their behalf.

The Nauvoo Mormons, now in Utah, have published that the great seceder Cowdery, once Joe Smith's right-hand man died a drunkard. Of this I learn the truth is, that Cowdery became a good citizen, and his last employer in Wisconsin, now at Green Bay, gave me assurance that he was temperate and exemplary in all things. There are suspicions that he was foully dealt with on his visit to Council Bluffs, to some old companions in the sect, for he died suddenly at a tavern, a day or two after his departure to return home a year or two since.

Now, it is known at this region, that "King Strang" left Beaver for Wisconsin and Illinois early in Sept., and did not return till past the middle of Oct. And it may be a curious question to those who were spending those cheerful days with Mr. Strang in Racine and Chicago, on his farm in Walworth county, and riding over the Illinois prairies, how the vision of this long sighted correspondent could discern whether the King was barefooted or shod.

Lend me an ear, dear reader, and I will tell thee. Thou art aware that many a good man and learned is nevertheless ignorant of human nature. Such an one landed here not many days since, and very learned he was, too, who came ashore and wanted some one to point out a Mormon to him, that he might see how they looked. Fortunate he was that he did not fall into the hands of some wag, such as the learned correspondent of the Free Press did.

Well this class of men all think the Mormons a very simple, ignorant, outlandish race.— A few weeks since one of them made a thorough examination of the Indian burial ground at this place, and published his description of it as a Mormon cemetery, with a learned disquisition on the assimilation of habits. By being civilized enough to enclose the Indian graves instead of desecrating them with a plough share, we have set the learned, wise men to calculating how soon we shall become savages!

Well, dear reader, a very fine gentleman did come here, a passenger on the Steamer Globe, and mouse around after the affairs, domestic economy, and public policy of the Mormons. Very anxious was he to see the Mormon King. But no King was here. What should the Mormons do? Gratify him they must in some way.

There is here a curious eccentric young man commonly known by the cognomen of Horace Greeley. The real Greeley prides himself, or did before he attended the world's fair, in wearing his clothes as shabbily as he pleases. Our Greeley, like all imitations, is like the original, only more so. He is just as much of a Whig—just the same sort of social philosopher—just as good natured and benevolent, and when he undertakes it a good deal more shabby. We have seen him put on an old plug hat, with the crown carefully out, so as to leave only a hinge to swing by, and a gash of a broad axe through the side—the half of an over coat, big enough to rap up two such as himself in—a pair of pants with one leg carefully torn off at the knee, and the other ripped up quite as far—a new fine boot on one foot, and the other bare;

with a large slice of a horse blanket about his neck for a cravat, and parade himself in the most conspicuous place when there were a multitude of strangers by, as apparently indifferent to all present things as the first of all cynics.

Well, on this occasion, Greeley could not forego the pleasure of fooling those that were so ready to be fooled. Doubtless he expected to pass for a rare specimen of a Mormon, as he actually is. But he got more than he spoke for. Some wag pointed him out for the Mormon King.—And his buffoons rig is coolly and carefully described and published at length, and read with avidity as an accurate description of Mormon regalia! Long live humbug!

And the Mormons would have starved out last winter, but for the shipwreck of a propeller.—A little mistaken in your geography. The propeller Illinois shipwrecked on Fox Island, and her cargo was taken care of by the Mormons at that place, not here. The Mormons here had such a supply of provisions, that they furnished flour to the bands of Indians in this vicinity at only four dollars per barrel. And more than three hundred barrels remained here for sale at the opening of navigation in May.

And then the Nauvoo Mormons accused Oliver Cowdery of dying a drunkard! Neither the Nauvoo Mormons nor any body else but this wise man's informant, the Swiss editor of the Green Bay Spectator, ever thought of such a tale. Oliver did not "become a good citizen." He always was a good citizen.—At Tiffin, Ohio, he maintained an untarnished character as a citizen, and a good reputation as a lawyer for many years. At Elkhorn, Wisconsin, no man stood fairer in society. As a lawyer, he was eminent for his soundness of practice and attention to business. He held several respectable offices, and received the undivided support of the Democratic party for the office of Representative. He there also published an able Democratic paper, and employed Mr. Cooley, the Swiss editor of the Spectator, as a printer.

Mr. Cowdery did not die in a tavern, nor at Council Bluffs. He died at the house of his brother-in-law, and early friend, Mr. Whitmer, at Crab Orchard, Missouri, surrounded by his family and friends. And he is respected as one called of God to the ministry of the gospel, and mourned as one of the fathers in the faith by all Mormons.

For the signs of poverty here, and the vaticination under which we are so fast sinking, we are quite content with their working. If none of these learned, wise men will complain of this growth of poverty and want we will not. All we have to say is, move along a trifle, and just give us a little more room. Four companies of emigrants in one day, and one hundred per cent. increase of population in a single year, a quadrupling of the material wealth, and instead of public officers lending their official power and their ignorance to all kinds of lawless injuries, the political and municipal control of Mackinac county and the Representative district will satisfy us. It is the kind of evidence of decay that we hope ever to exhibit. May all evil prophecies ever fall on us as they do now.

STORM OF THE SIXTH.

The water was higher during the east wind of the 6th than it was ever known before. At the present time the lake is not so high as it was in June last by five inches, but the heavy and continued east wind produced higher water in the harbor than at any previous time. At Whiskey Point the old woodyard and dock were under water, as was the floor of the old store. The water was also in the front door of McKinley's old dwelling house. A few plank were knocked off Aldrich's wharf, and one set of stringers in the bridge to F. Johnson & Co.'s fell down. The old fish houses of Densmore & Ward and Dodge & Bower, formerly on the beach, but now in three feet water, were considerably broken up. These buildings were unoccupied. The damage is inconsiderable.

POLICE.

Constable Preston recently took warrants for divers persons charged with stealing nets on the fishing grounds and from the water, and set off to make arrests. The second day he returned with Van Allen, Lobsdell and Smith. Another Smith was arrested, but while on the way down escaped. Another brother of the Smiths avoided the constable, and was not arrested.

The three prisoners brought in put off their examination ten days, and gave bail. On their return home they applied on board different boats to take them off with all their property and leave the bail to pay the bonds, but were refused a passage on different boats, among which we mention with pleasure the steamer Michigan and the propeller Troy. After this exhibition of honesty, divers persons having demands against Van Allen attached his property.

The two Smiths who escaped took Van Allen's boat, and went to High Island. Suspecting their lurking place, a constable went there for them, but they escaped again in season to avoid him.

Gen Miller (sheriff elect) has since made a trip to Grand Traverse and Pine River, with warrants for the same and other persons charged with stealing nets from the Hows at the head of Beaver. No arrests were made. Almost the entire population at Pine River escaped to the woods on his coming up, and on his return from Traverse they took to their boats and put out in the severe storm of the 6th. The two Smiths were there, and left in H. Van Allen's boat, and laid their course for Mackinac. The Pine River settlement is little else than a band of vagabonds and thieves, and the sight of an officer of the law sets them all in a twitter.

At this writing there is a young man in our office, Byron Strobe, who was recently robbed by the same gang of above $100 in cash, and some trifling amount of property besides. He accompanied Gen. Miller to Pine River to ferret out the matter, but so complete is the dominion of lawlessness and crime there, that, having no legal process, he accomplished nothing. Fortunately for the lovers of peace and good order, the settlement at Pine River is entirely destitute of provisions and winter supplies. They are under the mere necessity of scattering off and seeking various means of subsistence. It is not at all probable that they will ever congregate again. The settlements in Traverse Bay are likely to assume a respectable character as men of business habits and substantial capital come in. They will give very little countenance to this Pine River gang.

The sloop Mary, of Inverness, loaded with mountain ash for Chicago market, lay in this harbor through the storm.

The schooners Dahlia and took refuge here.

Several boats and hookers belonging here were out. All are reported safe. The Emmlin rode out the storm beautifully, between here and Grand Traverse, loaded with lumber for this place.

We learn by the Emmlin that Mr. Wadsworth, of Grand Traverse Bay, was a candidate for Representative in this district, and received the vote of that region with considerable unanimity. He is a worthy man, and would make a respectable Representative, but is not elected.

Few Uses of Iron.—What is this so light and fanciful? The clothes-horse, surely, all iron, and so nicely wrought that you might lift it in your hand and balance it. And what is this, with its delicate wreaths of roses and beautiful figures bending in postures of grace. The fire screen! Why! is that all iron? Every bit of it; and these fairy like chairs, with their lithe forms, and sprightly patterns, these sofas with their scroll-work and vine leaves, these tablets that seem airy enough for a sprite's parlor, are all of iron. We take up a beautiful ornamental basket from the mantel, the sprays, the curling tendrils, the buds, leaves, and roses are of iron; we lift a vase that has upon its surface the soft blending of a hundred tints, that is iron, too. Yonder is a magnificent picture—the frame, so profusely gilded, so elaborate in detail, in iron; we inspect the tall mirrors, they are surrounded by a casting of iron; further up, in "my lady's chamber," stands iron couches, an iron bedstead with ornaments disposed very elegantly about it; the toilet table is also iron. Varied indeed are "the uses of iron."—Boston Olive Branch.

CARBONIC ACID.—When coal, wood, or other substance containing carbon, is brought to a very high heat in the presence of oxygen, combustion, that is chemical union ensues. The two materials combine; heat, light, motion, and electricity are evolved in the process; and the product is another colorless gas, which is carbonic acid. This gas is proved to be an acid by its pungent taste, its effect in changing a vegetable blue color to red, and by its combining with alkalies and other oxides forming some of the class of compounds called salts. The diamond being nearly pure carbon, burns up, producing this acid gas.

In chemical union, bodies combine only in certain fixed proportions, or given weights.—Thus 1 lb. of hydrogen always combines with 8 lbs. of oxygen, or twice that weight. So, too, with 14 lbs of nitrogen, 8, or 16, or 32, or 40 lbs of oxygen combine, but no qualities between these. The lowest weights in which these bodies united are termed their combining numbers, or equivalents.

The equivalent of oxygen is 8, that of a carbon, 6.

Now in the formation of carbonic acid, we find one equivalent of carbon united with two of oxygen. This is the gas which is emitted by the respiration of animals, volcanization, and it exists solid in many of the metal ores.—Scientific American.

It is a weakness to confess our faults, without cause, to our fellow creatures; it is a mark of strength to acknowledge them at proper times and places. It is sinful pride not to confess the wrong to those whom we have wronged.

FOR THINKERS.

Take the spade of perseverance,
Dig the field of progress wide!
Every rotten root of faction
Hurry out and cast aside;
Every sabborn weed of error,
Every seed that hurls the soil,
Those whose very growth is terror—
Dig them out what'er the toil!

Give the stream of Education
Broader channel, bolder force;
Hurl the stones of persecution
Out where'er they block its course;
Seek for strength in self-exertion,
Work, and still have faith to wait;
Close the crooked gate of fortune;
Make the road to honor straight!

Men are agents for the future!
As they work so ages win
Either harvest or advancement,
Or the produce of their sin!
Follow out true cultivation,
Widen Education's plan;
From the majesty of nature,
Teach the majesty of Man!

Take the spade of Perseverance;
Dig the field of Progress wide;
Every bar to true instruction,
Carry out and cast aside;
Feed the plant whose fruit is wisdom,
Offense from crime the common sod;
So that from the throne of Heaven,
It may bear the glance of God.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. LONDON: DERRY AND MILLER. 1852.

Illinois, like Missouri, divided itself into two great camps, the Mormons and the anti-Mormons, and the circumstances were so menacing that Mr. Ford, the Governor, took the field in person. In a proclamation to the people of Illinois, he stated that he had discovered that nothing but the utter destruction of the city of Nauvoo would satisfy the militia and troops under his command, and that if he marched into the city pretexts would not be wanting on their part for the commencement of slaughter. Anxious to spare the effusion of blood, he called upon the two Smiths to surrender peaceably, pledging his word and the honor of the State, that they should be protected. He also called upon the Mormons to surrender their public arms, and upon the Nauvoo legion to submit to the command of a State officer. The Mormons agreed to the terms, and Joseph and his brother surrendered to take their trial for the riot, and for the destruction of the office of the Expositor. The "Prophet" had a presentiment of evil, and said, as he surrendered, "I am going like a lamb to the slaughter, but I am calm as a summer's morning; I have a conscience void of offence, and shall die innocent." While in prison at Carthage, another writ was served upon him and Hyrum for high treason against the State of Illinois, on an information in which the principal witness was the Higbee already mentioned, and whose hostility to Joseph had not ended at the trial before the Court of Nauvoo. As the mob breathed vengeance against both prisoners, and as the militia very indecently sided with the people, and were not to be depended on in case of any violence being offered to the two Smiths, the Governor was requested by the citizens of Nauvoo and other Mormons to set a guard over the gaol.

On the morning of the 26th of June, 1844, the Governor visited the prisoners, and pledged his word to protect them against the threatened violence. It now began to be rumored among the mob that there would be no case against the Smiths on either of the charges brought against them, and that the Governor was anxious they should escape. A band of ruffians accordingly resolved that as "law could not reach them, powder and shot should."

About six o'clock in the evening on the 27th, the small guard stationed at the gaol was overpowered by a band of nearly two hundred men, with blackened faces, who rushed into the prison where the unfortunate men were confined. They were at the time in consultation with two of their friends. The mob fired upon the whole four. Hyrum was shot first, and fell immediately, exclaiming, "I am a dead man."—Joseph endeavored to leap from the window, and was shot in the attempt, exclaiming, "O Lord, my God." They were both shot after they were dead, each receiving four balls. John Taylor, one of the two Mormons in the room, was seriously wounded, but afterwards recovered.

The following account of this cruel murder was given by Mr. Willard Richards, the second of the two Mormons who were present with Joseph and Hyrum in the prison, when the mob broke in upon them. It appeared in the Times and Seasons of the following month, under the title of "Two minutes in Gaol."

"Possibly the following events occupied near three minutes, but I think only about two, and have penned them for the gratification of many friends:—

Carthage, June 27th, 1844.

"A shower of musket-balls were thrown up the stairway against the door of the prison in the second story, followed by many rapid footsteps. While General Joseph and Hyrum Smith, Mr. Taylor, and myself, who were in the front chamber, closed the door of our room against the entry at the head of the stairs, and placed ourselves against it, there being no lock on the door, and no ketch that was useable; the door is a common panel—and as soon as we heard the feet at the stairs' head, a ball was sent through the door, which passed between us, and showed that our enemies were desperadoes, and we must change our position.

General Joseph Smith, Mr. Taylor, and myself, sprang back to the front part of the room, and General Hyrum Smith retreated two thirds across the chamber, and directly in front of and facing the door. A ball was sent through the door, which hit Hyrum on the side of the nose, when he fell backwards, extended at length, without moving his feet. From the holes in his vest (the day was warm, and no one had a coat on but myself,) pantaloons, drawers, and shirt, it appears evident that a ball must have been thrown from without, through the window, which entered his back on the right side, and passing through, lodged against his watch, which was in his right vest pocket, completely pulverizing the crystal and face, tearing off the hands, and mashing the whole body of the watch, at the same instant the ball from the door entered his nose.

"As he struck the floor he exclaimed emphatically, 'I am a dead man.' Joseph looked towards him, and responded, 'O dear Brother Hyrum!' and opening the door two or three inches with his left hand, discharged one barrel of a six shooter (pistol) at random in the entry from whence a ball grazed Hyrum's breast, and entering his throat, passed into his head, while other muskets were aimed at him, and some balls hit him.

"Joseph continued snapping his revolver, round the casing of the door into the space as before, three barrels of which missed fire, while Mr. Taylor, with a walkingstick, stood by his side and knocked down the bayonets and muskets which were constantly discharging through the doorway, while I stood by him, ready to lend any assistance, with another stick, but could not come within striking distance without going directly before the muzzles of the guns.

"When the revolver failed we had no more fire-arms, and expecting an immediate rush of the mob, and the doorway full of muskets—half-way in the room, and no hope but instant death from within, Mr. Taylor rushed into the window, which is some fifteen or twenty feet from the ground. When his body was nearly on a balance, a ball from the door within entered his leg, and a ball from without struck his watch, a patent leger, in his vest pocket, near the left breast, and smashed it in 'pie,' leaving the hands standing at 5 o'clock, 16 minutes, and 26 seconds—the force of which ball threw him back on the floor, and he rolled under the bed which stood by his side, where he lay motionless, the mob from the door continuing to fire upon him, cutting away a piece of flesh from his left hip as large as a man's hand, and were hindered only by my knocking down their muzzles with a stick; while they continued to reach their guns into the room, probably left-handed, and aimed their discharge so far around as almost to reach us in the corner of the room to where we retreated and dodged, and then I re-commenced the attack with my stick again. Joseph attempted, as the last resort, to leap the same window from whence Mr. Taylor fell, when two balls pierced him from the door, and one entered his right breast from without, and he fell outward exclaiming, 'O Lord my God!' As his feet went out of the window my head went in, the balls whistling all around. He fell on his left side a dead man. At this instant the cry was raised 'He's leaped the window,' and the mob on the stairs and in the entry ran out. I withdrew from the window, thinking it of no use to leap out on a hundred bayonets, then around General Smith's body.—Not satisfied with this, I again reached my head out of the window, and watched some seconds, to see if there were any signs of life, regardless of my own, determined to see the end of him I loved.

"Being fully satisfied that he was dead, with a hundred men near the body, and more coming round the corner of the gaol, and expecting a return to our room, I rushed towards the prison-door, at the head of the stairs, and through the entry from whence the firing had proceeded, to learn if the doors into the prison were open.

"When near the entry, Mr. Taylor called out, 'Take me.' I pressed my way until I found all doors unbarred; returning instantly, caught Mr. Taylor under my arm, and rushed by the stairs into the dungeon, or inner prison, stretched him on the floor, and covered him with a bed, in such a manner as not likely to be perceived, expecting an immediate return of the mob.

"I said to Mr. Taylor, 'This is a hard case to lay you on the floor; but if your wounds are not fatal I want you to live to tell the story.' I expected to be shot the next moment, and stood before the door awaiting the onset.

WILLARD RICHARDS."

BLUFFING A PEDDLER.

If there is really a difficult point to be managed, and acuteness is required to effect it, commend me to a woman's wit for the purpose.

Now there was a certain tin-ware peddler traveling to the city to dispose of notions to such as were willing to bargain. He was a persevering trader and never suffered to be bluffed off with a short answer. One house, in particular, he received continued rebuffs and assurances that nothing was wanted—they never bought anything in that way. Nevertheless, he made his call steadily at each regular round, until he became a regular pest and in reply to the information that it was useless to call, mad-known his intention to do so just as often as he pleased.

One bitter cold day the bell rang and the good lady hastened to get her hands from the dough in which they were busy, to answer the call—when she reached the door, there stood the everlasting peddler.

"Any tin-ware to-day, ma'am?"

"Have you any tin kitchens?"

"Yes ma'am," and away he goes to bring the samples, chuckling at the idea that his zeal was to be successful at last—"There's nothing," muttered he, "like hanging on anyhow."

The tins were brought, and tin pans were next called for.—The pans were brought, and other articles enumerated to seven different kinds, until a goodly portion of the peddler's load had been transferred to the house.

"Is there anything else you want ma'am?"

"Oh no—I don't want any of these; I only asked you if you had them."

The peddler was fairly sold, and for a moment felt like getting angry—but the idea rather left him, and he commenced returning his wares into the cart without uttering a word.

MARTYRS.

According to the calculations of some, about 200,000 christian Protestants suffered death, in seven years, under pope Julian; no less than 100,000 were massacred by the French in the space of three months; Waldenses who perished amounted to 1,000,000; within thirty years the Jesuits destroyed 900,000; under the duke of Alva, 36,000 were executed by the hangman; 159,000 by the Irish massacre, besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed, who were proscribed, starved, burnt, assassinated—chained to the galleys for life, immured within the walls of the Bastille, or others of their church and state prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of papacy, including the space of 1,400 years, amounts to 50,000,000

CAPITAL ILLUSTRATION.—Senator Rusk, referring to the fact, that any proposition brought before Congress now, is sure to produce a vast number of political capital, said, that the fact called to his mind an incident.—He was present on one occasion at an Indian "talk," when a man drove up with a barrel of whiskey; an old Indian who was sitting by, fixed his eye on the barrel, and after looking earnestly for some time, asked Mr. R. if he knew what was in that barrel. He said it was whiskey, he presumed. "No," said the Indian, "there are about a thousand songs and fifty fights in that barrel!"

PRETTY GOOD HIT.—An elderly bookseller of Paris, one of the old-fashioned routine school, on being asked for the "New French Constitution," replied that he "did not sell periodicals."

"New York must be redeemed!" said Mrs. Partington, as she read a newspaper prospectus, posted on the street bearing the above evangelical motto. "I hope from my heart that it may be redeemed," she continued. "but if the politicians are meant by it, I should be most afraid it was a hopeless case with 'em. And yet, massa knows, there's none that stands in need of redemption more'n them. But there's a ne so bad as to be beyond hope." The splash of a water-cart extinguished the old lady's benevolent remarks, and she lost her solicitude for the politicians in the endeavor to save her own self from the wet.

THE STINGY MAN.—"Hallow, driver," said a strong partisan, near the close of the polls in a hotly contested election, "hurry down with your back and bring up old W. to vote; make haste."

DRIVER.—Old W., indeed, he won't vote, he's too stingy to vote.

PARTISAN.—O, you are mistaken, he ideas, he will vote for his brother of the same church; he is very religious; I have often heard him pray and sing psalms.

DRIVER.—No matter if you have, He'll never go to heaven if there's any toll to pay on the road; provided there's a free passage to the other country.

Jimmy Tite and his wife had lived together in peace for fifty years. Probably in the whole county of Suffolk there was not a more attached and concordant couple. One day, as the old lady was standing along at the head of the stairs, she made a mis-step and fell some fifteen feet to the bottom. Her loving husband dropped the seine-needle from his hand, and rushed breathless to her aid, exclaiming, "Oh, dear! oh, dear! I'm afraid you've broke the spectacles. Ain't you hurt yourself? Oh, dear! I wouldn't had it happened for a dollar."

"John," said a clergyman to his man, "you should become a teetotaler—you have been drinking again to-day."

"Do you ever take a drop yourself, minister?"

"Ah, but John, you must look at your circumstances and mine."

"Very true, sir," says John; "but can you tell me how the streets of Jerusalem were kept so clean?"

"No, John, I cannot tell you that."

"Well, sir, it was just because every one kept his ain door clean."

An old gentleman who had dabbled all his life in statistics, says he never heard of more than one woman who insured her life.—He accounts for this by the singular fact of one of the questions on every insurance paper being—"What is your age?"

A Southern paper says that a young man who had gone to Vicksburg with his brother, to sell some corn, wrote the following to his father: "Dear dad, times is hard, and corn are low, money are scarce, and Bill am dead."

Two colored men, of Philadelphia, met on Thursday evening to fight a duel, but their courage failing, they shook hands and went home.

A BROAD HINT.—At a party, the other evening, the conversation turned, as it naturally does with young folks, on marriage—the other convenient subject besides the weather, when every other fails. One of the belles, addressed a beau, quite unconsciously (as she explained) said: "If I were you, and you me, I would have been married long ago!"

AN ACT

TO ORGANIZE THE COUNTY OF EMMET.

§ 1. The People of the State of Michigan Enact, That the county of Emmet shall be organized and the inhabitants thereof entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities to which by law the inhabitants of other organized counties of this state are entitled.

§ 2. There shall be elected in the said county of Emmet on the first Tuesday of May next, all the several county officers to which by law the said county is entitled; and said election and canvass shall in all respects be conducted in the manner prescribed by law for holding elections and canvass for county and State officers: Provided, That the canvass shall be held at the village of St. James in said county on the Monday next following said election, and said county officers shall immediately be qualified and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and their several terms of office shall expire at the same time that they would have expired had they been elected at the last general election; and Provided further, That until such county officers are elected and qualified, the proper county officers of the county of Mackinac shall perform all the duties appertaining to the said county of Emmet in the same manner as though this act had not passed.

§ 3. The board of canvassers of said county under this act shall consist of the presiding inspectors of election from each township therein, who shall organize by appointing one of their number chairman and another secretary of said board, and shall thereupon proceed to discharge all the duties of a board of county canvassers as in ordinary cases of elections for county and State officers.

§ 4. The county of Emmet shall have concurrent jurisdiction upon Lake Michigan and Green Bay with the other counties contiguous thereto.

§ 5 The boundaries of the township of Paine in the county of Emmet shall be extended so as to include the rocks, bars and land under water, contiguous to the Beaver Islands and nearer to them than to any other land in said county.

§ 6 All that part of the township of Paine [as in the last preceding section described] which lies in the towns thirty seven north of ranges ten and eleven west and the south half of towns thirty eight north of ranges ten and eleven west shall be organized into a separate township by the name of Galilee, and the first township meeting shall be held at the store occupied by Ludlow Hill.

§ 7 All that part of the State of Michigan known as the county of Charlevoix shall be erected into a separate township by the name of Charlevoix, and the first township meeting therein shall be held at the house of Galen B. Cole, and the said township is hereby annexed to the said county of Emmet, and shall for all purposes be deemed and taken to be within and a part of said county.

§ 8. All the Islands, bars, rocks and lands under water, contiguous to the said counties of Emmet and Charlevoix, and within the State of Michigan not heretofore by any Legislative enactment included within the body of any county in said State, together with so much of range four west as was heretofore included in Cheboygan county are hereby annexed to the said county of Emmet, and shall for all purposes be deemed and taken to be within, and a part of said county.

§ 9 The county seat of said county shall be established by the board of Supervisors.

§ 10 The register of deeds of the county of Emmet shall, on the request and at the expense of the persons interested, copy from the records in the office of the register of deeds of Mackinac, all records of deeds and instruments in writing, conveying or in any wise limiting or affecting the title to any real estate in the county of Emmet as hereby organized, and the copies so made shall be deemed and taken to be original records for all purposes whatsoever.

§ 11. This act shall take effect immediately.

AN ACT

TO ORGANIZE THE COUNTY OF CHEBOYGAN.

§ 1 The People of the State of Michigan, Enact That the counties of Cheboygan and Wyandot shall be organized in one county by the name of Cheboygan, and the inhabitants thereof entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities to which by law the inhabitants of other organized counties are entitled.

§ 2 There shall be elected in the county of Cheboygan on the first Tuesday of May next all the several county officers to which by law the said county is entitled, and said election and canvass shall in all respects be conducted and held in the manner prescribed by law for holding elections and canvasses for county and State officers: Provided, That the canvass shall be held at the village of Duncan in said county on the Monday next following said election, and said county officers shall immediately be qualified and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and their several terms of office shall expire at the same time they would have expired had they been elected at the last general election; and provided further, That until such county officers are elected and qualified, the proper county officers of the county of Mackinac shall perform all the duties appertaining to the said county of Cheboygan in the same manner as though this act had not passed.

red had they been elected at the last general election, and provided further, That until such county officers are elected and qualified, the proper officers of the county of Mackinac shall perform all the duties appertaining to the officers of said county of Cheboygan in the same manner as though this act had not passed.

§ 3. The board of canvassers of said county under this act shall consist of the presiding inspectors of each township therein, who shall organize by appointing one of their number chairman and another secretary of the board, and shall thereupon proceed to discharge the duties of a board of county canvassers as in ordinary cases of elections for county and State officers.

§ 4. The county of Cheboygan shall have concurrent jurisdiction upon Lake Huron, Thunder, and Saginaw Bays with the other counties contiguous thereto.

§ 5. All that part of the township of Cheboygan which lies east of the middle of the main channel of Mullet Lake and Cheboygan River, and of a line extended due north from the mouth of said river to the north bounds of the county shall be organized into a separate township by the name of Duncan, and the first township meeting therein shall be held at the Hotel in the village of Duncan.

§ 6 The county seat of Cheboygan county is hereby fixed and established at the village of Duncan on Cheboygan Bay in said county.

§ 7 The counties of Presque Isle, Alpena, Montmorency, Otsego, Crawford, Osceola, Alcona, Ogemaw and Roscommon are hereby attached to the county of Cheboygan for judicial and municipal purposes.

8. This act shall take effect immediately.

AN ACT

TO COMPLETE THE ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY OF GRAND TRAVERSE.

§ 1 The People of the State of Michigan Enact, That all that part of the county of Omeena which remained after the organization of the county of Grand Traverse, is hereby annexed to the county of Grand Traverse, and shall forever be and remain a part and parcel of said county.

§ 2. There shall be elected in the county of Grand Traverse, on the first Tuesday of May next, all the several officers, to which by law the county is entitled, and said election shall, in all respects, be conducted and held in the manner prescribed by law for holding elections for county and state officers. The canvass of said election shall be held at the county seat of said county, the Monday next following the election, and the officers so elected shall be qualified and enter upon the duties of their office immediately, and shall continue in office until their terms of office would have expired, had they been elected at the last general election; but this section shall not be so construed as to deprive any officer duly elected, and qualified, of his office, or to authorize the election of any to fill his place.

tion; but this section shall not be so construed as to deprive any officer duly elected, and qualified, of his office, or to authorize the election of any to fill his place.

§ 3. All that part of the Peninsula in Grand Traverse Bay, which lies north of the line between town twenty-seven and twenty-eight north, shall be organized into a separate township by the name of Peninsula, and the first township meeting shall be held at the Old Mission.

§ 4. All that part of the county of Grand Traverse not included in the township of Peninsula, shall be erected into a separate township by the name of Traverse, and the first township meeting shall be held at the county seat.

§ 5. The counties of Antrim, Kalkaskia, Missaukee, Wexford, Manistee and Leelanau, are hereby attached to Grand Traverse for judicial and municipal purposes.

§ 6. The county of Antrim, shall be and remain the township of Omeena, and the name of the said township is hereby changed to Antrim, and the next township meeting therein, shall be held at the house of Abraham S. Wadsworth.

§ 7. The county of Leelanau is hereby erected into a township by the name of Leelanau, and the first township meeting therein, shall be held at the house of Peter Dougherty.

§ 8. The counties of Kalkaska and Missaukee, are hereby attached to Antrim for township purposes, and the county of Wexford, to Traverse, for township purposes.

AN ACT

TO ORGANIZE THE TOWNSHIP OF DRUMMOND.

Sec. 1. The People of the State of Michigan Enact, That all that part of the State of Michigan included within the following boundaries, that is to say: beginning at the most southern bend in the boundary between this State and the British Province of Canada, immediately south of the Canadian Island of St. Joseph; thence south-eastwardly and southwardly through the broadest channel through and between islands to and through the west straits; that is, the strait between the Upper Peninsula and Drummond Island; thence south in Lake Huron to a point due east, of the middle of the channel between Isle Bois Blanc and the Light House Point at Cheboygan Harbor; thence east to the boundary between this State and the British Province of Canada; thence northwardly and westwardly along said boundary to the place of beginning, be and is hereby set off and organized as a separate township by the name of Drummond, and the first township meeting shall be held at the house of Murray Seaman; and the said township is hereby declared to be one of the townships of the county of Chippewa.

PROPERTY EXEMPT FROM TAXATION.

§ 5. The following property shall be exempt from taxation, viz:

¶ 1. Household furniture, including stoves put up and kept for use in any dwelling house, not exceeding in value two hundred dollars.

¶ 2. All spinning wheels and weaving looms, and apparatus, not exceeding in value fifty dollars.

¶ 3. All arms and accoutrements required by law to be kept by any person; all wearing apparel of every person or family.

¶ 4. The library and school books of every individual and family, not exceeding in value one hundred and fifty dollars, and all family pictures.

¶ 5. To each householder, ten sheep with their fleeces, and the yarn and cloth manufactured from the same; two cows, five swine; and provisions and fuel for the comfortable subsistence of such householder and family for six months.

¶ 6. All the property of the United States, and of this State, except lands bid off for the State at tax sales, except as hereinafter provided.

¶ 7. All public or corporate property of the several counties, cities, villages, township and school districts in this State, used or intended for corporate purposes.

¶ 8. The personal property of all library, benevolent, charitable and scientific institutions, incorporated within this State, and such real estate belonging to such institutions as shall actually be occupied by them, for the purposes for which they were incorporated.

¶ 9. All houses of public worship, with the pews or slips and furniture therein, and rights of burial and tombs, while in use as repositories of the dead.

¶ 10. The estates of Indians, except lands held by them by purchase, and the personal estates of persons, who, by reason of infirmity, age and poverty, may, in the opinion of the supervisor, be unable to contribute towards the public charges.

EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYED.

"I tell John he's too honest."
"Ah, how so?"
"Why he has lost me many a good bargain because he will insist on telling every thing he knows about that he's selling."
"That's unlucky."
"Yes—now when you are putting off your hay, you don't feel yourself bound to tell just how it was got in,—whether or not you had a little sprinkle of rain upon it, or whether the lot will run as well as the sample."
"Certainly not."
"If you did, you wouldn't get your price for it."
Returning to the city in one of our Eastern trains of cars a few mornings since after a nights absence, we overheard two gentlemen on the seat behind us delivering with great energy the dialogue commenced above. We felt under no obligation to put our fingers in our ears, so we were favored with more of the same sort.

"Now," continued the first speaker, "I tell John, when a customer is looking at a case of my boots, he isn't obliged to dig up every pair in the box and display to him every flaw in the leather, and every slip of the knife, and the quality of the thread and all that. If he wants to make a trade he must put the best face on the article he can, and he may be sure the purchaser will make allowances enough for defects."

"Precisely."

"But I can't make that boy understand the matter. It's just so with all that family. It runs in the blood. His father before him had the same failing, or he might have been a rich man. John won't tell anything but what is exactly true about the boots, and he will tell all that is true."

"What do you keep him for?"

"Well, I've thought a good many times I should get rid of him, but you see I can trust John myself—I don't have to watch him in anything between him and me. I always know what to depend upon where John is concerned. He'd cut off his right hand I do verily believe, before he'd cheat me out of a mill. But I have to take care how I leave customers in his hands. When I am there I attend to them myself—but when I am away they find out a little more of the art of boot making than I care to have them know."

"That's all nonsense. There's no use in setting up for such special honesty. If everybody traded on such principles it would do. But if one man undertakes it alone, he'll go to the wall. The fact is if we tell the worst about our good, we actually misrepresent—for the purchaser will suppose all the while we are saying the best we can and that the actual worst is very far beyond what we have admitted. Oh, it won't do at all."

"Just what I've told John over and over."

Honest John! brave John! heroic John! Our heart warmed toward this unknown incorruptible one that kept his integrity through such a fiery ordeal. God bless him and shield him, and deliver him out of the hand of the Philistines!

And this is the way, we thought, that many an employer sets about corrupting the unprotected youth committed to his care and training. This is the sort of nurture under which many a youthful aspirant for a business career is indoctrinated in the mercantile virtues. These are the models and exemplars after which they are exhorted to pattern in their creed and their practice if they would win golden fortunes.

Would that we could blow a trumpet warning for parents and guardians in the country, who seek so earnestly places for their sons and wards in our mercantile houses in the city. Beware what you spread for their unwary feet. Find out the character of the men to whom you entrust the keeping of such precious interests. Be sure that they prize truth and honesty, not only when these traits subserve directly their own self-interest, but when they sometimes interfere with "a good bargain."—Fortify, especially the hearts of those you send forth on such a perilous venture, with an inflexible and steady attachment to uprightness and virtues—and then uphold and shield them on these slippery heights of temptation by enticements with Heaven.—Agriculturalist.

NORTHERN ISLANDER.

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND,

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1853.

In our next number we shall publish the act passed at the last session of the Legislature to prevent the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors.

This act is to be voted on by the people at a special election to be held in June. Upon looking into the act we see many objections to it. But prohibition is doubtless called for in this case, as it is in all cases of practices dangerous to individuals and destructive of good order.

In this place the existing law is allsufficient for the suppression of the liquor business, and we expect no local benefit from any change. But in other parts of the State, the present law is a dead letter. Possibly a different one might succeed, and there is great anxiety among the friends of temperance to try the new act known as the Maine Law.

We are fully persuaded that some of the provisions are unconstitutional. But a majority of the Legislature, by voting for the bill have decided that it is constitutional.

Until the courts have decided fully upon that question, the people are bound to acquiesce. Moreover, we do not deem that the details of the law are submitted to the popular vote. It is rather the question of prohibition, than the details of the remedy. After the people have voted for the act if the remedies provided by it are overruled by the courts as unconstitutional, it would yet be competent for the Legislature to so amend it as to remove the objections. The only real difficulty is in the question whether there is virtue enough in the people to enforce the Law when duly made.

EMMET COUNTY.

In 1840 the county of Tonedagana was laid off, having its east line crossing the straits about five miles west of Old Mackinac, its south line running two miles south of Big Beaver Island, and extending north and west to the boundaries of the State. In 1843 Mackinac was extended west along the north shore, and Delta laid off beyond it so as to make the north shore of Lake Michigan the north boundary, and the west shore of Green Bay the west boundary of Tonedagana, and by another act the name was changed to Emmet. This county remained attached to Mackinac till the present year, and in 1847 a township was organized therein by the name of Peaine.

By the act which we publish on our first page the county of Emmet is fully organized, and its boundaries much extended.—The present boundary is as follows: Begin at Point Saint Ignace, where the line between Ranges 3 and 4 strikes the shore; thence south across the straits and along said line to where it is intersected by the line between Township thirty two and thirty three north; thence west to the shore of Grand Traverse Bay; thence along the shore of the bay, following its meanderings, around the head to the northern extremity of the Peninsula west of the Bay; thence west across Lake Michigan to the line of the State of Wisconsin; thence westwardly along the State line to the mouth of Menomonic River; thence north eastwardly and eastwardly along the margin of the Bay and Lake to the place of beginning, except the isle of Saint Helena. This includes all the Islands in Green Bay which pertain to this State, and the small islands in Grand Travers.—The county consists of some twenty-five Townships of land, and including the principal part of the fisheries of Lake Michigan.

The Harbor of Saint James is the best in all the Lakes, is centrally situated in the fisheries, and in the county, and must ever be the seat of trade, as well as of county business.

Emmet county contains all the Mormon settlements in this region, except at Drummond Island. There are also five bands of Indians residing in the county, who are an industrious peaceable and moral population.

The county is favorably situated for settlement, and will in a short time lead all others in this part of the State in wealth and business, as it does now in all the elements of civilization.

CHEBOYGAN COUNTY.

The new county of Cheboygan on the south side of the Straits of Michigan, is one of the most desirable places in the State for settlement. The present population is very small; probably not above 400 whites, and several bands of civilized Indians. They are honest and industrious, and unless destroyed by the use of intoxicating liquors will make good citizens.

Cheboygan county has a very large proportion of the very best quality of land for agricultural purposes. Its pineries are extensive, and several sawmills are in operation. Mr. Duncan, an enterprising and wealthy citizen of Chicago, has both water and steam mills, and is making immense quantities of lumber.

The county seat is established at a beautiful bay 18 miles to the S. E. of Mackinac. This bay makes an excellent harbor, and a large spring pier affords good accommodations for first class vessels and steamers. Near this Bay is the mouth of Cheboygan River, on which the village is principally built. This now makes a harbor as safe as a canal for small vessels. One or two miles up it is a rapid which is improved for mill purposes, and affords water power to a great extent. Above the dam the River is navigable for steamboats fifty or sixty miles; and with its branches and the small Lakes it drains it makes an inland navigation of one hundred and fifty miles.

The village of Duncan must in a few years be the principal trading town of the straits. For trade it is preferable to Mackinac, because on the South Channel which is the shortest, and has a better harbor, and more especially because being on the main land, and with a naturally rich back country, it is convenient for local trade by land as well as water. It is very new, and its advantages have not been developed or appreciated. But several men of enterprise have become interested in real estate there, and new as it is, large investments have been made for permanent purposes. Its growth must be rapid.

GRAND TRAVERSE COUNTY.

Two years ago last winter an act was passed to organize a new county by the name of Grand Traverse, consisting of all the territory of the unorganized county of Omena, except about a township of land in the north east corner. But by a very singular oversight, the act to organize the county contained no provision for dividing the same into townships, or for any township organization therein.

Hence it was impossible to effect a legal organization. No election could be legally held, for there were no officers authorized to act as inspectors of election. No taxes could be levied, for there were neither supervisors or assessors. They were without a judiciary, and consequently without law.

By the act to complete the organization of Grand Traverse, which we publish on the first page, these defects are remedied, and the jurisdiction of the county much extended; and by a subsequent act it is provided with a judiciary.

The county seat of Grand Traverse is on the west head of Grand Traverse Bay, where Messrs. Hannah, Lay & Co. have extensive sawmills, and a very valuable lumbering establishment.—These proprietors are men of great enterprise, and excellent business habits. They are large land proprietors, and deeply interested in the country around that beautiful Bay. Their establishment cannot fail of exerting a beneficial influence on the destinies of the new and growing county.

PINE RIVER.

The mouth of Pine River, on many of the maps called Green River, east shore, opposite Fox Islands, presents many advantages for settlement, especially for those who wish to do both farming and fishing. Besides a good agricultural soil, extensive fisheries, productive a part of the season, and a tolerable harbor, it has excellent water power, a large amount of valuable timber, and extensive inland navigation.—Enough land has been entered on speculation to make the burden of taxation light on the first settlers, and as it is within the county of Emmet, a legal organization and legal protection of person and property is already provided for. A considerable body of settlers intend to go over in May.

It will be perceived that nominally there are three less counties in Michigan than formerly, Charlevoix is swallowed up in Emmet; Wyandot in Cheboygan, and Omeena in Grand Traverse—Grand Traverse was never on any map, but is precisely the same in extent as Omeena was on the maps. In the laying off these unorganized counties in the northern part of the Lower Peninsula many of these consist of something less than sixteen towns, and will probably when organized many of them be enlarged. The Constitution contemplates sixteen towns as the minimum size of counties.

Remember the county elections in Emmet, Cheboygan and Grand Traverse next Tuesday, and the Canvass and qualifying of officers the Monday after.

Hon. Alexander Toll has received the appointment of Collector at Mackinac. Messrs. Pratt and Warner have births in the Land Office at Sault Ste Marie. These are good appointments.

We hear that Charles M. O. Mally has the keeping of the Wago Shance Lighthouse. If corruption in office, constant and unremitting dishonesty in his private conduct, an occasional felony, the destitution of a whole community and treachery to his party are recommendations, he deserved the appointment.

RAPPING SPIRITS.

We learn by private letters from Council Bluffs, that rapping spirits are making themselves very familiar at that place, and that with great unanimity they agree in declaring Mr. Strang a Prophet. This is to us a matter of serious regret. We do not doubt that evil spirits make themselves quite as familiar now, as in the days of Moses and the judges of Israel. Nor that they deceive as many by their rapping now, as they did then by their peeping. But when they declare a great truth, every man may be sure they are but paving the way for some act of deception.—By the law of the Lord delivered to Moses, all who have dealings with them were condemned to death. True, the enlightenment of this age forbids punishment for such dealings now.—Possibly God's law may have been just as wise as any that men have since devised, but the age is too enlightened to be governed by it. Evidently these evil spirits have some deception to accomplish, and if they tell a hundred truths it is but to get credence for the lie that is to follow.

NEW COUNTIES.

Three new counties were created by acts passed at the late session of the Legislature, all located in this part of the State; the county of Emmet corresponding with slight variations, with the unorganized counties of Emmet and Charlevoix as they appear on the maps; the county of Cheboygan, corresponding with Cheboygan and Wyandot; and Grand Traverse on the maps is called Omena. To Grand Traverse is attached all the unorganized counties south of Charlevoix to and including Manistee, and extending east to the middle of the State; and to Cheboygan are attached all the unorganized counties in the east half of the State, and south as far as Saginaw Bay, except Iosco.

All this territory, Iosco included, was heretofore attached to Mackinac, giving that county jurisdiction over at least one-fourth of the State; it is now cut down to reasonable dimensions, and there is a reasonable prospect that the administration of local officers in this vast and improving region will be conducted with some reference to the public good.

All the new counties elect officers the first Tuesday in May, and the officers enter upon their duties the Monday following, May 9th. A District Court will be held by Judge Douglass at Saint James the 19th July, and at Duncan the 26th. Judge Martin holds the Circuit at Grand Traverse, but we have not learned the time.

The two counties of Oceana and Newago were organized two years ago, but no authority was given to hold Courts there, and they remained without a judiciary; but by an act passed at the last session two circuits a year will be held in each of those counties.

On the issue of the last No. of the Islander, 25th Nov. last, we announced the intention of getting out an occasional number through the winter. The Mail arrangements were at that time such that there was little prospect of communication with our readers from this place. We therefore arranged to issue the paper monthly from Lansing.—By mistake the book containing the list of subscribers was left behind. This was not missed till the arrival of Mr. Strang at Lansing the 1st January, and it was at this time impossible to supply it. We seriously regret the accident, but the mistake was made. There was no possible remedy.

LAKE PIRATING.

The Schooner Seaman was recently, while lying at anchor in Mackinac harbor, seized by a body of marauders who for a long time have infested the fishing regions, run ashore and seriously injured, and her Captain carried ashore and brutally treated.

After a short detention, the Capt. was forced aboard by the same persons who had seized his vessel, who then proceeded to get her off, and made sail and compelled him to leave. They came aboard about midnight in strong force, pretending to have authority from the collector of customs; but as soon as they were in possession, abandoned that pretense, and commenced cutting the stays and destroying sail and rigging.

What stopped their proceedings the Capt. could not learn. But the whole gang became suddenly quite as anxious to get rid of their prize and prisoners, as they had been to take them.

The winter has been relatively mild. Only once and for a very short time was the ice sufficient to get to the north shore. Boats from the upper part of the Lake, could have made the Island at any time without any difficulty whatever.

On the first page is an extract from the new tax law; so much as relates to exceptions. It will be convenient for those who have received blank lists from the Supervisor.

There has been during the past winter a great scarcity of Tobacco on this Island. We do not learn however that any one has starved to death for want of it.

Our thanks to the Clerk of the Bucephalus for late papers.

The following certificate of good behavior will be gratifying to the people of Ohio. They have shown an admirable indifference to the dictates of humanity and are therefore commended.

PURSUITS OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.—We noticed the escape of some thirty-odd slaves from Mason and Braeken counties a short time ago.—Some of them were captured in Ohio by their owners, at a distance of about forty miles from the river. We are requested by a gentleman of this county, who joined in pursuit and aided in capturing three of the fugitives, one of whom belonged to himself, to state, on behalf of the pursuers, as an act of justice to the people of Ohio, that the pursuing party were not obstructed or ill treated in any way, by word or deed, though their business was perfectly known, but that they experienced from the people of Ohio, both going out and returning, every aid they desired, many citizens of that State volunteering their personal assistance and extending the kindest hospitality. They brought the captured slaves home, without encountering the least obstacle, or even an unkind word. The pursuing party feel it their duty to the people of Ohio and Kentucky to make this grateful acknowledgment.—Mayerville Eagle, 9th.

NOTICE.

IN Pursuance of the provisions of "An act to complete the Judicial organization of the State," approved February 13th 1853, I hereby appoint the third Tuesdays of July and January, as the time of holding the terms of the Circuit Court for the County of Emmet, and the fourth Tuesdays of July, and January, as the times of holding the terms of Circuit Court for the County of Cheboygan, for the year eighteen hundred and fifty three, and until further appointment in pursuance of law.

MARRIED.

At St. James, on the 31st ult, by Elder GEORGE MILLER, Mr. ULYSSES PORTER, to Miss VESTA PACKARD, all of this place.

Died at Coldwater, Mich., April 5th Hon. Robert Abbott, aged 82, formerly Auditor-General of Michigan; many years engaged in mercantile pursuits and the Fur trade. Hon. James Abbott, of Detroit, and the late Samuel Abbott, of Mackinac, were his brothers. The Judge was the oldest Methodist in Michigan, and built the first Methodist Church in the State, where now are some twenty thousand; having connected himself with that denomination nearly half a century since.

New illustrated [stereotyped] edition of Fox's Book of Martyrs, being a complete history of the lives, suffering and triumphant death of the Primitive, as well as the Protestant Martyrs; from the commencement of Christianity to the latest period of pagan and popish persecutions, to which is added an Account of the Inquisition. The Bartholomew Massacre; The Massacre in France; and general Persecutions under Lewis XIX.; Massacre of the Irish Rebellion in the recent persecution of the Protestants in the south of France; by the Rev. John Fox, A. M., with an illustrated title page, 1 vol., 12 mo. 566 pp. Price $2.25.

Few books are better known, or have been more read, than Fox's Martyrology. The original work was very voluminous, and has never been re-printed in this country, and perhaps not in England within the last hundred years. We have however, had numerous abridgements and this is one of the few instances in which, an abridgement is better than the original. The work would not be read at all at this day, as it came from the author. We have it to the snug volume before us. An epitomized view of the horrible tragedies which have so deeply disgraced religion. No reader can have patience to dwell long on such fiendish cruelties. But the facts are too well attested to admit of a doubt, and they must be given to the world as the strongest possible proof that man is depraved, and needs regenerating.—These persecutions were not the effect of religion, but of bigotry and fanaticism.—Christian Advocate.

Buds and Blossoms from our own Garden; by T. S. Arthur and F. G. Wadsworth beautifully embellished with numerous illustrations; 1 vol., 12 mo., 210 pages. Price 75 cents.

The above authors are popular writers and favorably known in the market, and whose works are read with interest.

WHAT OUR ENEMIES SAY OF US.

FROM A NEW HISTORY OF MORMONISM, BY AN ENGLISH AUTHOR. AUBURN: DERBY AND MILLER, 1852.

The Times and Seasons of the 15th of January, 1845, announced to the Saints in all parts of the world that the inhabitants of various parts of Illinois as well as of Missouri, were accumulating charges of every kind against the Mormons with the view of sweeping them into irretrievable ruin. Dr. Foster, in his newspaper, the Expositor, continued with the usual virulence of a friend converted into an enemy, to spread abroad defamatory reports against the "Apostles" and the leading Saints, which were copied, commented upon, and exaggerated by all the anti-Mormon press throughout the Union, and especially by the journals in the more immediate vicinity. The old cry of expulsion was raised, as the only means of restoring peace. A meeting of the Town Council of Nauvoo was held on the 13th of January, to consider these reports and the threatened expulsion of the Saints; and a meeting of the citizens in general was held on the day following with the same object. A few extracts from the resolutions passed at these assemblies will show the extent of the charges brought against the Mormon people, and the manner in which their leaders resolved to meet them. An address issued by D. Spencer, the successor of Joseph Smith in the mayoralty of Nauvoo, and countersigned by Willard Richards, the Recorder, one of the Twelve Apostles, stated "that while the Mormons were peaceable and loyal to the constitution and laws of their country, and were ever willing to join hands, with their honest virtues and patriotism, in the repressing of crime and the punishment of real criminals, they left their enemies to judge whether it would not be better to make Nauvoo one universal burial-ground, rather than suffer themselves to be driven from their lawful homes by such highhanded oppression. And it might yet become a question," they added, "to be decided by the community whether the Mormons, after having seen their best men murdered without redress, would quietly allow their enemies to wrench from them the last shreds of their constitutional liberties; or whether they would not make their city a vast sepulchre, and be buried under its ruins in the defence of their right."

From the string of resolutions appended to this document, it appears that the crimes laid to the charge of the Mormons were, that they had organized a regular system of horse and cattle stealing, and other plunder throughout the State; that Nauvoo had become a grand receptacle of stolen goods; that every coiner, forger, robber, and even murderer found a safe refuge from justice within its walls; and that the Town Council allowed no legal process of any kind to be served within the limits of their jurisdiction. The resolutions admitted that many criminals had fled for refuge to Nauvoo under the mistaken notion that they would be screened from justice by the Mormons; but alleged that these criminals were not and never had been Mormons; that they had been induced to take this course by the false reports of the anti-Mormon press; and that in every case they had been delivered up to justice when demanded. The Town Council also pledged itself to use every means in its power to root such characters out of the city, and deputed fifty delegates to proceed to all the principal towns and districts in the neighborhood, to inform the people of the falsehood of the accusations brought against the Saints, and to demand the aid of all the well-disposed to rid the county of the thieves and blackguards that swarm into it. A conciliatory message from Governor Ford, published shortly afterwards, expressed his belief that the charges against the Mormons as a body were utterly unfounded; and that there was no more crime in the City of Nauvoo than in any other of a corresponding size and amount of population; and called upon the inhabitants, whether Mormons or anti-Mormons, to preserve the peace and strictly respect the laws. From January to October, 1845, the Mormons "lived a life of sturt and strife."

Every man's hand was against them; and not only riots, but regular pitched battles took place. The Governor was called upon to interfere actively; and a meeting of delegates from the nine counties surrounding Nauvoo was convened; at which it was asserted by all the speakers that there would be no peace for Illinois as long as the Mormons remained within its boundaries. The delegates pledged themselves to support each other to the last extremity in expelling them, forcibly if they could not otherwise be induced to go. The painful circumstances in which the Saints at Nauvoo found themselves, and the history of the persecution which they suffered, were detailed in an Official Letter to the Saints under the date of the 1st of November, 1845. This document ran as follows:—

"After we had begun to realize the abundance of one of the most fruitful seasons known for a long time, and while many hundreds of Saints were laboring with excessive and unwearied diligence to finish the Temple, and rear the Nauvoo House, suddenly, in the forepart of September, the mob commenced burning the houses and grain of the Saints in the south part of Hancock County. Though efforts were made by the Sheriff to stay the torch of the incendiary, and parry off the deluge of arson, still a 'fire and sword' party continued the work of destruction for about a week, laying in ashes nearly two hundred buildings, and much grain. Nor is this all; as it was in the sickly season, many feeble persons, thrown out into the scorching rays of the sun, or wet with the dampening dews of the evening, died, being persecuted to death in a CHRISTIAN land of law and order; and while they were fleeing and dying, the mob embracing doctors, lawyers, statesmen, christians of various denominations, with the military from colonels down, were busily engaged in filching or plundering, taking furniture, cattle, and grain. In the midst of this horrid revelry, having failed to procure aid among the 'old citizens,' the Sheriff summoned a sufficient posse to stay the 'fire-shower of ruin,' but not till some of the offenders had paid for the aggression for their lives.

"This, however, was not the end of the matter. Satan sits in the hearts of the people to rule for evil, and the surrounding counties began to fear the law, religion, and equal rights, in the hands of the Latter-Day Saints, would feel after inquiry, or terrify their neighbors to larger acts of 'reserved rights,' and so they began to open a larger field of woe. To cut this matter short, they urged the necessity (stop the effusion of blood) to expel the church, or, as they call them, the Mormons, from the United States, peaceably, if they could, and forcibly if they must, unless they would transport themselves by next spring.

Taking into consideration the great value of life, and the blessings of peace, a proposition, upon certain specified conditions, was made to a committee of Quincy, and which it was supposed from the actions of conventions, was accepted. But we are sorry to say that the continued depredations of the mob, and the acts of a few individuals, have greatly lessened the confidence of every friend of law, honor and humanity, in everything promised by the committees and conventions, though we have already made great advances towards fitting for a move next spring.

"A few troops stationed in the county have not entirely kept the mob at bay, several buildings having been burnt in the month of October.

"We shall, however, make every exertion on our part, as we have always done, to preserve the law and our engagements sacred, and leave the event with God, for he is sure.

"It may not be amiss to say, that the continued abuses, persecutions, murders, and robberies, practised upon us, by a horde of landpirates, with impunity in a Christian republic, and land of liberty (while the institutions of justice have either been too weak to afford us protection or redress, or else they too have been a little remiss,) have brought us to the solemn conclusion that our exit from the United States is the only alternative by which we can enjoy our share of the elements which our Heavenly Father created free for all.

"We then can shake the dust from our garments, suffering wrong rather than do wrong, leaving this nation alone in her glory, while the residue of the world points the finger of scorn, till the indignation and consumption decreed makes a full end."

After a series of struggles and negotiations, and a regular siege of the city of Nauvoo by the anti-Mormons, of which no authentic account yet appears to have been published, with the exception of the short and interesting summary by Colonel Kane, to be referred to hereafter, the Saints agreed to leave Illinois in the spring of 1846, or as "soon as grass grew and water ran," provided that, in the interval, they should not be molested, and that they should be allowed time and opportunity to sell their farms and properties, and remove beyond the limits of civilization.

ST. MARY CANAL LAW.

An act to provide for the construction of a Ship Canal around the falls of St. Mary.

Section 1. The People of the State of Michigan enact, That the act of Congress entitled "An Act granting to the State of Michigan the right of way, and a donation of public land for the construction of a Ship Canal around the Falls of St. Mary, in said State," approved August 25, 1852, is hereby accepted, and all conditions expressed in said act are hereby agreed to, and made obligatory upon the State of Michigan.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the object of said act, the Governor is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint five commissioners and an engineer, who shall prepare a plan for the construction of said canal, in conformity with the provisions of said act of Congress, and this act, to be approved by the Governor, and who shall have the entire and absolute control and supervision of the construction of said canal; and said commissioners are authorized and empowered to make all necessary contracts for the construction of the same, and during said construction if at any time said commissioners shall be dissatisfied with the manner of construction or the material used, it shall be competent for them or a majority of them to direct the contractor to construct the same in such other manner, and to use such other materials, as to such commissioners or a majority of them, or engineer, shall seem necessary to insure a permanent and durable work; and this condition shall be embodied in any contract made for construction of said canal. In case any controversy shall arise between the commissioners and contractors, in regard to said materials, or the manner of doing said work during the construction of said canal, the same shall be decided by a board to consist of said engineer and the Governor of the State, and the District Judge of the Upper Peninsula, who shall decide thereon in a summary manner, and the decision of a majority of them shall be binding and conclusive upon the contractors, who shall thereupon proceed with the work, in the manner and make use therein of the material so required by said board or a majority of them: Provided, however, That the work upon said canal shall not be suspended or delayed by reason of said controversy, and the contractors shall proceed therewith as required by said commissioners. The locks in said canal shall not be less than three hundred and fifty feet long, and not less than seventy feet wide: Provided, That all appointments made by virtue of this act shall cease and determine when said canal is completed.

Sec. 3. The said commissioners shall receive proposals for the construction of said canal, agreeably to said plan; and in deciding upon said proposals are required to take into consideration the responsibility of the person or persons offering to contract for the same, and his or their ability to carry into effect the object and intention of said act of Congress, by constructing said canal in the best and most expeditious manner; and said commissioners in making said contract shall require good and ample security for the performance thereof. Neither the commissioners, or Governor, or the engineer, or any member of this Legislature, or any person related to the commissioner-engineer, shall in any manner be interested in the contract, directly or indirectly, for the construction of said canal.

Sec. 4. No contract for the construction of said canal shall take effect until it shall have been approved by the Governor and engineer.

Sec. 5. The contractor or contractors for the construction of said canal shall defray the entire cost of surveying, locating and constructing the same; the necessary traveling and other expenses of the commissioners, the salary of the engineer and the assistants. The necessary expenses of the commissioners shall be paid out of the State Treasury, upon the warrant of the Auditor General. The engineer shall have power, with the approval of said commissioners, to employ such assistants as may be necessary and proper. The assistants shall receive such reasonable compensation for their services as may be agreed upon by said commissioners, and the engineer and assistants shall be paid out of the State Treasury, from time to time, upon the account of each respectively, and upon the warrant of the Auditor General. The cost of locating the said canal, and all expenses of every kind, incidental to the supervision of the construction and completion of said canal, shall be reimbursed by the contractors as fast as ascertained, and shall be paid by them into the State Treasury, and under the direction of said commissioners. When and as fast as the lands shall have been selected and located, an accurate description thereof, certified by the persons appointed to select the same, shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of the State Land Office, whose duty it shall be to transmit to the Commissioner of the General

Land office a true copy of said list, and to designate and mark upon the books and plans in his office the said lands, as St. Mary canal lands.

Sec. 6. The commissioners shall require said canal to be constructed and completed within two years from making the contract, and on the completion of the same within said period to their satisfaction and acceptance, and the satisfaction of the Governor and engineer, they shall cause a certificate thereof to be signed by the commissioners, Governor and engineer, and filed in the office of the Commissioner of the State Land Office. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner of the State Land Office, forthwith to make certificates of purchases for so much of said land as by the terms of the contract for the construction of said canal are to be conveyed for the purpose of defraying its costs, and the expenses hereinbefore provided; which certificates shall run to such persons, and for such portions of said lands so selected, and to be conveyed, as the contractor may designate, and shall forthwith be delivered to the Secretary of State, and patents shall immediately be issued thereon as in other cases.

Sec. 7. That said commissioners shall keep an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands granted by said act of Congress, and of all expenditures in the construction of said canal, and the earnings thereon, and on or before the first Monday in October in each year, return a statement thereof to the Governor, whose duty it shall be to return the same, or a copy thereof, to the Secretary of the Interior, at Washington, as required by said act of Congress.

Sec. 8. The said commissioners shall be subject to removal by the Governor, and if a vacancy shall occur by removal or otherwise, when the Legislature is not in session, the Governor may fill such vacancy, and the person so appointed shall hold his office until the Legislature meet.

Sec. 9. For the selection of the lands granted by Congress, as aforesaid, for the construction of said canal, the Governor shall appoint agents, in pursuance of said act. He shall give notice to the person or persons contracting under this act to construct said canal, to recommend to him suitable persons to make such selections; and he shall appoint such agents from the persons so recommended if, in his judgment, suitable and proper persons for that purpose.

Sec. 10. That such contractor is by this act empowered and authorized to associate with himself in the obligations, agreements and conditions of said contract, such persons or parties as he may elect, and assign to them such proportional interest in the remuneration of lands, or the avails thereof, as he may decide and agree upon; or he may assign his rights, privileges and remunerations under the contract with the State, to any association organized according to the laws of this or any other State, and upon due notice to the board of commissioners and Governor, they shall be made parties to the obligations and emoluments of the contract, and be authorized upon such assignment and notice, to hold and sell lands, and improve and use the same as they may see fit and desirable, to the same extent that the contractor might have individually have done; but in no case shall himself or his sureties be eased or exempted from their full liabilities to forfeitures for non-fulfillment of the contract as before specified in failure of inadequacy of additional security offered by assignees: Provided, It shall not be lawful for said company to use their funds, or any part thereof, in any bankage or brokerage, or in buying or selling bank notes, or bills of exchange, or in any other business whatever, except that especially provided for by this act, and the acts referred to herein.

Sec. 11. The said commissioners, in entering into the contract for the construction of said canal, shall provide that the railroad now present existing across the Portage be in no way unnecessarily interrupted during the progress of the work; and said commissioners shall have power to decide the necessity of any interruption; and the said commissioners may, at the expense of said Railroad Company, relocate said railroad, if they shall deem it necessary to aid and promote the construction of said canal.

Approved Feb. 5, 1853.

A GOOD ONE.—A day or two since a white man met a negro followed by a dog, and proposed to purchase the animal, telling the negro he would give him a dollar Virginia note for it.

The negro took the money and disposed of the dog. On coming to town, ascertained that the one-dollar Virginia note was on the celebrated Bank of the Union and therefore worth nothing.

"O I doesn't lose anything," said the negro; "the dog was wuff niffin, to."

AN ACT

TO COMPLETE THE JUDICIAL ORGANIZATION OF THE STATE.

§ 1. The People of the State of Michigan enact, That the third judicial circuit shall, in addition to the county of Wayne, include the counties of Cheboygan and Emmet, and the eighth judicial circuit shall, in addition to the counties now included in it, also include the counties of Oceana, Newaygo and Grand Traverse.

§ 2. The circuit Judge of the third circuit is hereby required within twenty days after the passage of this act, to appoint the times of holding the terms of the circuit courts in the counties of Cheboygan and Emmet, and to cause notice thereof to be published in the Northern Islander, a newspaper published in the county of Emmet, and also to transmit to the clerks of each of said counties a copy of such notice, which shall be filed and preserved by such clerk.

§ 3. The circuit Judge of the eighth circuit is hereby required within twenty days after the passage of this act to appoint the times of holding the terms of the circuit courts in the counties of Oceana, Newaygo and Grand Traverse, and to cause notice thereof to be published in the Grand Rapids Enquirer, a newspaper published in the city of Grand Rapids, and to transmit to the clerks of each of said counties a copy of such appointment, which shall be filed and preserved by such clerks.

§ 4. The circuit courts shall have the same jurisdiction to hear, try and determine causes now pending or hereafter commenced, as if said counties had been added to said circuit at the time of organizing the same respectively.

§ 5. This act shall take effect immediately.

AN ACT

Prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages and the traffic therein.

SECTION 1. The People of the State of Michigan enact, That no person shall be allowed to manufacture or sell at any time, by himself, his clerk, servant or agent, directly or indirectly, any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquors, a part of which is spirituous or intoxicating, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC 2. The township board of every organized township, or a majority of them, and the village board of common council of every incorporated city or village, on the first Monday of May annually, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, may appoint some suitable person as the agent of said township, city or village, to sell at some central or convenient place within said township, city or village, spirits, wines, or other intoxicating liquors, to be used for medicinal and medicinal purposes, and no other. Any such agent shall receive such compensation for his services as the said board or legal authority appointing him shall prescribe, and shall, in the sale of such liquors, conform to such rules and regulations as the said township board, or a majority of them, or said village board or common council shall prescribe for that purpose. And such agent, appointed as aforesaid, shall hold his situation for one year, or until his successor be appointed, unless sooner removed by the authority from which he may have received his appointment; as he may be at any time at the pleasure of said board or legal authority appointing him as the case may be.

SEC 3. Provides a form of bond to be entered into by agents.

An unnumbered section after three, authorizes the Board of supervisors of the several counties to grant licences to manufacturers.

Another unnumbered section provides that such license shall not be received after the first year unless two thirds the electors of the town in which the distillery or factory is located in favor of it at the annual township meeting, and requires the manufacturer to give bonds.

A third unnumbered section provides a form of bond.

A fourth unnumbered section authorizes towns, cities, and villages at their annual meetings by a two thirds vote to raise funds for their agent to purchase liquors with. And to pay him for his services; also that he shall keep an account of all sales and the persons to whom sold and inflict a penalty of five dollars for obtaining liquors by false pretensions.

SEC 4. If any person by himself, clerk, servant, or agent, shall at any time, sell any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquors, part of which are intoxicating, in violation of the provisions of this act, he shall forfeit and pay on the first conviction ten dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall stand committed until the same be paid. On the second conviction under this act he shall forfeit and pay twenty dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall stand committed until the same be paid. On the third, and every subsequent conviction of this act, he shall pay twenty dollars and the cost of prosecution, and shall be imprisoned in the common jail of the county not less than three months nor more than six months, and in default of the payment of the fines and costs prescribed by this section, for the first and second convictions, the person or persons so convicted shall not be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of chapter one hundred and forty-two of the revised statutes of 1846 until he shall have been imprisoned two months; and in default of payment of fines and costs provided for the third and every subsequent conviction, he shall not be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of said chapter one hundred and forty-two of the revised statutes of 1846 until he shall have been imprisoned four months. And if any clerk, servant, agent or other person in the employment or on the premises of another, shall violate the provisions of this section, he shall be held equally guilty with the principal, and on conviction, shall suffer the same penalty above prescribed.

SEC 5. Any forfeiture or penalty arising under the above section may be recovered by an action of debt before any justice of the peace, or judge of any municipal or police court, in the county where the offence was committed. And all moneys recovered for a violation of this section or any other provision of this act, shall be paid into the treasury of the township, city or village where the offence was committed, and shall be appropriated to the support of the township library in such township, city or village. And the prosecutor may be admitted as a witness in the trial. And it shall be the duty of the common council of any city, the village board of any incorporated village and the supervisor of any township to commence an action according to law in the name of the people of the State of Michigan, against any person guilty of a violation of any of the provisions of this act, on being informed of the same, and being furnished with the proof of the fact by the oath or affidavit of any credible person, and any person resident in such township, city or village, may institute a suit for any such penalty or forfeiture in the name of the people of the State of Michigan, in the manner aforesaid.

SEC 6. If any person shall claim an appeal from a judgment so rendered against him by such judge or justice of the peace, on the trial of any such action, he shall first enter into a recognizance to the people of the State of Michigan in the sum of one hundred dollars, with two good and sufficient sureties, in any case so appealed, to prosecute his appeal to effect in the proper court to which it is taken, and to pay all costs that may be awarded against him upon a final disposition of such suit; and before his appeal shall be allowed, he shall also, give a bond, with two good and sufficient sureties satisfactory to the judge or justice who tried the case, running to the people of the State of Michigan, in the sum of two hundred dollars, that he will not during the pendency of such appeal violate any of the provisions of this act. And no recognizance or bond shall be taken in cases arising under this act except by the justice or judge before whom the trial was had, and if the recognizance and bond mentioned in this section shall not be given within three days after the judgment, the appeal shall not be allowed, the defendants in the meantime to stand committed.

SEC 7. Provides for removing agents, for improper sales, and putting their bonds in suit.

SEC 8. No person shall presume to be a manufacturer of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or a seller thereof, without being duly appointed, on pain of forfeiting on the first conviction the sum of one hundred dollars and cost of prosecution, and in default of the payment thereof the person so convicted shall be imprisoned sixty days in the common jail of the county; and on the second conviction the person so convicted shall pay the sum of two hundred dollars and cost of prosecution, and in default of payment shall be imprisoned four months in the common jail of the county; on the third and every subsequent conviction the person so convicted shall pay the sum of two hundred dollars, and shall be imprisoned four months in the common jail of the county where the crime was committed; said penalties to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction by indictment or by an action of debt, in the name of the people of the State of Michigan. And whenever a default shall be had of any recognizance arising under this act, securitas facias may be issued returnable at the next term of a court of competent jurisdiction in the county, and the same shall not be continued, unless for good cause satisfactory to the court.

SEC 9. All cases arising under this act, whether by action or indictment, which shall come before any court of record, on appeal or otherwise, shall take precedence in said court of all other business except those criminal cases in which the parties are actually under arrest, and awaiting a trial; and no nolle prosequi shall be entered without a statement in writing first placed on file by the prosecuting attorney and signed by him showing reason satisfactory to the court, for ordering the same to be entered; and no continuance shall be granted excepting where the applicant therefor shall show to the court by affidavit placed on file, that such continuance is required for the purpose of justice.

SEC 10. If any three persons, legal voters in the township, city or village, where the complaint shall be made, shall before any justice of the peace or judge of any municipal or police court, make complaint under oath or affidavit, that they have reason to believe, and do believe, that spirituous or intoxicating liquors are kept or deposited, and intended for sale by any person not authorized to sell the same in said township, city or village under the provisions of this act, in any store, shop, warehouse or other building or place in said township, city or village, said justice or judge shall issue his warrant of search, which warrant shall describe the place to be searched and the article or articles to be seized, to any sheriff, city marshal, or deputy, or to any constable, who shall proceed to search the premises described in said warrant, and if any spirituous or intoxicating liquors are found therein, he shall seize the same, and convey them to some proper place of security, where he shall keep them until final action is had thereon. But no dwelling house in which, or in part of which a shop is not kept, shall be searched, unless, at least, one of said complainants, shall testify to some act of sale of intoxicating liquors therein, by the occupant thereof, or by his consent or permission, within one month before the time of making said complaint, provided such warrant shall describe the place to be searched and the article to be seized. And the owner or keeper of liquors, seized as aforesaid, if he shall be known to the officer seizing the same, shall be summoned to appear forthwith before the justice or judge by whose warrant the liquors were seized; and if he fails to appear, or unless he can show by positive proof that said liquors are of foreign production, that they have been imported under the laws of the United States, and in accordance therewith, that they are contained in the original package in which they were imported, and in quantities not less than the laws of the United States prescribe, or at the time when seized legally held, and for lawful purposes, they shall be declared forfeited, and shall be destroyed by authority of the written order to that effect, of said justice or judge, and in his presence, or in presence of some person appointed by him to witness the destruction thereof, and who shall join with the officer by whom they shall have been destroyed, in attesting the fact upon the back of the order by authority of which it was done; and the owner, or keeper of such liquors, provided he shall have been duly summoned to appear, shall pay a fine of twenty dollars and costs, or stand committed for thirty days if it shall appear that liquors have been by him kept or deposited for the purpose of sale. And if the owner or possessor, of any liquors seized in pursuance of this section, shall set up a claim that they have been regularly imported under the laws of the United States, and that they are contained in the original packages, the Custom House certificate of importation and proof of marks upon the casks, or packages, corresponding thereto, shall not be received as evidence that the liquors contained in said packages are those actually imported therein.

SEC 11. If the owner, keeper or possessor of liquor seized under the provisions of this act shall be unknown to the officer seizing, the same, they shall not be condemned and destroyed until they shall have been advertised with the number and description of the packages as near as may be, for two weeks by posting up a written description of the same in at least five public places in the town, city or village where they were seized, and if such liquors are actually the property of any township, city or village in the State and were so at the time of the seizure, purchased for sale by the agent of said township, city or village, for medicinal and mechanical purposes only, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, they may not be destroyed; but upon satisfactory proof of such ownership within said two weeks, before the justice or judge by whose authority said liquors were seized, said justice or judge shall deliver to the agent of said township, city or village an order for the same, directed to the officer having said liquors in custody, whereupon said officer shall deliver them to said agent, taking his receipt therefor upon the back of said order, which shall be returned to said justice or judge.

SEC 12. Any person claiming any liquors seized as aforesaid, may appeal from the judgment of said judge or justice of the peace to the Circuit Court of the county where the same was rendered; or if in the Upper Peninsula of this State, to the District Court, but such judgment shall not be in any way affected by such appeal until the appellant shall give a bond in the sum of two hundred dollars, with two good and sufficient sureties, satisfactory to such judge or justice, to prosecute his appeal to effect and to pay all costs which may be awarded against him; and on the giving of such bond which shall run to the people of the State of Michigan the said order or judgment of such judge or justice shall not be executed; provided such bond be delivered to and approved by said judge or justice within three days from the time of making such order or judgment; and on such bond being so given and approved, such judge or justice shall within ten days thereafter, make return to such Circuit or District Court of the proceedings had before him, with copies of such complaint, warrant and return thereto, of the claim put in, and of his judgment or order in the case, and shall in making such return conform to the provisions of law relative to returns to be made on appeals from the judgment of a justice's court, so far as the same are applicable; and the appellant court shall have the same power to compel such return as to compel the same in her cases of appeal, and on such appeal being so taken and the return made such Circuit or District Court shall have full power to hear, try and determine the same and all questions arising in the case, and to carry into effect this act as fully as such judge or justice originally could do in the same, but nothing contained in this act shall be construed to prevent any Chemist, Artist or Manufacturer in whose art or trade they may be necessary, from keeping at his place of business such reasonable and proper quantity of distilled liquors as he may have occasion to use in his art or trade, but not for sale.

SEC 13. It shall be the duty of any Mayor, Alderman, Supervisor, City Marshal, or deputy of his or any Sheriff under or deputy Sheriff or Constable if he shall see that any intoxicating liquors are kept or sold in any tent, shanty, hut or other place of any kind for selling refreshments or otherwise in any public place on or near the ground of any cattle show, Agricultural exhibition, Camp meeting, or public occasion of any kind, to search such suspected places, and if such officer shall find upon the premises any intoxicating drink, he shall seize it and arrest the keeper or keepers of such place, and take them forthwith, or as soon as may be, before some justice of the peace, or judge of a municipal or Police court with the liquors are intoxicating, that they were found in possession of the accused, in a tent shanty or other place aforesaid, he or they shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for thirty days, and the liquors so seized shall be destroyed by order of said justice of the Peace or judge.

SEC 14. Any person arrested under the preceding section and sentenced as aforesaid may claim an appeal to said Circuit or District court, but before his appeal shall be allowed, he shall give a bond in the sum of one hundred dollars, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by such justice or judge, that he will prosecute his appeal in such Circuit or District court to effect and pay all costs which may be awarded against him. And thereupon the case shall be appealed, and a return made to the Circuit or District court, as provided in section twelve of this Act; and the appellate court shall have the like power to hear and determine the case.

SEC 15. In all cases of appeal under this act, from the judgment of a justice or judge of any municipal or police court to the circuit or district court, except when the proceedings is by action of debt, they shall be conducted in said court by the prosecuting attorney of the county; but no costs in such cases shall be remitted by the prosecuting attorney of the court. In any suit, indictment or other proceeding against any person for a violation of any of the provisions of this act, other than of the first offence, it shall not be necessary to set forth particularly the record of a former conviction, but it shall be sufficient to allege briefly that such person has been convicted of a violation of the fourth section of this act, or as a common seller as the case may be; and such allegation in any civil or criminal process in any stage of the proceedings, before final judgment, may be amended without terms, and as a matter of right.

SEC 16. All payment or compensations for liquors sold in violation of law, whether in money, labor or other property, either real or personal, shall be held and considered to have been received in violation of law, and without consideration, and against law and equity, and all sales, transfers and conveyances, mortgages, liens, attachments, pledges and securities of every kind which either in whole or in part shall have been for or on account of spirituous or intoxicating liquors so sold, shall be utterly null and void against all persons and in all cases, and no rights of any kind shall be acquired thereby; and in any action either at law or equity, reaching such real or personal estate, the purchaser of such liquors may be a witness for either party; nor shall any action of any be had or maintained in any court in this State, for the recovery or possession of intoxicating or spirituous liquors not lawfully held by the plaintiff at the time of seizure and in accordance with the provisions of this act, or for the value thereof: Provided that nothing contained in this section shall apply to any debts contracted before this act takes effect.

SEC 17. If any persons whose duty it is to carry into effect any of the provisions of this act, shall wilfully neglect so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished as provided for by law.

SEC 18. This act shall be submitted to the electors of the State for their approval or disapproval, on the third Monday of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, when there shall be an election held for that purpose, in each of the townships, cities and villages in the State, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, immediately after the passage of this act, to transmit to the Sheriff of each county in the State, a notice in writing, containing a brief statement of the contents of this act, and he shall cause a copy of this act to be published once in each week in the Lansing State Journal, from the date of the notice until the election aforesaid; and the Sheriff of the several counties, on receiving the notice hereby provided for, shall forthwith, in writing, notify the township clerk, of each township, and one of the inspectors of election of each ward in any city or village, of such election, and it shall be the duty of the township clerks, and the inspectors of election of said wards receiving said notice, to give eight days notice in writing or a printed, or partly written and partly printed notice under their hands respectively, to the electors of the township or ward, of the time and place of holding said election, by posting the same up in at least three public places in the township or ward. The election provided for by this act shall be conducted in the same manner as by existing laws is provided for the holding of a general election; and the inspectors of said election are thereby invested with the same powers and authority as are provided by the election laws of this State for a general election.

SEC 19. At said township, city or village election, a ballot box shall be kept by the several boards of inspectors thereof, for receiving the votes cast for or against said law; and on the ballots shall be written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, the words, "adoption of the law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages, and the traffic therein, Yes;" or the words, "adoption of the law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages, and the traffic therein, No."

SEC 20. The canvass for the votes cast for the approval or disapproval of this law, "prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages, and the traffic therein," and the returns thereof shall be made by the proper canvassing officers, within the same time and in the same manner as now provided by law for the canvass and return of the votes at an election for Governor, as near as may be, and the returns thereof shall be made to the Secretary of the State, Governor and State Treasurer, within the time and in the manner provided by law for the election of Governor, and on the first Tuesday of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, the Auditor General, State Treasurer and Secretary of State, shall meet at the Capitol, and proceed, in the presence of the Governor, to examine and canvass the returns of said votes, and proclamation shall forthwith be made to the Governor, of the result thereof. If it shall appear that a majority of the votes cast have thereon, "adoption of the law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages, and the traffic therein—yes," this act shall become a law of the State, from and after the first day of December, eighteen hundred and fifty-three; but if a majority of the votes cast upon the question, have thereon, "adoption of the law prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages and the traffic therein—no," this act shall become a law of the State, from and after the first day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy.

Sec. 21. All acts or parts of acts contravening the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Approved, Feb. 12, 1853.

NORTHERN ISLANDER

SAINT JAMES, BEAVER ISLAND.

THURSDAY, MAY, 19, 1853.

We shall continue to issue the Islander whenever it suits our convenience. If our subscribers do not receive it regularly they must conclude that we choose not to issue it. Of course we shall offer no apology for the neglect, for with a mail subscription list of above four hundred, not a dozen have paid us for the paper and we presume not fifty intend ever to pay. There is more than $2,000 of accounts due the office and any man may have the whole for a farrow cow. If this won't do we will pay odds. As soon as we get our arrangements made to issue the paper perfectly regular we shall strike off every name in arrears. Unless the money comes in soon, we shall not have more than a pocket full of papers to send by mail. Our patrons will please themselves in the premises. We have long since ceased to have any anxiety on the subject. The printing office has been kept up by the brethren gathered for the benefit of those scattered abroad, at an expense of from five hundred to one thousand dollars a year for several years. We were obliged to keep up the paper, lest it should be supposed we were making no progress. So much has been accomplished now that those who are blind to our progress, would not perceive it though written upon the face of the sun.

In the way of advertising, we have abundance of ne labors doing good business, but our misfortune is that they have more customers than they are able to supply, without advertising for them.

MR. STRANG IN THE LEGISLATURE.—At the election in November last, Mr. Strang was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the State of Michigan from the Newaygo district, consisting of twenty six sparsely populated counties, extending from the Muskegon River to the Straits of Mackinac. As usual some malicious persons principally at Mackinac undertook to prevent his taking his seat, but as usual were signally defeated. On arriving at Lansing he was arrested and an effort made to remove him without a legal investigation. He resisted a removal, got a legislative committee of investigation and the following was the result:—

"The select committee, to whom was referred the subject of the arrest of Mr. Strang, the member from Newaygo, by the undersheriff of Wayne county, through their chairman, Mr. Mitchell, submitted the following report:

"Your committee have had the matters referred to them under consideration, and find the facts so far as they can ascertain them, to be, that in June 1852, an indictment was found against said member for an alleged rescue of a criminal from the custody of an officer; that immediately following the indictment, the member was arrested and kept in custody for some time, and was then set at large. That after that, he was almost continually within the jurisdiction of the court where such indictment was pending, doing business in a public capacity, and frequently meeting the sheriff who had previously had him under arrest, and to the knowledge of the proper prosecuting officers, That he was elected to his seat in this House after such indictment was found, and that the charges against him were known to his constituents. That no farther effort to arrest him was made until he was about to assume his duties as a member of this House, and after he was entitled to his privileges from arrest as such member. That the writ was put into the hands of the petitioner on Monday last, with directions to make the arrest on the morning of the meeting of the Legislature. That in pursuance of such directions, the arrest was then made, and was afterwards released to obtain the assent of this House in answer to the prayer of the petitioner. That the petitioner did not intend to infringe upon the privileges of this House, but acted under instructions, and as he supposed in the discharge of his duty as an officer.

"The facts, so far as we can learn them, warrant the conclusion that the arrest was not attempted with a view to the furtherance of justice, nor to prevent an escape, but with the intent to accomplish some unworthy purpose and to deprive the constituency of said member, and this House of his services. That if there was any propriety in the first instance in this prosecution, the long rest it has been permitted to take, the carelessness and indifference of the officers having the matter in charge during so long a period, forbid the presumption that it is now for the attainment of justice that it should be suddenly revived at this peculiar juncture, when the member is just assuming the duties which his constituency have assigned him, with a full knowledge of all the facts charged against him.

"Your committee with the full sense that the due administration of justice should be free from all check or restraint, earnestly hope that any attempt to turn the just and necessary process of law into an engine of oppression or persecution will be promptly met and rebuked, and most especially when such an attempt infringes upon any of the privileges of a member of this House. Your committee deem the arrest under consideration to be a violation of right, in contravention of law, and an attempt to revive against a member of this House a prosecution that he long since had good reason to believe dropped and abandoned.

"In connection herewith, the committee submit a statement of Mr. Strang, marked 'A,' and in conclusion, in view of the facts and circumstances presented to them, recommend the adoption of the following resolution as a substitute for the one referred, and ask to be discharged from the farther consideration of the subject. "All of which is respectfully submitted.

WM. T. MITCHELL,
E. G. MORTON,
C. C. ELLSWORTH,
J. SEYMOUR,
B. P. HUDSON.

"Resolved, That this House deem the attempted arrest of James J. Strang, one of its members, an infraction of its privileges, and therefore denies the prayer of the petitioner.

"The report was accepted and the committee discharged.

"The resolution, as reported by the committee, was then adopted."

Mr Strang's seat was contested on the allegation that he was not a resident of the district, and that that portion of the apportionment bill under which he claimed to be in the district was unconstitutional.

After a severe contest he was sustained by the strong vote of forty nine to eleven. It is a matter of great satisfaction to us to say that his right was vindicated by the strength of the House, regardless of all party divisions, forty one Democrats and eight Whigs voting for him, and six Democrats and five Whigs against him.

The district was fortunate in its selection of a Representative. Extending over one fourth of the state, its local wants were more numerous than those of any other district. Yet not a local measure was committed to Mr. Strang's charge (except a petition to change the name of a township sent the last week of the session) but it was carried. In the general legislation he took prominent part, and carved out for himself a position of which any man might be proud.

The brief time he there spent in the society of public men from every section of the State has done more perhaps than any other event could have done to disabuse the public mind concerning the Mormons. The public press is ever slow to speak in favor of one, against whom a successful outcry has been raised. How far Mr. Strang has vindicated his true standing among gentlemen, will be seen by the following:—

I notice a disposition among honorable gentlemen on the Southern and general R. R. side of the question, to often make personal allusions to Mr. Strang by saying something about "Beaver Island" and the "Mormons" or the "golden Bible." This course is adopted to neutralize his able arguments against a loose and ungarded bill being passed, as they have got it up, and wish to rush it through without amendments, and will, if they have strength enough. There is no one of the advocates of a General law able to measure swords with Strang in debate, and they all know it, so they fight him out doors and in, by low insinuations about "Beaver Island." Such a mode of dealing with one who ever treats every member like a gentleman, without intruding upon them or the House, his peculiar religious views, is not exactly "on the square," but he is able, and will take care of himself.—Detroit Advertiser, February 5th 1853.

The Mormon Prophet, Strang, more familiarly known as King Strang, was yesterday arrested by a Detroit officer upon a bench warrant. Strang claimed his privilege as a member, and sustained his position in an able speech. His arrest he attributed to malice, and the position was sustained by strong proof. The House, to-day, discharged him from arrest, in spite of a strong and powerful prejudice against him.

To-day Messrs. Barton and Southerland, who are contesting the seats of Messrs. Strang and Hoyt, (the former of Emmet and the latter of Saginaw) made their argument before the Committee on Elections. The Prophet again was on hand, and in a speech of much strength, shrewdness and tact, maintained his right to be enrolled among the Honorables of Michigan.—Pontiac Jacksonian, January 12th 1853.

The Legislature is the great center of attraction. We went into the House to hear the arguments upon the contested seats from Newaygo County. "King Strang" pleaded his right in a masterly and convincing manner. He is a talented man, equal to any other man in debate and general information. He retains his seat.—Jackson Citizen.

Mr. Strang's course as a member of the present Legislature, has disarmed much of the prejudices which have previously surrounded him. Whatever may be said or thought of the peculiar sect of which he is the local head, I take pleasure in stating that throughout this session he has conducted himself with a degree of decorum and propriety which have been equalled by his industry, sagacity, good temper, apparent regard for the true interests of the people, and the obligations of his official oath. Detroit Advertiser, Feb. 10, 1853.

The case of James Barton, contesting the seat of Hon. J. J. Strang, is yet (Jan. 10) undecided. Mr. Strang presents and argues his case in person, with a force of reasoning, energy and eloquence which, whatever may be the result, will leave a most favorable opinion of his personal qualifications for the position he claims. State Journal.

The bill for a general law has been before the House in Committee of the Whole. Nearly the entire week, during which its provisions have been very thoroughly and ably discussed. The most prominent among the debaters were Messrs. Fly, Mitchell and Gale for the bill, and Messrs. Strang, Ransom and Ellsworth in the opposition. Mr. Strang is confessedly the most talented and ready debater in the House. It seems he was educated a lawyer, in which profession he had some experience in years past, but he has laid aside the law for the sceptre of a Mormon King and Priest. He seems equally ready on any subject, political, commercial, financial, judicial, educational, or any thing else in the range of legislation. He is bold, decided, positive and often overbearing in debate, and sometimes reckless in his statements [his neighbors never learned that] and woe to him who provokes his satire and sarcasm, for his wit is as unmerciful as it is ready in retort. He is ardent, passionate and rapid in his oratory, even to a fault, but is clear and forcible in argument, and never fails to make himself understood. In person he is a little below the medium height, stoutly built, large head and neck, of light complexion, with small, dark, and piercing eyes. From his social position as "King of Beaver Island," he is the lion of the House, and is always pointed out to the ladies visiting the Capitol. His great speech, since his right to his seat was settled, was made last Tuesday, in opposition to the Railroad bill. Temperance Advocate.

The General Rail Road bill was opposed by Mr. Strang, of Emmet Co., in one of the most powerful and elegant speeches of the present session.—Detroit Advertiser.

On the whole Mr. Strang's senatorial career has been an eloquent and honorable one.—Free Press.

SHERIFF OF MACKINAC.

At the election for county officers last September Gen. George Miller was elected Sheriff, and received the certificate of election from the canvassers at Mackinac, and duly filed his oath of office and official bond approved by the Hon. Daniel Goodwin, district Judge for the upper Peninsula.

In January last, part of the supervisors called a meeting of the board, of which the supervisors of Peaine, Omena and Manistee received no notice, and declared the office vacant.

They then ordered a new election to take place the 4th of April now past, the notice of which did not reach here till after the 20th April though there had been uninterrupted mail communication, and no notice whatever was sent to Omena and Manistee.

We do not speak of this as a matter in which we feel any interest, but as another evidence of the hot haste which the people of Mackinac village seek to seize all political power disregarding other parts of the county. The notices were kept back because the places not notified held a majority of the votes, but the attempt to declare the office vacant was the result of consummate ignorance.

They will yet learn that Gen. Miller is Sheriff of Mackinac, despite their efforts.

LAW ABIDING.—A few days since a vessel from Green Bay entered Grand Traverse with a supply of ardent spirits to sell to the Indians. Some citizens there having the welfare and good order of society at heart, made a complaint against the seller; and an officer with two assistants, attempted to make an arrest, but got taken. The offenders actually captured the constable and his assistants, and carried them into Wisconsin before discharging them. To a violation of a sumptuary law is added the offence of false imprisonment and kidnapping. The authorities at Grand Traverse may submit to such indignities if they please, we of Emmet will not.

There is a prevalent practice of sending out trading vessels to trade on the fishing grounds with a supply of liquors. We wish it understood that authority to sell intoxicating liquors in Mackinac does not carry with it the right to sell on Lake Michigan. From old Mackinac to the west line of the State, and south to Grand Traverse light, the Lake and all the bays are exclusively in Emmet county.

If the trade is persisted in, the Sheriff will go out with sufficient force and make arrests in all such cases. The law will be enforced whatever the cost. He is a fool who at this day thinks he can defeat it by crying pirates, robbers. That cry has been raised once too much.

The London Times is publishing a series of articles written by Mr. Ansted, an English traveller through the Southern States, in defence of American Slavery. Numerous casual writers of great talent are contributing to that popular paper, on the same side. And these articles are seized upon with avidity by the American press, both North and South.

The burden of all these and a thousand similar outpourings by political writers at home is, that the colored race is only adapted to that state of subjection, and are better off and more contented in slavery than if free; that they are incapable of self-care or self-government, and are enslaved to the great inconvenience of their proprietors, for their own especial benefit. These positions are backed by so strong testimonies, that it is scarcely possible to resist them.

But some unknown friend has sent us a copy of the last annual report of the American Colonization Society, an institution controlled almost exclusively by the defenders and apologists of slavery; having nearly all its officers extensive slave proprietors; which proves by the very highest testimonies that the new negro re- public on the coast of Africa has had a more rapid growth in wealth, intelligence and true greatness than the early English settlements in America; that the negro race there, both native and emigrant, is more moral than the white race generally; and that the negro republic is already entitled to no mean place in the family of civilized nations.

That republic is made up principally of emancipated slaves. Indeed, the tables show that a large portion of them purchased their own freedom with their own labour, and then paid their passages out, and received no aid whatever from the society's funds. Yet they have become wealthy. Their country has been changed in only thirty years from a hot bed of the slave trade to a powerful and highly civilized republic.

To NAVIGATORS.—A dangerous reef, nearly out of water, has been discovered between the Fox Islands and Gull. It is reported in the range of north Fox or Paros and Gull, bearing N. N. E. from south Fox or Patmos and a little the nearest Gull and is scarcely under water. Boats to Green Bay usually go to the north of it and those to Baileys Harbor south, but both very near.

We hear from Mackinac that the report of the appointment of Charles M. O. Malley to keep the Light house at Waigo shance was premature. It seems that he only took a set of signatures recommending Capt. Todd, and affixed them to a strong recommendation of himself, and made himself sure that he should get the appointment.

G. B. Cole, Supervisor of Charlevoix, made the assessment at Pine River a few days since. As soon as he left them there was a general lamentation among the men residing there that they had not killed him. These scoundrels can never learn that the law is supreme. So long as they get no support from others who have better character, their resistance will be limited to foul language and petty offences.

The election of county officers passed off very harmoniously. The following table will show the result. Immediately after the canvass a meeting was held of the board of supervisors and preliminary steps taken for the erection of the county buildings. The county seat is at this place.

OFFICERS OF EMMET COUNTY.

Sheriff, Joshua L. Miller. Clerk and Register, H. D. McCulloch. Judge of Probate, Roswell Packard. Circuit Court Commissioner, Dennis Chidester. Treasurer, Edward Chidester. Prosecuting Attorney, Francis Cooper. Surveyor, Thomas Derby. Inspector of Staves, Adam See. Inspector of Fish, A. J. Porter. Coroners, Gilbert Watson, Nathaniel Finch. Superintendents of the Poor, M. M. Aldrich, Gilbert Watson, Franklin Brevier. Assessors of unorganized Territory, Dennis Chidester, Isaac Pierce, J. T. Pierce.

On the 4th page we publish the last extract which we propose to make from Derby and Miller's "new History of Mormonism." So far we have inserted these extracts "without note or comment." In concluding, we cannot refrain from calling the attention of the reader to the very strong contrast between the Mormons and their persecutors; the Mormon country and the country of their enemies, as drawn by Col. Kane, son of Judge Kane, of Philadelphia. Such is the contrast the Mormons have every where made with their enemies. The same difference will be observed in any country, in passing from a settlement of persecutors to a settlement of Mormons. It has been observed and spoken of by thousands coming here.

A distinguished English geologist recently stated in conversation with a friend of ours, that among the results which Layard and Rawlinson have been led to, by their researches at Nineveh, is the following: that the prophecies of Daniel were undoubtedly written after the events to which they refer had taken place, and that the whole of this book is probably nothing but a political satire! This, though suppressed by Layard in his work, has been communicated to the London Asiatic Society by Major Rawlinson, and will probably soon appear in its published transactions.

In one of the works upon the Egyptian hieroglyphics recently published in Germany, which has come under our notice, is a table of commandments copied from an inscription of the date of one of the elder Pharaohs. These are more in number than the Jewish Decalogue, but some six or eight of them are the same.

Articles similar to the foregoing have gone the rounds of the papers generally, and we observe but one so far drop a word of disapprobation. Is it true indeed, that Christians have so little confidence in the divine authority of the scriptures, as upon a mere newspaper suggestion of a literary forgery to trumpet to every child in America, that the book of Daniel is a forgery? Somebody says Layard did not publish all he discovered, but his associate communicated to a learned society what Layard suppressed, and they have not published it and therefore an entire book of the sacred Canon is a forgery. Upon what is the faith of Christians founded, that it gives way so readily? Surely these are perilous times, in which men are given over to believe a lie because they do not love the truth. We have carefully read all Layard has published, and all we can lay our hands on of the antiquities of the Holy Land and the adjacent countries. So far we have not found one word to shake an intelligent faith in the Divine Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. But we have found much both to justify and to enlarge our knowledge of the Divine will.

This story that the book of Daniel is a political satire did not originate with Layard. It dates back before Layard was born, and will as found descended upon this credence in "Paines age of Reason." This credence it to Layard is only an infidel shift to give it currency by the endorsement of a name not already rendered infamous. We have no dread of the open advocate of infidelity.

The true believer has ever a sufficient answer to him. But there is something horrible in seeing such an assault on so great a Prophet passed quietly from hand to hand in a Christian country without one word of disapprobation. The times tend so infidelity, and the United States are rapidly becoming a Godless nation.

REV. CHARLES K. BEECHER ON "RAPPINGS."

Charles K. Beecher, a distinguished protestant clergyman of New York, has been making a thorough investigation of the spirit rappings, in which he comes to the following sensible conclusions. We give him credit for having after so long, with deep research, discovered just what the Mormons both here and at other places said and published from the beginning.

The following are the main conclusions of Mr. Beecher's laborious investigation, as summed up by the New York Tribune:

1. The idea that these "Rappings," or whatever they may be called, are the product of mere juggle, or internal imposture, is not to be entertained by any one, even imperfectly familiar with facts abundantly verified.
2. The hypothesis that these phenomena have their origin in some hitherto latent action of Electricity, Magnetism, or any other natural and physical force, creates many more difficulties that it overcomes, and is also inconsistent with some of the best attested facts.
3. In like manner, the idea that these phenomena are caused by some unconscious, involuntary mental action of some person or persons still in the body is equally unphilosophical, equally at odds with the attested facts, and equally open to the objection that it magnifies the marvel it professes to explain. To say that a table, which rests itself on two legs or one, or none, at the request of some person near it, and responds intelligently to a dozen various questions they were asked, is so to act by Electricity, or Magnetism, or some mental impulse of an individual wholly unconscious of such influence, is to assume as true what is incredible, because contrary to the world's uniform experience and to all the known laws of causation.
